Friends and former Amherst Regional High School classmates Charlotte de Vries, Brooke Steinhauser and Ella Stocker were in high spirits as they approached the theater's entrance. Now college graduates, the three recalled former President George W. Bush's election when they were high school freshmen and his re-election in their first year at college in 2004. However they said Obama's inauguration has a different feel.

"It's so exciting to be here. It's an historic event," said de Vries, a UMass alumna. "Obama is all about community and here we are in a community."

Northampton resident Pamela Cobb was also glad to be in the company of others.

"I didn't want to sit at home and watch it by myself. I wanted to be with a group of people," said Cobb. "I've got a big TV at home – so, that's not it. It's about being with other people."

And folks inside were not alone as every one of the theater's 803 seats was filled as they watched the celebration on a large screen, according to Debra D'Anthony, the venue's executive director. It was the first time the academy has offered an inaugural telecast, she said, and they did so because they felt there was something "special" about this inauguration.

"This is the first time – in my voting history – that I've been this excited about a president-elect," agreed Holyoke resident Leslie Pray.

Pray said she considered traveling to Washington D.C. to watch in person. However, she said she had too many commitments to make the trip and took the day off instead.

UMass alumnus Michael Trabert said he did not have to take any time off because he is currently unemployed.

"Maybe Obama can help me with that," Trabert laughed.

The Academy of Music also offered a rebroadcast of the inaugural ceremonies at 6 p.m., which brought in about 600 people, D'Anthony said.

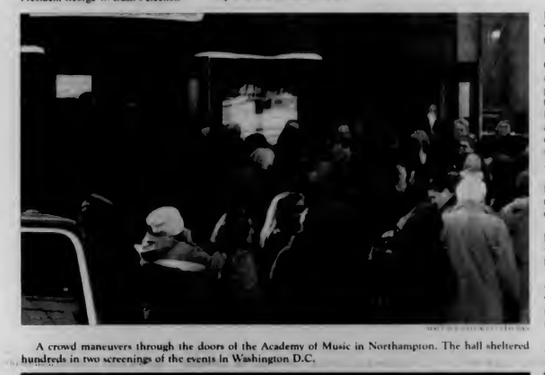
Prior to his inaugural address, customers at Rafters had speculated on what the 44th president might say.

"I feel he will do a really good job setting the tone for the next four years," said Alison Wilson-Pierce watching the coverage with fellow UMass student Vanessa Snow.

UMass graduate student Quentin Lewis said he was anticipating an "intelligent and inspiring" speech after the president takes his oath.

Lewis said he did volunteer work for Obama's campaign in New Hampshire and was excited to watch the inauguration in a more social atmosphere than his lab room at the University. However, having studied race as an anthropology student, Lewis said he is concerned for some people who may see the election of the first African-American president as an end to racism.

"It's a huge step forward," added his fiance Alanna Rudzik. "But, it doesn't mean that suddenly those [racial] barriers are gone."



A native of Canada, Rudzik gave her perspective on what the day meant for those beyond the United States' borders.

"It's a seismic shift in the way the world looks at the U.S.," said Rudzik. "It's an epic moment that he will have to live up to, but I think people around the world are rooting for the U.S."

tion despite the tight security, cold temperatures and the long lines taxing every aspect of the city's infrastructure.

Just after noon, Obama was sworn in by Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts, as cannon blasts and booming applause rung the new administration.

"Our economy is weak, we've seen a collective failure of making tough choices," Obama said. "Our use of energy strengthens our adversaries . these are indicators of a crisis."

Although Obama said times were tough, he emphasized his belief in America's unique resolve to persevere and stated that "we understand that greatness is never a given, it must be earned," before adding that "more often men and women of an obscure path have been our leaders," highlighting his point that the road ahead for the United States will be a difficult one.

Road to Capital too long for most

BY JENNIFER TURNER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Richmond, Va. — While most residents of greater Richmond chose to stay as far away from Washington D.C. as possible this past week, there were those who decided to brave the slow crawl of traffic in order to participate in the historic presidential inauguration of Barack Obama.

Those who made it to the festivities left the Richmond area in charter buses and carpools around 2 or 3 a.m. on Tuesday with the intention of making it on time for the start of the inauguration.

However, most Richmonders opted to stay in the area and commemorate the event at a variety of viewings and parties, including an Inauguration Ball hosted by The Virginia Young Democrats on Saturday, with a special discount to students.

With Interstate 95 being the only major roadway open during Tuesday's events, traffic was notably slower than usual. However, highway travelers who were not travelling to the inauguration were advised to avoid I-95 and take alternate western routes, which did help to ease the expected traffic.

Inauguration attendees hoping to rely on the D.C. Metro subway system were disappointed by an unscheduled delay due to an accident. A 68-year-old woman fell onto the Metro tracks at the Gallery Place station in downtown Washington on Tuesday morning and caused the subways to stop running. Many Metro travelers were forced to walk much further to the National Mall than planned. It has been reported that the woman is recovering in the hospital with no life-threatening injuries.

Despite the long delays and the bitter cold, most were thrilled to be there and be part of history.

However, some of the people who purchased tickets to the inauguration were literally left out in the cold when they arrived at the National Mall and were turned away.

There were people allegedly without tickets that had camped out on the Mall all night long and taken the place of those with tickets. Security allowed the campers to stay and sent away those with tickets.

Student finds home for extra meal swipes at survival center

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

Jillian Duclos found herself with 80 meal swipes in mid-December of last year. Knowing that much food and money would go to waste could make any appetite vanish, so she gave them away.

Instead of a late-semester binge on drinks and snacks, she sent the food owed to charity – ordering and delivering 80 meals to the Amherst Survival Center.

Duclos, a junior, came up with the idea in the final weeks of the semester last month. She then contacted auxiliary services and spoke to Richard Callender, an employee at the Blue Wall. Callender and Duclos worked together to draft a plan for donating the meals.

"We decided that it would be best for me to order 80 grab-and-go type meals, which consisted of a sandwich, chips, a bottle of water, a cookie and fruit," said Duclos.

With the help of her friend Tom Borden, Duclos then brought the meals to the Amherst Survival Center.

"The faces of the volunteers and recipients lit up when we came through the door with the boxes of food. They seemed genuinely grateful for the donation," she said.

According to the University of Massachusetts Dining services, students have ordered large quantities of food items in the past. But this may be the first time a student has used the food as a donation on such a grand scale, said David Eichstaedt, senior manager of retail dining.

"Students might use the food to feed the kids on their residential hall floor or something to that effect. Sometimes kids order pizza or something to that nature, but usually in smaller quantities," he said.

Borden, a senior, said when Duclos first approached the Blue Wall, they suggested she use her remaining swipes to buy cases of drinks or snacks for herself.

"I was happy to see she was resolute and wanted to donate her remaining meals," said Borden. "Jill is a remarkable person with a great heart. Doing the right thing just comes natural to her."

Duclos was raised in a family that encouraged community service whenever possible. Once she came up with the idea to donate her remaining meal swipes, it seemed to her the obvious option.

"It is no secret that most hard-working families in the United States are struggling to put food on the table. Some of these families happen to live in Amherst. Everyone needs help at some point in their lives, and this was my way of providing the community with some relief," she said.

Borden said he hoped that Duclos' example would inspire others to follow in her footsteps, and that if he was still on the meal plan, he'd be donating his meals right alongside her.

The Blue Wall and UMass Dining Services were happy to assist with this donation, but said that it would be logistically impossible for everyone to repeat Duclos' act of charity.

"While I can appreciate what Jillian is trying to do, this is not something that we are set up to do on a regular basis," Eichstaedt said. "We don't normally prepare orders of this size to be taken off of the premises. Generally catering does an event like this, but they do not accept YCMP swipes."

An alternative route of donating meals might be reached through the forming of a student-run organization.

"I think a formal program would be a great idea," said Duclos. "I would love to help organize a program here at UMass. I do not know a lot about running community service projects, but if there are other people who do, I would like to collaborate with them."

"Everyone is able to make a difference in someone else's life, no matter how big or small. I would encourage everyone who is able to provide help to do," she said.

The Amherst Survival Center has been in operation since 1976. According to their Web site, "ASC is a nonprofit agency supported by contributions from many community friends. Most donations come from individual donors. Local grocers and businesses, community and religious groups, and individuals provide goods and services as well as financial support."

Tree crushes greenhouse

Hemlock inflicts severe and costly damages

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

High winds snapped a 70-foot hemlock tree and it flew, crashing into the University of Massachusetts greenhouse No. 2 at French Hall on Dec. 30. The tree's collision not only destroyed greenhouse No. 2, a 30-by-40-foot structure, but also damaged two other smaller 12-by-15 foot greenhouses.

According to greenhouse technician Jeffrey Anderson, the damage to these buildings is estimated to cost UMass "at least a couple of hundred thousand dollars" in demolition and cleanup of hazardous waste expenses along with the costs to reroute electrical and plumbing services.

Winds were estimated to have reached 48 miles per hour on campus, and the tree, with a diameter of at least two-and-a-half 2.5 feet split itself at a height of eight feet. No one was injured as a result of the tree's collapse, yet several problems for those who need the greenhouses have sprung up.

The greenhouses, which were built 95 years ago when French Hall was constructed, were declared safe for students and faculty to research and study within before the tree collapsed.

However, as is commonly found in old buildings, lead paint was used on the piping of the greenhouses.

UMass physical plant officials believe that hazardous waste such as asbestos may contaminate the air in the greenhouse during demolition. As a result, all three of the greenhouses are now boarded up and entering is prohibited.

Since greenhouse No. 2 was the main entrance and walkway students and staff used to get to the other greenhouses, people are finding it much more difficult to get to the other greenhouses.

"The traffic flow into and out of the greenhouses is one of our biggest problems now," said Anderson. "Getting people and supplies in and out of the greenhouses will be a problem until they get the temporary walkway up from French Hall to the greenhouses."

According to Anderson, UMass campus facility members intend to wait until the remnants of the buildings are cleared and then construct a covered walkway for people to walk safely through to the other greenhouses.

They are also looking at the possibility of putting up a temporary plastic greenhouse. Anderson believes the plastic greenhouse would only be temporary because of previous plans to build a new greenhouse by the greenhouse at UMass' Bowditch Hall.

In addition to problems traveling to and from each building, greenhouse technicians, students and staff have lost a significant amount of work space. Despite losing a large amount of foliage plant material used in classes, the greenhouse technicians believe they can divide up the plants they rescued and counteract the loss in donations as well.

"We did not get hurt as bad as we could have," said Anderson, referring to the loss of plant material.

D.C.'s crowds ready, hopeful for new term

the now-demilitarized Irish Republican Army, was among Neal's guests. Adams was in the United States for just one day to witness Obama's inauguration.

"Coming from Ireland, people are overjoyed that an African-American has been elected president," he said. "We hope he can deliver the kind of change people have voted for."

Ann Dunphy said she was moved by Obama's call for a new era of responsibility.

But, as it did for many of the people who attended, leaving the Mall turned out to be a much bigger production for the Dunphys than getting there. Hundreds of thousands of people patiently trooped from one closed-off exit to another for hours before they reached the nearest Metro stop.

The Dunphys had the good fortune to have reached their destination on Constitution Avenue just in time to see Barack and Michelle Obama at close range as they got into a car heading to the parade. The Churchill family of Amherst had much longer to go before resting. It took them nearly five hours to get from the Mall to Union Station, a trip that normally takes a matter of minutes, with a brief stop at the Smithsonian Natural History Museum.

Son Graham Churchill, 15, reminded the family "this is temporary" – which was "a very good perspective" on the crowds and delays, said his dad, Andy Churchill.

"I think it is the kind of thing where you feel like it was historic. It sure would have been nice to have history about 10 degrees warmer," he added.

Wearing socks on her hands to keep warm, Elaine Williams of Westfield, Mass., cries during President Barack Obama's inaugural address.

The day, a cold one for Washington, with the temperature in the 20s and a wind chill factor in the teens, began for many people at 4 a.m., and by 5 a.m., Metro stops were busy. The chants of "Yes, we can," in the Metro car brought tears to Sarah Bontempo's eyes when she arrived on Capitol Hill at about 6 a.m. Bontempo, an aide to Neal, had been working for months helping Neal's constituents get tickets and with arrangements.

"It was just like nothing we've ever seen," Bontempo said.

Thomas Tedone of Agawam, Brenda Lopez of Springfield and Joyce Tedone of Portland, Maine, were among the lucky 200 ticketholders, although 5,000 or more of Neal's constituents attempted to obtain them. They had planned so far ahead to attend Obama's inauguration, he hadn't even been elected yet.

Lopez, Thomas's girlfriend, also a Westfield State College student, met someone who'd forgotten gloves and gave her an extra pair that she had brought along, an action much in keeping with the day, which was marked, people said, by extraordinarily good manners all around.

A sizable contingent of Springfield residents attended Neal's reception, among them Myra Smith, who may have had the best Obama buttons at the inauguration.

Her niece Erin Washington, who lives in the D.C. area and is a Web tech specialist at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, is part Seminole Indian and part Muskogee Creek Nation of Oklahoma. She made the buttons using traditional Native American heading in a rosette pattern, and each one took her about four days to make. She made them in return for Smith getting tickets to the inauguration through Neal's office.

Denise Brown, of Springfield, was going to save her ticket for her grandchildren.

Attending the inauguration had been "a growing experience for us," Brown's daughter Wedashia Ray, of Maryland, said. "Not everyone is able to be here to have this opportunity."

Editor's Note: During his inauguration speech, President Barack Obama called Tuesday, Jan. 20 a defining moment for our generation, much like Sept. 11, 2001 or August 28, 2005 – when Hurricane Katrina hit Louisiana. With this in mind, we asked our staff and readers to contribute their thoughts and memories of the day on our website. The following is a sampling of the response. Visit the website for more

I remember talking to a friend in high school about our American History class, saying how we needed an F.D.R. to guide us through and redefine American spirit.

We both agreed it must have been wonderful to truly admire a leader like that.

Today I believe we have found that very soul who will help us change our Nation for the better. I may have Goosebumps because I have been moved, but I would like to think it is because in spirit I was on that green waving an American flag for the man I trust as our new leader of the Free World.

–Catherine Billmers

Normally I would wake for nothing before noon during winter break, but today was different. After scrounging through my pants which still lay next to my bed, I managed to pull out my cell phone. My voice still weak from the depths of sleep,

I greeted my step-father.

"Are you watching Obama?" he asked.

"Not yet."

"Well get going, he's being sworn in right now."

I said goodbye, lay there for a moment and I decided: Yes this was definitely worth getting up for.

My house is very old and consequentially very cold throughout the winter. As I huddled under a blanket for warmth watching the ceremony and speech, the pomp and circumstance of an entire nation, I debated whether my eyes were watery because I was so moved or because I was still tired. –Colin McDonald

We spent the entire wonderful/overwhelming/spectacular/tear-jerking/historic day standing in a rather snug (and windy-free) crowd of millions of people this morning in 27 degree weather, while our toes got almost completely frost hitten under three layers of socks, two pairs of pants, two long sleeve shirts, my dad's old school down vest and a ski jacket. The toes are fine now (after many a Jack Daniels shot and Irish car bombs. Have I mentioned how generous bartenders have been about this whole Obama thing?)

All that aside, I am completely overwhelmed with joy and happiness and that warm and fuzzy feeling you sometimes get. I'm still on the verge of tears, can't wait to share this story with the kids.

Fighters come back for kicks

Organization back in Valley, will provide forum for progress

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

Extreme Fighting International (EFI) plans to make its presence known at the University of Massachusetts this semester.

The organization was created in 2007 to give up-and-coming Mixed Martial Arts (MMA) fighters a chance to be seen in action and to make a reputation for themselves. After over a yearlong hiatus, the league has been revived and is back in action.

The organization is currently run by local MMA coach Keith Gordon and his student, UMass sophomore Michael Kittredge. Gordon's credentials include a Black belt in Japanese Jju-Jitsu, a Brown belt in Brazilian Jju-Jitsu and an extensive background in Kung Fu, Karate and kickboxing.

Both Gordon and Kittredge emphasized the need for an organization such as EFI to provide a hierarchical structure in which fighters can move up.

"Not every league [in Massachusetts] is organized, and the problem is that there's no real system," said Kittredge. "Each league is its own entity."

He said this creates a problem with the legitimacy of the leagues because of a lack of an organized hierarchy for fighters.

Kittredge also added that currently, most fighters who make it to the top venues, such as the Ultimate Fighting Championship (UFC) or the World Extreme Challenge (WEC), get there merely because of whom they know.

"There are some great fighters out there who aren't getting the chance to actually make it big time," he said.

Gordon added that some fighting venues are not organized enough to show up on a fighter's record.

"I've had guys fight in venues you can't even find on the Internet," said Gordon. "But, if you look up anyone who has fought in EFI, we're on their record."

Kittredge said he and Gordon are looking to create a system that allows fighters in New England to move up in the ranks as they win fights. They would eventually like to organize a tournament league that gives the best fighters in the area the chance to be seen and to move ahead in their careers, said Kittredge.

"We'd like to create at least one recognized entity that would promote these fighters and get them into the place where they'd like to be, which is ultimately the UFC," said Kittredge.

The idea for EFI came about in early 2007 when local MMA instructor Keith Gordon and one of his students, Louis Durkin, came up with the idea to start a MMA league in the Pioneer Valley to help promote local fighters.

EFI began by networking with other MMA schools, promoters and fighters to put on its shows. The organization also gathered well-known names in the MMA showcase to help strengthen the crowd's numbers.

"I had some pretty good MMA veterans come in for the first show," said Gordon. "Right off the bat I had a Pan American Jiu-Jitsu silver medalist, some state championship wrestlers, some experienced boxers and lots of different veterans from other organizations. We picked lots of big names."

One of the shows featured a fighter who later made it to the UFC, which is currently the top MMA league in the world.

EFI had four big shows in 2007. After the most recent show on Oct. 27, 2007, Gordon and Durkin decided to focus on other aspects of their lives, mainly their day jobs, after what Gordon described as "four solid shows and a lot of work."

Though the league was on hiatus, Gordon continued to receive good feedback from fans, whose opinions were voiced in favor of more shows.

"We got so many different e-mails from coaches in schools in New York, Connecticut and Massachusetts saying [I] should bring EFI back," said Gordon. "Everybody was talking about it. They liked the production of the show."

After training with Gordon for two years, Kittredge came up with the idea to help Gordon revive EFI.

"We were spending five days a week together training," said Kittredge, "and we got talking about how awesome it would be to actually get EFI going again."

In 2008, Kittredge agreed to help Gordon invest in future EFI shows.

"What we've done is jump-start the company back into working order, and we're throwing our next event at UMass," said Kittredge.

The event will be held on Saturday, April 11, at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Both Gordon and Kittredge are also hoping to start a MMA training facility in the Amherst area if EFI's reputation takes off again. The facility would have special rates catering to UMass students.

"It'll open up some doors for people who'd like to train in self defense in MMA," said Gordon. "I think UMass would provide a lot of interest from different student groups ... it would be great to get involved at an active school like UMass."

UMass' Parks marches in Rose parade

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

While most associated with the University of Massachusetts were working or resting over winter break, one faculty member was invited to California for one of the biggest honors in his field.

George N. Parks, UMass music professor and director of the Minuteman Marching Band, led the Bands of America Honor Band in the Tournament of Roses Parade prior to the Rose Bowl in Pasadena, Calif., on New Year's Day.

According to the UMass Office of News and Information, this was the second time the band, made up of more than 300 members from high schools around the nation, a 17-member dance troupe and a 32-member flag line, performed at the Tournament of Roses Parade. Parks said the band was first used in the parade in 2005, when he also was named the leader.

"It was a tremendous experience," Parks said in a telephone interview. "To be surrounded by so many great high school musicians ... and they really were phenomenal, it was an outstanding band ... that was a great thing."

Parks, who has been involved with Bands of America for more than 30 years, was joined by two colleagues from the flagship Thom Hannum and Michael Klesch. Hannum taught percussion and wrote some of the performance's music, and Klesch was the band's arranger.

Hannum and Klesch wrote an original medley of "Sesame Street" hit tunes and a number of other pieces.

For those who grow up playing sports, Parks said the ultimate goal is the Super Bowl or the Final Four. For lifelong band members, the Tournament of Roses Parade is as big as it gets.

"It was a wonderful band. I think anybody would love to be part of something like that," Parks said.

Pete Fitzgerald, a UMass senior and Minutemen Marching Band member said, "It's an absolute honor [for Parks] to get anything like that ... especially something that is recognized not only nationally but worldwide ... He has a great reputation with Bands of America, and they know how amazing he is and how inspiring he can be to anyone within any short amount of time," he added.

Fitzgerald, a senior and history major, plays the euphonium, a tenor-voiced, brass instrument similar in appearance to a tuba. He auditioned for the Bands of America Honor Band during his junior year of high school and marched in the parade in 2005. He said he has known Parks for seven years.

UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said Parks' selection is great for the University.

"Any time George does something like this, it raises the profile of the University nationally," he said. "People not only know about it here, but across the country it gets noted when he gets involved in activities like this. It just speaks very highly of UMass and what it has to offer."

In 2006, Parks was inducted into the Bands of America Hall of Fame. Located in Indianapolis the hall of fame recognizes those who have impacted the country's band activity, music education and Bands of America.

Parks is now in his 32nd year as the Minuteman Marching Band's director, having taken the job when he was 24. He earned his bachelor's degree from West Chester University (Penn.) in 1976 and his master's from Northwestern University in 1977. Under his leadership, the band was awarded the Sudier Trophy in 1998 as one of the nation's top bands.

Each summer, more than 3,000 students from almost every state in the country attend Parks' Band Leadership Training Seminar and Drum Major Academy, which trains thousands of high school drum majors. He is also a recipient of the Massachusetts Conductor of the Year Award and has been inducted in to the Massachusetts Instrumental Conductor's Association Hall of Fame.

At UMass, Parks has received the Distinguished Teaching Award, the Chancellor's Medal for distinguished service and was also named an honorary alumnus.

Founded in 1975, Bands of America is a nonprofit organization that promotes high school music education and puts together regional and national marching bands competitions.

After the arrest: BASICS and options

By Chris Russell
Collegian Staff

On Dec. 12, University of Massachusetts sophomores Andrew McCarthy and Joshua McGowan were arraigned in Eastern Hampshire District Court for the underage possession of alcohol.

According to court documents, both were arrested in Parking Lot 44 of the UMass campus the night before, after police spotted McGowan drinking a Busch Light beer, and McCarthy was observed putting a 30 pack of Keystone Light beer into the trunk of a car.

The two were arraigned separately with each lasting about five minutes. Both McCarthy and McGowan elected to waive their right to counsel and a trial, and agreed to attend the West County Diversion Program.

The West County Diversion Program is a court-sanctioned alcohol rehabilitation program. Many of those arrested for underage possession of alcohol choose this option because if they successfully complete the program, their charges will be dismissed. Conversely, if they did choose to go to trial, they could be convicted, and have a criminal record.

Many UMass students find themselves in such a position every year.

According to the UMass Police Department, 245 people were arrested on the UMass campus in 2007 for liquor law violations, which includes underage possession of alcohol, while the Amherst Police arrested 429 people for underage possession of alcohol alone last year, according to the Amherst town Web site.

Many of those charged elect to the West County Diversion Program, which Craig Hilliker – a senior consultant at West County – describes as a "program to divert kids from the potential for a conviction."

Hilliker explained that those in the program undergo two four-hour sessions and one six-hour session, in which the dangers of excessive alcohol consumption are stressed.

He added that the court views West County as an "education option" rather than a "prosecution option."

"The court feels like they need to give kids education before they decide to put them in jail," said Hilliker. "They want to give the kid the opportunity to figure out how not to make the same mistake again."

According to Hilliker, once someone completes the program, the charges for underage possession of alcohol will be dropped, although their record will still show that they were originally arrested. If a person is arrested for underage possession of alcohol a second time, they cannot go back to the West County program.

"The court feels like they have exhausted their education option if a second arrest is made," Hilliker said. "At that point the person is put on more of a prosecution track."

Many UMass students who are arrested for underage possession of alcohol also go through the University's own alcohol rehabilitation program, called BASICS, or Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students.

According to Marisa Hebble, a counselor in the program, BASICS consists of two 50-minute sessions in which the student completes a questionnaire that shows how their drinking compares to other UMass students to see if their drinking habits pose a serious health risk and discusses these findings with a counselor. A fee of $100 is charged to take BASICS for the first time and $175 for the second.

Hebble explained that the goal of the BASICS program is not to eliminate college drinking, but rather to reduce the negative outcomes associated with high-risk drinking.

"If a student comes in here having 10 hangovers a month and after their first session they only have six hangovers a month, that's the kind of harm reduction we're talking about," said Hebble.

UMass sophomore Benjamin Moriarty had to attend BASICS twice in his freshman year and had a different opinion.

"It didn't teach me anything I didn't already know," Moriarty said. "I guess if someone has a serious drinking problem, it could be helpful. I'm not one of those kids though, so for me it was just a big waste of time. The thing that made me really mad though was that I had to pay $275."

Into the deep: Holden probes the Pacific

By Angela Hilsman
Collegian Staff

Situated in a submarine 1.4 miles below the Pacific Ocean's surface, a University of Massachusetts professor recently attempted to understand life forms that existed 3 billion years ago.

James Holden, an assistant professor in the Microbiology Department, traveled through the Pacific with 23 scientists and 30 crew members on the research vessel Atlantis. Holden and his team of students, professors and researchers spent time on the submarine Alvin studying organisms living around the "black smokers" found on the ocean floor. Since the discovery of these volcanic vents approximately 30 years ago, the microbes surrounding them have been of interest to microbiologists such as Holden.

Before this time, it was believed that life could not be sustained without sunlight. In the three-week study, Holden and his team collected around 300 samples that defy previous notions.

James Holden, chief scientist of the project.

"When life at deep-sea vents was discovered in 1977, it completely changed our understanding of how life is supported," Holden said. "The discovery of life at the bottom of oceans that don't require photosynthesis or products from photosynthesis, like oxygen, and feed entirely off of gases and minerals from geothermal environments changed our outlook on the possibility of life beyond Earth."

"One can imagine that if water and volcanoes co-exist, here or elsewhere, then the ingredients and energy necessary to support life may also exist," he added.

Understanding different conditions for life opens the possibilities for life in unexpected environments, especially on the moon of recent interest, Europa, one of Jupiter's satellites that is believed to store oceans below its icy surface. Holden also explained that Mars once had oceans over its mountainous terrain, and may have, at one point, supported life as well.

Hovering above the ocean floor, Holden and the other scientists studied the hyperthermophiles, or microorganisms that thrive at the extreme temperatures provided by the volcanic vents.

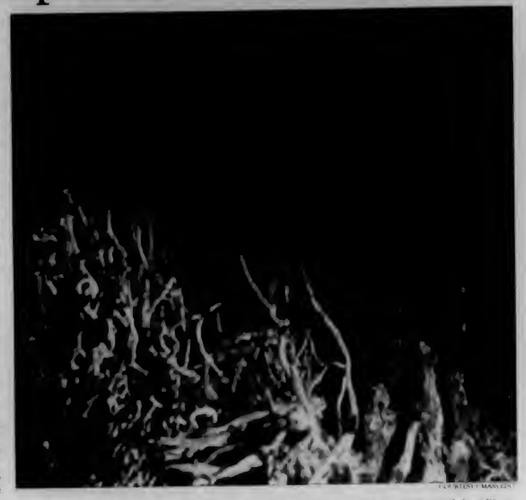
They collected rock, fluid and animal samples "to understand the relationship between [these] microorganisms and the chemistry of the environment," Holden said.

The team worked 24/7 for three weeks "to determine how nature dictates what kinds of life can exist where."

He added that these microorganisms produce hydrogen as a byproduct, a fuel that has potential to be bred as an alternative energy source.

Holden worked as chief scientist of his project onboard the submarine. Although Holden says there were low points during the trip, such as repeated technical difficulties with a piece of the experimental equipment and poor weather, he enjoyed working with his team and the ship's crew.

"We worked well together, respected each other's goals, and tried our best to ensure each other's success. They made my job much easier," he said.



Holden became interested in microbiology during his freshman year of college in 1984 at the University of Washington in Seattle. When he took Oceanography 101, black smokers had just recently been discovered.

After his first oceanographic research cruise to the Arctic in 1987, Holden switched from his previously declared architecture major to microbiology. Since then, Holden has been studying microbes.

"The experience is incredible," said Holden. "It's like taking a journey to another world."

"We had a very successful cruise and accomplished our main objectives," he added, recalling his recent trip, "and while the cruise was intense and stressful, we had a blast. It's hard to top a trip to active volcanoes at the bottom of the sea."

Funding an issue for UM biodiesel plant

By Kat Manser
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has ambitions to build the largest biodiesel plant in the New England region, however funding is an issue.

The plans depend on whether or not the University receives a $400,000 grant from the Massachusetts Technology Collaborative, which is the state's development agency for renewable energy that supports the use of wind, solar and other energy sources. The funds would help finance the $850,000 total construction cost of the plant.

According to the National Biodiesel Board, biodiesel is the name for an alternative fuel that burns cleanly and contains no petroleum.

Biodiesel is created by a chemical process that separates fat or vegetable oil into glycerin (found in soap and other products) and biodiesel. The resulting clean burning fuel is nontoxic and biodegradable, as well as renewable.

The National Biodiesel Board claims these traits make it better for the environment and beneficial for the U.S. economy because it can be produced from domestic renewable sources such as soybeans.

Therefore it "decreases our dependence on foreign oil and contributes to our own economy," the Board says.

They also state that, "biodiesel is the only alternative fuel to have fully completed the health effects testing requirements of the 1990 Clean Air Act Amendments," and that biodiesel fuel can be used in any diesel engine, with little to no modification.

The University's own biodiesel plant would produce 600,000 gallons of biodiesel fuel each year, using recycled vegetable oil from institutionalized kitchens, according to a University statement. The plant would be housed in the campus' current Central Heating Plant.

In a December 2008 interview with The Daily Hampshire Gazette, William C. Conner Jr., a UMass chemical engineering professor involved in securing the grant, explained that the plant would allow experimentation with more innovative ways to turn cooking and other waste oils into biofuels. Conner said that the Five Colleges would provide waste oil to the plant, and then would be able to use the biodiesel in their diesel engines.

Conner also noted that several prominent politicians, such as U.S. Senator John F. Kerry, and Rep. John W. Olver, have supported the idea of the plant through letters written to the Massachusetts Technology Collaborative.

According to The Gazette, Olver wrote, "The University of Massachusetts at Amherst facility will offer local universities and state agencies an opportunity to engage in a regional effort to establish western Massachusetts as a hub for the development of renewable fuels."

In addition to his comments regarding the plant's research benefits, Conner said the plant "could save the Five Colleges money in fuel costs and oil waste disposal."

If the $400,000 grant is secured, he added, the plant could be fully operational by September 2009.

Too much trust in the new boss

John Glaser

"Only government can provide the short-term boost necessary to lift us from a recession this deep and severe," President Barack Obama said recently. "Only government can break the vicious cycles that are crippling our economy."

Such are the words of a naïve power-seeker. More precisely, though, it is government that has caused the recession and government that facilitates vicious cycles. This newest fiscal stimulus devised by Obama and his team will not only be ineffective – it is aimed at the wrong parts of the economy, ignoring the root causes of this crisis.

The plan is primarily aimed at job creation, but since when is magic job creation a power of government? The government has no wealth (in fact, it is broke.) All it can do to try and create jobs is take the wealth that the private sector creates and forcefully redistribute it wherever it sees fit. That's not job creation. That's job reallocation.

The plan offers a $3,000 tax credit to businesses for each new job created. A similar provision was enacted in a 1978 stimulus, but a report from the Department of Labor's Inspector General during the Clinton Administration urged Congress to discontinue it because 92 percent of those hired under the program would have been hired anyway. All those expensive tax credits had to be stolen from people's paychecks for these businesses that were just getting free money.

It's also very difficult to avoid having businesses cheat the system. Many will undoubtedly lay people off and rehire them once the plan is in place, just to get the credit. It could even delay real job creation, because what business would hire workers next week, when if they just wait a few months, they will get free money for it?

Lastly, the sectors of the economy in which Obama wants to create jobs do not happen to be the same sectors that are suffering from unemployment. Incentivizing businesses to hire people for, say, solar panels is not very productive since those jobs will be filled by scientists and engineers, people who already have jobs and are among the least likely to lose them.

Another pillar of this hopeless stimulus is to induce more consumer spending and loosen credit markets; two things this economy has too much of already. Americans now have more debt than ever and barely anyone lives within their means. What we need is less spending and more saving, less credit and more thrift. This sort of "stimulus" will only encourage more of what got us here and ultimately postpone a real crash in the future.

We have welcomed each new sweep of corporatism, waste and profligacy with barely a hint of our former reluctance.

Forty percent of this stimulus ($300 billion) is focused on tax breaks, without, of course, cutting spending. What does this mean? It means that whatever we can't borrow from China and Japan will have to be printed by the Federal Reserve. Increasing the money supply only causes inflation and harms our economy by making everything – food, energy, education, health care – more expensive, while simultaneously redistributing wealth to the already wealthy.

The government is about $10 trillion dollars in debt and has already spent trillions on previous stimuli and bailouts for corporate losers, all of which have been utterly futile. All of this has done nothing but increase our debt and contaminate our economy further.

Actually, once you include all contingent liabilities the government has committed to in the future (like Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, etc.) the national debt is more like $50 trillion. That means that every American has an implicit financial obligation of over $175,000 each. We're born into debt.

The aim of this program is entirely misdirected. It addresses none of the underlying problems in our system. Like trying to cultivate our tree by watering the branches, the government is focusing in vain on consequential aspects of our economy, ignoring the problems at the roots like Federal Reserve policy, personal savings and investment, trade deficits, et al.

Is another misdirected $800 billion stimulus really what America needs right now? General Motors, AIG, Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, Bear Stearns, Washington Mutual, Citigroup, Merrill Lynch, Bank of America, billions of dollars in rebates and trillions more on deficit-spending stimuli. Are we buying our way out of economic collapse, or are we simply paying for tyranny?

The bigger government gets, the less accountable it becomes. And when the belief that despots and demagogues represent our approaching salvation into peace and prosperity splinters into the blasphemous truth that they lead us only into more war and destitution, the few who choose dissent over acquiescence will have their recognition all too late.

The first bailout late last year brought discord, caution and bewilderment. Since then, we have welcomed each new sweep of corporatism, waste and profligacy with barely a hint of our former reluctance, despite how faillingly government efforts have proved thus far.

Americans embrace Barack Obama and his new regime perhaps more than any since FDR. Indeed, the people of a democracy are frequently captivated by statesmen haranguers and prophetic democrats, but when the entire world is behind one man, it is exactly the time to stand in front of him and object.

Winter break: Amherst without students

Evan Haddad

At this time of the year, densely packed snow mounds loom over many of Amherst's corners and streets. Plows grind and scrape the fleecy roads through the night. Salt and sand trucks spew forth their grainy substances onto the desolate streets, preparing the ways for tomorrow.

Through the morning and afternoon, bundled residents maneuver their children and themselves in and out of the icy alleyways off North Pleasant Street, tramping through brown slush and sleety paths. Whether it's going to church, or to browse the illuminated shop windows of The Toy Box or better still, to munch a leg of caribou at Baku's African Restaurant, the winter break does not slow down these folks – and why should it? Thousands of students flock like Canadian Geese to Amherst each semester to partake in their share of the college revelries. But how many have stayed long enough to know the town itself, the people who live here, work here, and the people who just "hang out" here?

Having spent a solid four weeks of the break in close quarters with my Russian girlfriend in Amherst, I'm even beginning to wonder which category I belong to, and what business a jobless student has in this town when there's nothing to learn besides the complex formulas of the PVTA bus schedules.

When school is in session, it is easy to forget that Amherst is a town like any other, with a Design Review Board, a Finance Committee and a Board of Health. There is a detailed Web site loaded with information, ranging from town government matters to community development. Amherst even has its own TV station, channel 17, where, from 8 a.m to 6 p.m. most weekdays, the dutiful patrons of this town broadcast back-to-back recordings of the Select Board, which run about 3 hours, 20 minutes long.

As the students of the five colleges pack their bags around those two exciting times of the year and slip out of the Pioneer Valley by hook or by crook, the town they leave behind reveals its true color. But one thing is certain: No matter how much the students of UMass and Amherst College may temporarily nurse themselves upon the cheap-chow and coffee joints of these parts, the fact of the matter is, those people and places remain when the students do not.

As the students of the five colleges pack their bags ... the town they leave behind reveals its true color.

This past month, I admit that on certain afternoons when I walked through town or rode the bus to Big-Y, and a scraggly old man happened to remark to everyone that he intended to fully realize the provisions of Question 2, and that it was only after he was governor of Massachusetts that he could do this effectively. I was pricked by a thorn of guilt, feeling as if my peers and I were somehow to blame for this madness. Does anyone else remember the James Brown imitator with the cape and kazoo?

And of course, there are always the homeless. There are few things which will shake up a person more than the scene of a man, dirty and worn through by the elements, who shakes that plastic Starbucks cup so mournfully. During the year, we often pass them by without notice. During the long weeks of the winter holiday, however, it is much more difficult to turn away from these people. We do not have the same feeling of security in our position as students. We do not have so many social occasions or distractions.

Once again on the bus, I took notice of two men sitting together. One of them, asleep, held a tattered backpack and his head bounced against the glass as the bus rumbled up Amity Street. The other one just looked tired and stared out the window. When these two guys got off, it suddenly hit me: the only people living in Amherst during school recess are the people who can't leave. Though Amherst is known far and wide as a "college town," it seems during these strange weeks in January like a temporary association.

But of course, not every student feels this way. I ran into a classmate on the street who simply gushed with praise for the serenity and peaceful repose that Amherst offers this time of year. I couldn't argue with her there. If you have ever taken the time to explore the more distant regions of Amherst, or the Robert Frost Trail, you know what I mean.

As spring semester begins, I admit that I look forward to the return of order and deadlines. Strangely enough, I've found it isn't so easy doing nothing. After a few weeks things will have fallen into place, the order restored, and then I will feel more at ease in the Pioneer Valley.

Ironically, it seems it is college chaos which quells the weird and obscure scenes of this little town. Perhaps it is only then that the girl behind the counter will seem a little less loud and annoying, and again we will be refreshed by the organ-grinder and his sleepy songs.

On US Airways, Hudson river heroics

Matt Kushi

What defines a hero? It is a question that many ask everyday in a world that seems so starved for heroes. We shouldn't be starved for heroes as they are around us everyday. We just don't notice them all the time.

Due to popular culture, we have tended to have high expectations toward who can be a hero. To many of us, a hero is a Superman-esque figure who risks his life time after time to eliminate the evils of the world.

Our standards for heroes are too high. Everyone has their own definition of what a hero is to them. For many, it's the bold and courageous troops of our military overseas. For others, it's a police officer or fireman who puts their life on the line in order to save and protect others.

A hero can be anyone. A hero can be your own mother and father. A hero can be that friend who doesn't succumb to the pressures of conformity. A hero is someone who deals with adversity. A hero is someone who can inspire all.

In the light of the historic Inauguration of President Barack Obama on January 20, there is another story that deals with a hero. On Thursday, January 15, an incident took place over the airways of New York in what has come to be known as "the Miracle on the Hudson".

On this Thursday afternoon, US Airways Flight 1549 was set to make its last run of the day from LaGuardia Airport in New York to Charlotte, N.C. Moments after impact, the plane flew into a flock of geese and the engines instantly cut out as the geese were sucked into the engine vent.

At this point the head pilot took over from his co-pilot. The head pilot, Chesley B. Sullenberger III, had minutes to analyze the situation. With his aircraft dead in the air, going back to LaGuardia was out of the question, as he risked flying into a building with no power. Getting to Teterboro Airport in New Jersey was a stretch due to the distance.

The option that was the lowest risk was to do a dead stick landing into the frigid waters of the Hudson River. For those of you not familiar with aviation jargon, a dead stick landing is when a plane lands, or is forced to land, with the engines cut out.

While this operation is what shuttles do when they land from space, airplanes don't usually do dead-stick landings unless the engine has died in flight or a plane is trying to muffle its engine while landing, say in a time of war.

Our standards for heroes are too high. Everyone has their own definition of what a hero is to them.

A dead-stick landing is far from easy. The name comes, basically, from what it is. All of the power is gone from your aircraft and you guide it with the 'stick,' or wheel. If you don't hold the plane at the angle that you need, there is really not much that you can do to correct it. You are essentially flying a 'dead' aircraft, and maneuvering mistakes can be costly.

A dead-stick landing can be simulated in a car, though it is not recommended. If you are in a parking lot and your engine dies, or your car turns off while you are moving for any other reason, you can park with precision with no power in your car.

As Sullenberger guided the plane into the river, he had to make sure he landed it just right. The descent had to be a gradual one. If he nosed over too fast, the plane would not only gain speed and plow into the river at a high rate of speed. It would sink quickly.

He couldn't go into the river with the wings at an angle or else the plane would flip on impact and sink.

He couldn't ease the nose up too much or else he would stall and the tail would hit the water and sink.

All of the above would have meant a high fatality rate, as the Potomac River crash in 1982 involving Air Florida did.

Sullenberger needed to land the plane on a gradual descent and belly slide into the water with the nose slightly up. He did this successfully. He also managed to land close to rescue boats. All 155 passengers made it off of the plane with the aid of the heroic flight attendants.

Before leaving the plane, Sullenberger twice checked his flooding plane to make sure that everyone was out of the plane.

Now, that is a hero. Heroes are ordinary people who do extraordinary things. Chesley B. Sullenberger III is a hero because he saved people's lives. He inspired people by doing the right and rational thing.

Sullenberger was not trying to be a hero that day. The thought of Superman more than likely never entered his mind. But for one day, Chesley B. Sullenberger III was Superman to the passengers on board of US Airways Flight 1549.

Handing out the '08 award

Ted Rogers

Given that we're finally in a new year, it's awards season. Everybody gets one. Time's person of the year? Barack Obama. Best supporting actor? My money is on Heath Ledger. To tell the truth, you deserve one, too. It's with a sense of humility and honor that I would like to present you with Ted's Worst Person of 2008 award.

Please, don't thank me. You earned it. Well, not just you in particular. This award goes out to every American citizen who made this award possible.

You first came into consideration by electing Barack Obama. While I'm the first to admit that the guy seems very intelligent and charming, I'll also concede that, at best, he's an empty suit. Senator Obama's campaign ran on two things: he's not George Bush, and "change". So far, the world is pretty unsure of what he will do as president. That has not stopped you, however, from believing that he will bring peace to the Middle East, turn this recession around, legalize pot and gay marriage, and personally make you a couple inches taller.

Your unrealistic expectations as to what he will do as president played a part in setting you up for this award. And in an interesting digression, Bush ran on "bringing dignity back to the White House." How's that for change?

You also did your part to earn this award by proudly claiming this is a bold new step for race in America. While there were many good reasons to vote Obama into office, I'm sure that more than a few of you thought that voting for a biracial guy who was raised by white folks meant that you could stop thinking about racial inequalities. Every time you thought that voting for a half white guy to the highest office in the land meant ending five centuries' worth of racism in America, it brought you a little closer to this prestigious award.

But don't worry, you deserve this award for more than just voting for Obama. Let's talk about money.

You also deserve the Worst of '08 Award because of your ideas about money. Without hyperbole, this year proved that you have the economic smarts of a spider monkey. In the wake of 9-11, George Bush told us that it was your sole patriotic duty to go out and buy something. Without reservation or question, you proceeded to buy stuff that you didn't need with money that you didn't have; and yet, you were shocked when the economy tanked.

This award goes out to every American citizen who made this award possible.

Please, don't try to say "predatory lenders" really earned this award. Offering dangerous loans is only profitable when people look at them and don't think, "Huh, this loan seems too good to be true."

And, let's not forget the big three automaker bailout you like to complain about. Every time you shake your head in disgust over the fact that Ford, Chrysler and General Motors get $25 billion for making terrible cars, you're forgetting something. What American automakers don't pay for in developing green technologies or even making decent cars, they make up for by giving huge sums of money to Congress. Take the time now to pat yourself on the back for electing greedy Congressmen who will do anything to stay in a lobbyist's good graces. As for the big bailout, it's the same deal on a bigger scale.

You might be a little confused at this point. You might be saying, "What about Sarah Palin? Didn't she have little experience, little curiosity about the world, and a mean streak to boot?" "Or how about Joe the Plumber? He lied about his taxes, knows nothing about foreign policy, and yet thinks everyone should listen to him." Well, here's the sad part – you deserved them.

The Republican Party may be inept at governing, but they aren't stupid when it comes to electioneering. Palin and Joe the Plumber were nothing more than cynical attempts to make the average American identify with the Republican Party.

OK, I think I can come clean now. I'm mostly kidding in this column.

You, the average American, are not contributing to America's failings as much as the lobbyists, the politicians or anyone else in the news these days. But there are some rather large grains of truth in what I'm saying.

We are blessed enough to live in a country with a huge amount of freedom to pick our futures. The flipside of this is that we need to realize that we're accountable for what we choose and what we do. # For break, stay off the sofa

I did a lot this break. I fed the homeless on Christmas, sharing with them my Christmas spirit. I also volunteered in the inner city, teaching young kids how to multiply numbers together because it's fun to multiply numbers together, and they're going to need to know how to do that to pass their MCAS tests. Finally, I went up to Canada to stop people from shooting wolves from helicopters.

And then I realized that I actually had not done any of those things; but rather, I spent my vacation watching countless episodes of House, playing video games with my friends, and then trying to convince myself that people on Xbox Live were actually my friends.

To be honest, I feel kind of bad about it. I feel like I wasted several weeks of my life, and I'm quite sure I did, unless sometime in my life I am able to help diagnose someone with Wilson's disease by noticing Kayser-Fleischer rings around their irises – or something else I learned from House. In fact, I have nothing to show for my entire vacation. If, on the contrary, I had actually done something, I could have helped someone, and I could have had something to show.

During winter break, while you all were sleeping and not even thinking about the University (unless you're one of those kids), UMass was honored by the independent Carnegie Foundation for being a Community-Engaged University. This award is not only given for community service projects in the University's curriculum through classes, but also regarding other areas of involvement in the community, like the low-priced psychological services center at UMass and the Hull Wind Project – which helps utilize clean energy wind resources for the community.

Being given this award allows all who attend and have attended UMass to have a sense of pride for this achievement. But by taking this in and not reflecting on what more we could possibly do, we would be ungrateful jerks, at best.

By taking this in and not reflecting on what more we could possibly do, we would be ungrateful jerks, at best.

While finishing up our vacation, most of us watched Barack Obama be sworn in as president. Most of us here at this liberal university also deeply supported him because it is believed he will bring a positive change to this country. The only problem is if you think he can make this change by himself, you are sadly mistaken, or sadly naive.

The good thing is, he knows how to. For instance, President Obama has sworn to expand AmeriCorps and the Peace Corps, as well as coming up with the Opportunity Tax Credit, which will allow college to be more affordable in exchange for community service. Obama, like the great John Fitzgerald Kennedy, has realized that community service, and service to your fellow human being, is vitally important. And for us, it is vitally important for change and for the greater good.

Here at this university, we have been given a wonderful chance to succeed in our careers and future because of our education. But more than that, we have been given the wonderful opportunity to engage ourselves in the community, to help those who need it, and to be active participants in change.

As students, it is not that hard to find time to escape from the work and studying of school to participate in a variety of activities like intramurals, getting drunk and, thanks to the liberals of Massachusetts, smoking marijuana without any real repercussions. But it is time, as citizens and voters who were so apt to get rid of George W. Bush and to change our country, to actually change.

A few hours of volunteering in the community when you are able to instead of watching television not only goes a long way for others, but it might actually make yourself believe you want the country to change for the better, and that you actually do care about the people and things that need help.

Anyone can say they want a change in their country. But if you aren't going to help out, then you're as good as a burned bush. I'm just glad I didn't vote for the candidate of change and voted for Nader. I hope to see you suckers planting some trees around town.

Finding work takes action

With our economy in decline it can be pretty frightening for graduating seniors entering their last semester. Applying for jobs in a market where jobs are quickly disappearing gets pretty daunting, especially with how quickly the spring semester usually flies by. If you're not sticking around for graduate school, its time to dress up your résumé, pound out some cover letters, and hit the ground running, because your pesky school loans will catch up to you almost as soon as your graduation cap falls back to Earth.

Adam McGillen

President Barack Obama has made some big promises about fixing the economy, yet he has already rescinded some of the plans he proposed during the election. If there is any one thing Obama has said that can truly be trusted in the infancy of his Presidency, it is that "we must pick ourselves up."

I am not counting on Obama to create a job just for me, and neither should you. So, for those seniors like me, getting ready to graduate in May, there is no better time than now to start your career search, and I've compiled some strategies to help you land a steady income after graduation in the midst of a failing economy.

First and foremost, slacken your grasp on the hope of getting your dream job. For most of us, we have some idea of our ideal job, and we'd like to get started right after graduation. But that hope is unrealistic, especially in a market where getting any job is a challenge. This doesn't mean you should give up your dream. By all means, if you know the perfect job for you, apply for it, but don't hold out for that one position. Pursue a lot of different avenues outside of your ideal career. A degree is good, but most dream jobs will want you to have some other professional experience before they will take you in.

Internships have the appeal of getting you experience while you are still in school, but they aren't just for students. If you have your eyes set on a specific field, but job openings seem pretty sparse right now, look for internships – even if they are unpaid. Getting involved in the career of your choice is always a plus. You may not get a paycheck to start, but internships often open up doors to higher paying positions later and they'll allow you to network with people in your field. Settling for an internship may land you that dream job earlier than you expect.

I am not counting on Obama to create a job just for me, and neither should you.

It is also important to be flexible on where you would like to work. Some people have a specific city or state in mind as a place they would love to live and work, but attaching yourself to one place will inhibit your chances of starting a career after graduation. Open yourself up to different areas. Try to ignore the location entirely when looking at lists of job openings. Apply to job openings regardless of their location. You may find that places you never thought of are hot-spots for the type of career you may be looking to get into. Once offers start coming back to you, it's time to seriously consider the possibility of moving. You can always say no to a job offer if you come to realize that relocating is not an option for you.

Relocating back to your parent's house can sometimes be the biggest hindrance in starting a career. Beware complacency. Returning to mom's home-cooked meals and spending whole days on the couch can often send someone into a spiraling regression to the lazy days of old. College is a great way to learn independence, but after graduation it seems all too easy to fall back to a childish dependence on one's parents. Do what you can to cut-back on rent and other expenses, but don't get complacent in the care of your parents. Long periods of unexplained unemployment do not look appealing on a resume.

Finally, don't let up on prospective employers. The application process doesn't end with the submission of your application. Call in and ask about the status of your application. Stop in and speak to management. Unfortunately a lot of companies will accept your application and then never call you back. You may feel a bit intrusive, but showing an interest in a job is never a negative thing. Better to call and hear an employer say "no thank you" outright than to live in limbo waiting for a call-back that may never come. By no means hound prospective employers, but stay on them and make sure they remember you.

If this is your last semester, good luck polishing off that résumé with a degree. If you haven't already, take some time in the coming weeks to head down to Career Services and get some advice specific to your goals and desires. Remain flexible and you will find it's easier to bend down, snag those bootstraps and pick yourself up, even with the economy collapsing around you.

Job market still has options

Eli Gottlieb

Well, you go away for one lousy month and everything passes you by. The United States of America has a new President to complain about and a whole bloody war happens that I absolutely refuse to speak or write about on grounds that if I'm going to spend an entire column refuting B.S. spouted by hippies I'll have the courtesy to let the hippies go first. Oh, and we're pretty officially in an economic recession.

Now what can we do about that last one, while our new President gets on with the business of building the Third Temple (assuming he's the messiah everyone thinks he is)? After all, this year's seniors and super-seniors have to face the job market in this. Luckily, two fairly well-known institutions of our lives come to the rescue: grad school and internships.

College students, after all, are incredibly cheap yet often at least somewhat educated labor.

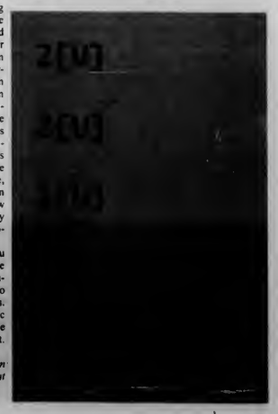
Firstly, graduate schools. Most of the time, they allow one to defer paying off student loans, and a master's degree makes one far more qualified for a high-paying job. Someone who really needed to break into the business world, for example, because they majored in something utterly useless, could even go for a Master's in Business Administration to try to qualify himself to manage people more economically useful than themselves. Or perhaps a degree in science or engineering might help a bit more, given Obama's promise to restore science's place in American society. After all, that entire pronosed infrastructure won't build itself.

The country could use more engineers capable of telling them what to build, where to build it, and how economical it will be to build. Also, grad school gives you an opportunity to win entry to a prestigious university that would have rejected you for college admission back in your senior year of high school, thereby "upgrading" your resume. Of course, that assumes you got good grades here at UMass, but then again if you didn't what was the point?

Secondly, current students can seek internships. Now, you would think that in a bad job market internships would evaporate like puddles in summer (or at least what passes for summer in the Northeast,) but as a matter of fact they will not. College students, after all, are incredibly cheap yet often at least somewhat educated labor.

As firms lay off their older, more privileged employees with benefits that have or are about to vest, we college students can look forward to a lot of spots opening up for an enterprising young person who can live on pizza and doesn't have a family to feed.

Of course, this all might seem a bit predatory. For those of us who prefer to make a living without preying on our fellows, there's always accommodated volunteer work. Plenty of organizations have programs aimed at allowing young people, in or just out of college, to do important volunteer work for a mere living wage. Teach for America already recruits on the UMass campus, and my brother has received mailings from the Peace Corps. Actually, I recall an Obama proposal to give a $4,000 tax cut to any college student who does "national service," whatever that is.



People need to look out for each other at times like these, and I say that a warm bed and three square meals a day in exchange for an honest day's work sounds like good compensation when many people will soon lack those things. I myself am looking into ways to spend a semester on living-wage volunteering to help save up money if UMass tuition goes too high.

Actually, those Peace Corps mailings actually offer at least two different ways to combine graduate school with service in the Peace Corps.

Finally, for those of my own scientific, engineering or computing ilk, I have a word of advice: consider starting your own business. If you can actually make something that people actually need and sell it for a fair price on the free market, you can do quite well in a time when our economy is quickly burning through its fat reserves while helping to shore up the country's economic muscle. In computing, nearly all the major firms got their start as someone's little business idea. Microsoft, Google, Yahoo, Dell and Apple all began as ideas in the head of a few smart people who thought they could do something that established firms could not.

So I suppose that, when you look hard enough, even these bad times come full of opportunity for a young person willing to work hard and take a few risks. Or perhaps I'm overly optimistic and we'll all be slaves to the Chinese for decades due to debt. Time will tell.

ARTS & LIVING

Brad Pitt and Cate Blanchet star in "The Curious Case of Benjamin Button." The film has been nominated for 13 Oscars including best picture.

'Benjamin Button' a curious Oscar pick

By Kevin Koczwara
Collegian Staff

David Fincher tackles a literary giant with "The Curious Case of Benjamin Button." The only problem is that he and screenwriter Eric Roth ("Forest Gump") decided to take many liberties with F. Scott Fitzgerald's short story, creating a sweeping and epic love story, rather than a story of one man's struggle and history.

But Fincher does reach into the depths of love and what people will do for and because of love. With many computer gimmicks and above-par acting Fincher creates the life of one man searching for love. Button learns the lessons of life in the middle of the 20th century.

Benjamin Button ages in reverse. He is born into an alien-like form, with ailments that come with an aging body. It is masterful special effects from the former George Lucas protégé, Fincher, as the audience sees Benjamin age.

The key to that makes the aging process feel more real is that Brad Pitt's eyes are imposed on each actor that plays Button throughout his life, giving an authentic feeling to the character.

The narrative of the film starts in a New Orleans hospital room as Hurricane Katrina roars outside, imminent disaster peers around the corner. A mother reveals to her daughter the story of her love for one man, through the reading of his diary. It is one of the updates done to the short story that strengthens the movie, unlike the addition of Roth's reoccurring image of the hummingbird.

The reading of the journal allows the audience to piece the story together, and works as a sounding board for their own emotions and questions. As Julia Ormond ("Inland Empire" "I Know Who Killed Me") tells her dying mother the audience will get some consolation in seeing that even people in this fairytale have a hard time believing that the story is true.

Benjamin encounters many of life's lessons in unusual circumstances due to his older appearance. He can buy a drink or a car at a younger age because he looks old, though he will lose his sight after walking up a flight of stairs.

He has his first sexual experience in a brothel with Queenie (played and boss Captain Mike (played by Jared Harris ("Lights Out," "Ocean's Twelve"). The two create a unique relationship as master and disciple. Button eventually loses the older or the two to physical appearance, but not in the mind. But with Mike's worldly experiences it is he that opens up the world to Button and sets them both on his boat.

Button must encounter the usual things that life lays in front of a person: war, love, death, family and work. So by the time he meets with Daisy, his childhood friend again, played at her youthful and middle-aged years by the three impressive Cate Blanchett ("Babel") on a Scandal. # Fighting off the Montreal cold

Sub-zero temperatures, largely unfamiliar company and cramped living conditions were not enough to dampen Daily Collegian staff writer Joe Stahl's recent trip to Montral, Canada. Stahl found that his lack of French wasn't much of a problem in the province.

By Joe Stahl
Collegian Staff

MONTREAL — For most students away from home, the long winter break is a chance to spend as much time as you can with missed family and friends, but my case is a little abnormal.

Ever since I moved after high school from Missouri to Needham, Mass., where I live with my Aunt and Uncle, the concept of a home has become a complete blur. I suppose my Aunt and Uncle's home has all of the components for me to consider it my own: a clean guestroom, two teenage boys, parents, rules and even a perfect golden retriever named ZR.

They don't even make me pay rent.

I don't know what it is about Needham, but I still live out of a suitcase. And whenever there is a chance for me to zip up that suitcase and run to wherever, I will.

As my last excursion of the break, four of my friends and I took a seven-and-a-half-hour midnight bus ride to Montreal for a three-day trip. Three of the people I was traveling with I had just met a week or so before the trip. This was not bothersome because they are friends of my good friend, Lisa, who was also on the trip.

The last time I was in Montreal I was only there for a night with my family. That was seven years ago. It was also in the middle of summer when it was warm. But being in Montreal during the month of January is like nothing any of us had experienced. In actuality, the three days in the city was nothing a lot of locals have experienced either, on account that the three days spent were the coldest recorded in over 30 years.

Luckily, we had already arranged a place to stay, which was in a humble 200 square foot studio apartment rented only for Lisa's childhood friend Diana and her Quebecer boyfriend, Nikolai, on some nights. Depending on how you look at it, we had the pleasure of sharing the cramped apartment with him as a sixth added guest. Though I was in the bed with three other people, I never remember being cold.

Because Diana lives in an older and more run down complex, the condition of the apartment itself is way past the point of saving. The sink and shower drip water from their faucets, the appliances are shoddy, the walls are stained yellow from cigarette smoke and the windows allow the brutal cold wind to blow through.

When we got tired of living like impoverished individuals – eating roman noodles, ketchup potato chips and smoking cheap Indian cigarettes – we went meandering through the unfamiliar city. The majority of us had already been to Montreal before, but from what I recall, Montreal was a drastically different city. On this trip, the streets were jagged with permanent ice, people had no have faces and the streets were strangely muted.

To fight the cold, most of our activities took place within the quarters of shopping centers like La Ville Souterraine, Montreal's underground mall. My friends and I especially Gabby, are all fans of American Apparel; there are 10 locations in Montreal. We went to six of them. Secretly, after the fourth or fifth time going into that damn store I snuck to sneak away and see at least one or two museums.

Eventually, I did. Lisa and I had to force Gabby into the Museum of Fine Arts but couldn't stay long because it closed early. I'm sure that Gabby was happy about that.

We did a little more than go shopping and visit a museum for 30 minutes. The nightlife in downtown Montreal is vibrant. The first night we went out to a gay club called Parking. I like it solely for the trashiness of it. If you've ever been to Diva's in Northampton, you'd enjoy Parking.

The next night we hopped from bar to bar in full of life and red wine. I wish I'd remember the names of the bars, but most of the time I never even looked because almost everything else was in French. With a vocabulary that is only as vast as "bonjour," "merci," and "d'accord," how was I to comprehend their names?

Though you can get by just fine only speaking English, you sometimes just have the urge to speak French. At some points, Gabby and I would walk down the street and exchange French words with one another hoping someone would acknowledge us like children would do.

By the end of my visit, my feet were wet from the ice and my wallet was empty from the high sales tax. The 30 degree weather we felt when we got off the bus in Boston's South Station never felt better.

Handing out the '08 award

Ted Rogers

Given that we're finally in a new year, it's awards season. Everybody gets one. Time's person of the year? Barack Obama. Best supporting actor? My money is on Heath Ledger. To tell the truth, you deserve one, too. It's with a sense of humility and honor that I would like to present you with Ted's Worst Person of 2008 award.

Please, don't thank me. You earned it. Well, not just you in particular. This award goes out to every American citizen who made this award possible.

You first came into consideration by electing Barack Obama. While I'm the first to admit that the guy seems very intelligent and charming, I'll also concede that, at best, he's an empty suit. Senator Obama's campaign ran on two things; he's not George Bush, and "change". So far, the world is pretty unsure of what he will do as president. That has not stopped you, however, from believing that he will bring peace to the Middle East, turn this recession around, legalize pot and gay marriage, and personally make you a couple inches taller.

Anyone can say they want a change in their country. But if you aren't going to help out, then you're as good as a burned bush. I'm just glad I didn't vote for the candidate of change and voted for Nader. I hope to see you suckers planting some trees around town.

Finding work takes action

With our economy in decline it can be pretty frightening for graduating seniors entering their last semester. Applying for jobs in a market where jobs are quickly disappearing gets pretty daunting, especially with how quickly the spring semester usually flies by. If you're not sticking around for graduate school, its time to dress up your résumé, pound out some cover letters, and hit the ground running, because your pesky school loans will catch up to you almost as soon as your graduation cap falls back to Earth.

President Barack Obama has made some big promises about fixing the economy, yet he has already rescinded some of the plans he proposed during the election. If there is any one thing Obama has said that can truly be trusted in the infancy of his Presidency, it is that "we must pick ourselves up."

I am not counting on Obama to create a job just for me, and neither should you. So, for those seniors like me, getting ready to graduate in May, there is no better time than now to start your career search, and I've compiled some strategies to help you land a steady income after graduation In the midst of a failing economy.

First and foremost, slacken your grasp on the hope of getting your dream job. For most of us, we have some idea of our ideal job, and we'd like to get started right after graduation. But that hope Is unrealistic, especially in a market where getting any job is a challenge. This doesn't mean you should give up your dream. By all means, if you know the perfect job for you, apply for it, but don't hold out for that one position. Pursue a lot of different avenues outside of your ideal career. A degree is good, but most dream jobs will want you to have some other professional experience before they will take you in.

Internships have the appeal of getting you experience while you are still in school, but they aren't just for students. If you have your eyes set on a specific field, but job openings seem pretty sparse right now, look for internships – even if they are unpaid. Getting involved in the career of your choice is always a plus. You may not get a paycheck to start, but internships often open up doors to higher paying positions later and they'll allow you to network with people in your field. Settling for an internship may land you that dream job earlier than you expect.

I am not counting on Obama to create a job just for me, and neither should you.

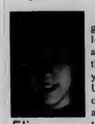
It is also important to be flexible on where you would like to work. Some people have a specific city or state in mind as a place they would love to live and work, but attaching yourself to one place will inhibit your chances of starting a career after graduation. Open yourself up to different areas. Try to ignore the location entirely when looking at lists of job openings. Apply to job openings regardless of their location. You may find that places you never thought of are hot-spots for the type of career you may be looking to get into. Once offers start coming back to you, it's time to seriously consider the possibility of moving. You can always say no to a job offer if you come to realize that relocating is not an option for you.

Relocating back to your parent's house can sometimes be the biggest hindrance in starting a career. Beware complacency. Returning to mom's home-cooked meals and spending whole days on the couch can often send someone into a spiraling regression to the lazy days of old. College is a great way to learn independence, but after graduation It seems all too easy to fall back to a childish dependence on one's parents. Do what you can to cut-back on rent and other expenses, but don't get complacent in the care of your parents. Long periods of unexplained unemployment do not look appealing on a resume.



Finally, don't let up on prospective employers. The application process doesn't end with the submission of your application. Call in and ask about the status of your application. Stop in and speak to management. Unfortunately a lot of companies will accept your application and then never call you back. You may feel a bit intrusive, but showing an interest in a job Is never a negative thing. Better to call and hear an employer say "no thank you" outright than to live in limbo waiting for a call-back that may never come. By no means hound prospective employers, but stay on them and make sure they remember you.

If this is your last semester, good luck polishing off that résumé with a degree. If you haven't already, take some time in the coming weeks to head down to Career Services and get some advice specific to your goals and desires. Remain flexible and you will find it's easier to bend down, snag those bootstraps and pick yourself up, even with the economy collapsing around you.

Job market still has options

Eli Gottlieb

Well, you go away for one lousy month and everything passes you by. The United States of America has a new President to complain about and a whole bloody war happens that I absolutely refuse to speak or write about on grounds that if I'm going to spend an entire column refuting B.S. spouted by hippies I'll have the courtesy to let the hippies go first. Oh, and we're pretty officially in an economic recession.

Now what can we do about that last one, while our new President gets on with the business of building the Third Temple (assuming he's the messiah everyone thinks he is)? After all, this year's seniors and super-seniors have to face the job market in this. Luckily, two fairly well-known institutions of our lives come to the rescue: grad school and internships.

Firstly, graduate schools. Most of the time, they allow one to defer paying off student loans, and a master's degree makes one far more qualified for a high-paying job. Someone who really needed to break into the business world, for example, because they majored in something utterly useless, could even go for a Master's in Business Administration to try to qualify himself to manage people more economically useful than themselves. Or perhaps a degree in science or engineering might help a bit more, given Obama's promise to restore science's place in American society. After all, that entire proposed infrastructure won't build itself.

The country could use more engineers capable of telling them what to build, where to build it, and how economical it will be to build. Also, grad school gives you an opportunity to win entry to a prestigious university that would have rejected you for college admission back in your senior year of high school, thereby "upgrading" your resume. Of course, that assumes you got good grades here at UMass, but then again if you didn't what was the point?

Secondly, current students can seek internships. Now, you would think that in a bad job market internships would evaporate like puddles in summer (or at least what passes for summer in the Northeast,) but as a matter of fact they will not. College students, after all, are incredibly cheap yet often at least somewhat educated labor.

College students, after all, are incredibly cheap yet often at least somewhat educated labor.

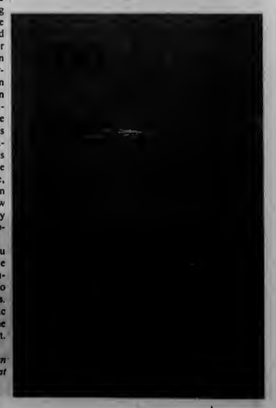
As firms lay off their older, more privileged employees with benefits that have or are about to vest, we college students can look forward to a lot of spots opening up for an enterprising young person who can live on pizza and doesn't have a family to feed.

Of course, this all might seem a bit predatory. For those of us who prefer to make a living without preying on our fellows, there's always accommodated volunteer work. Plenty of organizations have programs aimed at allowing young people, in or just out of college, to do important volunteer work for a mere living wage. Teach for America already recruits on the UMass campus, and my brother has received mailings from the Peace Corps. Actually, I recall an Obama proposal to give a $4,000 tax cut to any college student who does "national service," whatever that is.



People need to look out for each other at times like these, and I say that a warm bed and three square meals a day in exchange for an honest day's work sounds like good compensation when many people will soon lack those things. I myself am looking into ways to spend a semester on living-wage volunteering to help save up money if UMass tuition goes too high.

Actually, those Peace Corps mailings actually offer at least two different ways to combine graduate school with service in the Peace Corps.

Finally, for those of my own scientific, engineering or computing ilk, I have a word of advice: consider starting your own business. If you can actually make something that people actually need and sell it for a fair price on the free market, you can do quite well in a time when our economy is quickly burning through its fat reserves while helping to shore up the country's economic muscle. In computing, nearly all the major firms got their start as someone's little business idea. Microsoft, Google, Yahoo, Dell and Apple all began as ideas in the head of a few smart people who thought they could do something that established firms could not.

So I suppose that, when you look hard enough, even these bad times come full of opportunity for a young person willing to work hard and take a few risks. Or perhaps I'm overly optimistic and we'll all be slaves to the Chinese for decades due to debt. Time will tell.

POOR ORIGINAL

INTENTIONAL DUPE

Brad Pitt and Cate Blanchet star in "The Curious Case of Benjamin Button". The film has been nominated for 13 Oscars including best picture.

'Benjamin Button' a curious Oscar pick

By Kevin Koczwara
Collegian Staff

David Fincher tackles a literary giant with "The Curious Case of Benjamin Button." The only problem is that he and screenwriter Eric Roth ("Forest Gump") decided to take many liberties with F. Scott Fitzgerald's short story, creating a sweeping and epic love story, rather than a story of one man's struggle and history.

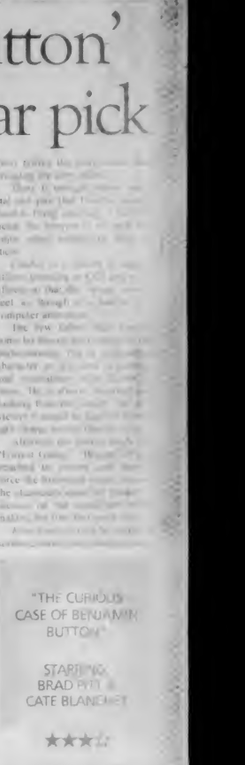
But Fincher does reach into the depths of love and what people will do for and because of love. With many computer gimmicks and above-par acting Fincher creates the life of one man searching for love. Button learns the lessons of life in the middle of the 20th century.

Benjamin Button ages in reverse. He is born into an alien-like form, with ailments that come with an aging body. It is masterful special effects from the former George Lucas protégé, Fincher, as the audience sees Benjamin age.

The key to that makes the aging process feel more real is that Brad Pitt's eyes are imposed on each actor that plays Button throughout his life, giving an authentic feeling to the character.

The narrative of the film starts in a New Orleans hospital room as Hurricane Katrina roars outside, imminent disaster peers around the corner. A mother reveals to her daughter the story of her love for one man, through the reading of his diary. It is one of the updates done to the short story that strengthens the movie, unlike the addition of Roth's reoccurring image of the hummingbird.

The reading of the journal allows the audience to piece the story together, and works as a sounding board for their own emotions and questions. As Julia Ormond ("Inland Empire" "I Know Who Killed Me") reads in her dying mother the audience can get some consolation in seeing that even people in this fairytale have a hard time believing that the story Is true.



Benjamin encounters many of life's lessons in unusual circumstances due to his older appearance. He can buy a drink at a bar a younger age because he looks as though he will lose his breath after walking up a flight of stairs.

He has his first sexual experience in a brothel with his friend and boss Captain Mike, played by Jared Harris ("Lights Goes Down," "Ocean's Twelve"). The two share a unique relationship of mentor and disciple. Button appears to be the older of the two in physical appearance but he is the student. But with Mike's worldly experiences it is he that opens up the world to Button and employs him on his boat.

Button must encounter the usual things that life lays on front of a person: war, love, death, and work. So by the time he meets with Daisy, his childhood love, again, played at her youthful and middle-aged years by the ever-impressive Cate Blanchett ("Notes on a Scandal," "The Aviator") the two have different views of the world.

Button traveled the world while working on a boat, and he was in school training to be a dancer. They meet, drift away, and meet again and drift away again. As Fincher said in an interview with Charlie Rose, the object was to keep them apart for as long as possible.

The film works because of Fincher's direction. He keeps the camera detached from the action allowing the viewer to watch and feel for the people in the film. Rather than get up close and personal with the characters, he sets

Fighting off the Montreal cold

K.N. Stahl/Collegian

Sub-zero temperatures, largely unfamiliar company and cramped living conditions were not enough to dampen Daily Collegian staff writer Joe Stahl's recent trip to Montral, Canada. Stahl found that his lack of French wasn't much of a problem in the province.

By Joe Stahl
Collegian Staff

MONTREAL — For most students away from home, the long winter break is a chance to spend as much time as you can with missed family and friends, but my case is a little abnormal.

Ever since I moved after high school from Missouri to Needham, Mass., where I live with my Aunt and Uncle, the concept of a home has become a complete blur. I suppose my Aunt and Uncle's home has all of the components for me to consider it my own: a clean guestroom, two teenage boys, parents, rules and even a perfect golden retriever named ZR.

They don't even make me pay rent.

I don't know what it is about Needham, but I still live out of a suitcase. And whenever there is a chance for me to zip up that suitcase and run to wherever, I will.

As my last excursion of the break, four of my friends and I took a seven-and-a-half-hour midnight bus ride to Montreal for a three-day trip. Three of the people I was traveling with I had just met a week or so before the trip. This was not bothersome because they are friends of my good friend, Lisa, who was also on the trip.

The last time I was in Montreal I was only there for a night with my family. That was seven years ago. It was also in the middle of summer when it was warm. But being in Montreal during the month of January is like nothing any of us had experienced. In actuality, the three days in the city was nothing a lot of locals had experienced either, on account that the three days spent were the coldest recorded in over six years.

Luckily, we had already arranged a place to stay, which was in a humble 200-square foot studio apartment suited only for Lisa's childhood friend Diana and her Quebecer boy friend, Nikolai, on some nights. Depending on how you look at it, we had the pleasure of sharing the cramped apartment with him as a sixth added guest. Though I was in the bed with three other people, I never remember being cold.

Because Diana lives in an older and more run down complex, the condition of the apartment itself is way past the point of saving. The sink and shower drip water from their faucets, the appliances are shoddy, the walls are stained yellow from cigarette smoke and the windows allow the brutal cold wind to blow through.

When we got tired of living like impoverished individuals – eating roman noodles, ketchup potato chips and smoking cheap Indian cigarettes – we went meandering through the unfamiliar city. The majority of us had already been to Montreal before, but from what I recall, Montreal was a drastically different city. On this trip, the streets were jagged with permanent ice, people had no have faces and the streets were strangely muted.

To fight the cold, most of our activities took place within the quarters of shopping centers like La Ville Souterraine, Montreal's underground mall. My friends and I, especially Gabby, are all fans of American Apparel; there are 10 locations in Montreal. We went to six of them. Secretly, after the fourth or fifth time going into that damn store I wanted to sneak away and see at least one or two museums.

Eventually, I did. Lisa and I had to force Gabby into the Museum of Fine Arts but couldn't stay long because it closed early. I'm sure that Gabby was happy about that.

We did a little more than go shopping and visit a museum for 30 minutes. The nightlife in downtown Montreal is vibrant. The first night we went out to a gay club called Parking. I like it solely for the trashiness of it. If you've ever been to Diva's in Northampton, you'd enjoy Parking.

The next night we hopped from bar to bar in full of life and red wine. I wish I'd remember the names of the bars, but most of the time I never even looked because almost everything else was in French. With a vocabulary that is only as vast as "bonjour," "merci," and "d'accord," how was I to comprehend their names?

Though you can get by just fine only speaking English, you sometimes just have the urge to speak French. At some points, Gabby and I would walk down the street and exchange French words with one another hoping someone would acknowledge us like children would do.

By the end of my visit, my feet were wet from the ice and my wallet was empty from the high sales tax. The 30 degree weather we felt when we got off the bus in Boston's South Station never felt better.

European vacation and the hostel life

VENICE — Venice is a dream. With water canals strewn all over, instead of bustling roads and carnival mask shops on every corner, the city is an Italian fairytale.

When my train reached Maestro Station, I hopped off eager to see the city I've heard so much about. After all, it was where Shylock tried to exact revenge on Antonio, Indiana Jones went in search of his missing father and James Bond ran away with Vespa Lynd but before I could make it to the city, I had to check into my hostel.

For those who have never seen or stayed in a hostel images of small rundown rooms filled with unwelcoming strippers and rickety bunk beds come to mind. At least that's what I thought they were going to be like.

However, being a college student, I welcomed them with open arms for two main reasons: to be a student is to lack enough money to afford many real-luxuries and to be a student means having a certain sense of adventure that makes everything seem new and exciting. What could be

Film defies common WWII lore

A true story of brothers, survival during the second World War

By Jennifer Turner
Collegian Staff

In the wake of a faltering economy and growing unemployment, a trip to the cinema can provide a wonderful escape from day-to-day stress. However, when a movie is full of sadness and despair it doesn't provide the desired break from reality, or the large box-office returns that its light-hearted counterparts offer.

This was the case with "Defiance," a true story of the Bielski brothers and their fight for survival during World War II. The movie features Daniel Craig and Hampshire College alumnus Lev Schreiber as the two older brothers, Tuvia and Zus Bielski, respectively.

After their family is brutally murdered by the Germans, the brothers hide out in the woods of Belarussia, now modern day Belarus. Other Jewish refugees flee into the woods and cross paths with the Bielskis, and together they start a camp for survival. They decide to not only defy the Germans by living, but they organize to form The Bielski Partisans, an armed group of rebels who fight back against their persecutors.

The Nazis and those loyal to them are constantly hunting the group as if they are animals. The Bielski Partisans are fighting starvation, extreme cold temperatures and sickness. The suffering and inhumanity shown in this film is painful to watch, but is necessary to understand the levels of desperation and despair present.

The Bielski Partisans temporarily banded together with the Russian Red Army to fight back against their German persecutors. Thanks to the Bielski boys, approximately 1,200 men, women and children made it through the Holocaust alive. The camp spent nearly two years living in the woods outrunning and fighting the Nazis.

Though a very somber and depressing subject matter, the film is very well done. The acting and the cinematography are both incredible. The Russian language skills shown by Craig and Schreiber are very impressive. Although quite a few scenes require subtitles, the use of language helps with the authenticity and feel of the movie.

Craig delivers a strong performance as the leader of the group and oldest Bielski brother, but it's Schreiber's portrayal of the headstrong and sarcastic middle brother that steals many of the scenes. Even in the darkest of subject matters, Schreiber is able to interject some much-needed comic relief.

While the entire film was moving and beautiful in its own way, there are certain scenes that stood out and captured the entire essence and emotion of the movie.

The director used quick cuts back-and-forth between a shootout involving the Partisans and the Nazis, and a marriage celebration in the camp. This stark contrast between horror and joy showed that even in extreme sorrow, there is happiness to be found; there is something worth fighting for.

It is a tough movie to make it through without crying – tissues are recommended. Watch out for the Rabbi's prayer, begging God to "choose another people." Even the most emotionless of viewers will be reaching for the Kleenex.

"Defiance" finished eighth in the weekend box office, with a current gross of just under $11 million. No. 1 at the box office last weekend was the silly comedy "Paul Blart: Mall Cop," which took in nearly $32 million in its first weekend – further proof that people are ready to escape to the movies and laugh, if only for a couple of hours.

For those interested in seeing a true story of courage and survival, and don't mind crying a bit, "Defiance" is an ideal choice.

Daniel Craig, left, stars opposite Hampshire college alumnus Lev Schreiber in the film "Defiance." The movie depicts the struggles of more than 1,200 people trying to evade the Nazis in World Word II Belarussia, modern-day Belarus.

Juicy Campus: gossip gone wild?

By Heather Waxman
Collegian Staff

It is said that nothing travels faster than word of mouth. Well, what about word of the Internet?

Campus gossip used to be reserved for the bathroom stalls, but it has now taken a dangerous leap to the walls of a website Juicy Campus.

George Seo, a junior at Colgate University, was arrested in March for writing a threatening post on the site. In that post, he said, "I wonder if I could shut down the school ... by saying I'm going to shoot [a] third people[sic] and I'm at my second class tomorrow. Hope I get more than 50 ..."

A fellow student saw the post while researching an article she was writing for Colgate's student newspaper. She initially did not take the post to heart but, after a phone conversation with her mother, decided to take the safer route and contact the authorities.

"You just can't joke about this," she said [the student asked to remain anonymous]. "That isn't even funny for a second."

Campus police alerted the local police who arrested So after tracking down his IP address.

"In today's day and age you need to take every perceived threat seriously," says Charlie J. Mellichar, vice president of public relations and communications for the university. "While some may perceive this to be an overreaction, we must take every precaution when the safety of our campus community has been threatened."

So, who is the culprit behind Juicy Campus and what exactly is the website's agenda?

Juicy Campus was founded on Aug. 1, 2007, by Matt Ivester, a recent graduate and former fraternity president of Duke University. The site claims to have "the simple mission of enabling online anonymous free speech on college campuses."

The Web site encourages its users to post uncensored gossip and rumors – the juicier squeeze, the better. None of the posts are pre-screened before going up and users are not required to provide their name or e-mail address, so the nearly all posts remain anonymous.

Juicy Campus' anonymity is stirring up myriad issues in our own backyard.

Adam Orlando, a junior at the University of Massachusetts, knows how it feels to be hit with the Web site's slander.

He learned from a random instant message that his name had been posted on Juicy Campus, which now anchors 500 campuses and over 180,000 posts.

"Well, never having heard of the site ...and having a random kid IM [me] saying I was on it ... well, it's been a fun few days," said Orlando.

The post's headline reads "Adam Orlando – GAY Slut," and goes on to claim that he "doesn't care about anything but sex."

It has received over 620 views and is just shy of two dozen posts, including the [illegible] who begs himself "out on Manipal."

"To me, it seems like four guys, because I don't [illegible] with [the people who posted these things]," said Orlando.

As a result, he decided to move off campus to escape the unnecessary drama and negativity that now surrounds him, specifically around the gay community.

"I'm not saying I'm a saint but it is definitely a defamation of character," said Orlando.

Despite their anonymity, Orlando is not about to let the poster off the hook so easily. He has a clear hunch as to who posted the malicious remark.

Last year, Orlando had sex with a fellow student who, shortly after, dropped out of UMass. Orlando, currently pursuing a degree in pre-med, did not want to continue having relations with someone who lacked such ambition. The former student told Orlando that he knew who wrote the hurtful post but refused to reveal a name.

"Every fiber in my body wanted to write on that thread," said Orlando, "but it will only draw more attention to it and I still won't have the answers that I am and was looking for."

Instead, Orlando contacted Juicy Campus and requested they take down the post – without success.

"Having emailing the Web site and having them telling me they aren't taking it down and trying to track down who would post such things, since I do not hook up at UMass for that reason, [is unfair]," said Orlando.

While it may be unfair, believe it or not, it is legal.

Juicy Campus is protected under the Communications Decency Act of 1996 which states: "No provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider."

On the Web site's frequently Asked Questions page, Juicy Campus candidly slams those who question its anonymity by saying: "We don't ask for your name, email address, or other personally identifiable information in order for you to make a post. In fact, we prefer not to know who you are. We like to think that famous people like Justin Timberlake and Beyonce are using our site. We love them..."

Still, authority figures of our universities say the best advice is to continue to avoid it until it turns threatening.

"It is protected speech until it moves to a direct threat," said Jo-Anne Vanin, Dean of Students at UMass. "That is the yin and yang of this...it is an individual choice [and people] have to use their discretion [illegible] ... As for restricting it from the campus network, that road may be a tricky one to travel down."

"That's a question that should be raised including the chancellor, provost, office of information technology, and higher education," said Vanin. "I don't know if the institution would be willing. As a public [institution], we don't have that liberty like private schools."

And she's right. Private schools have ample opportunity to throw the second punch and come up winning.

Smith College President Carol T. Christ recently had about 15 posts removed from Smith's Daily Jolt forum in September as a result of racist comments regarding a couple who attended a student party dressed in blackface.

The Daily Jolt, a Web site started by two Amherst College graduates, provides over 200 colleges and universities with their own individualized Web sites. Each site contains forums, blogs, calendars and news about their respective school.

Still, while some fall as victims, others remain on patrol.

Shannon Halligan, a junior at Syracuse University, checks Juicy Campus on a regular basis – but not to score the daily dish on her fellow students. She wants to make sure that her name doesn't pop up on the Web site.

"That's what I'm scared of," said Halligan. "Some of the ones just say people's names and then they'll say 'Discuss.' And then they'll just bash them."

Her fears come with good reason, though. She is a member of Delta Delta Delta, one of the most popular sororities at Syracuse and a featured target for the school's Juicy Campus blog.

Now, less than two years after launching the Web site, Ivester and his team are facing public slander of their own.

Last month, Tennessee State University became the first public institution to ban Juicy Campus from their network.

As of Monday, November 17, Michael Freeman, TSU's vice president for Student Affairs, issued a statement in the school's newspaper saying, "I looked through the site and the level of conversation on the site. The students have the right to get to it, but there is no right that says we must host [Juicy Campus]."

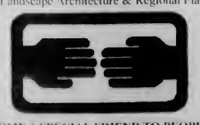
This comes as a response to an investigation by New Jersey attorney general Anne Milgram in regards to whether Juicy Campus misrepresented itself to consumers and violated the Consumer Fraud Act.

"JuicyCampus.com tells the public that this offensive content may be removed, but the site apparently lacks tools to report or dispute this material," said Milgram.

A subpoena was issued to Juicy Campus in March seeking information including how its users being college students is verified and how it enforces its policy of requiring each user under the age of 18 to submit a parental release form.

"The position taken by the Attorneys General that Web site operators can be liable for failing to censor potentially defamatory, mean-spirited and uncivil postings has been rejected by Congress and by dozens of courts," Juicy Campus said on its company blog.

In addition to seriously examining its legal options, the Web site called upon its "faithful" visitors and posters to complain to the state officials of New Jersey and "protest this waste of government resources."



Lucky for Ivester, both Congress and the courts declared that no Web site is responsible for someone's defamatory comments about someone else in a message thread.

So, while it is clear that progress has certainly been made, there is still a long road ahead for those that want to squeeze Juicy Campus dry.

Juicy Campus did not respond to numerous requests for comment on this story.

The new face of networking

Call us what you will: Generation Y, the iGeneration, the Google Generation: Our generation thrives upon technology for social networking.

Modern technology has made our world more educated, accessible and immediate. We have CNN to thank for keeping us updated on worldwide affairs and the bedlam that ensues, we have Facebook to update us on when our sister's freshman year, college roommate is going on vacation to the Galapagos Islands, or what party that cute guy in your physics class is going to on Thursday night. Heaven forbid we ask them in person.

"We have gained in ease and speed of access, but we have lost in depth and quality of social interaction," said University of Massachusetts anthropology professor Brigitte Holt.

But while the technology boom has made us more accessible, it has also made approaching our peers a more foreign process. Why risk face-to-face embarrassment when we can hide behind an alias on our computers?

With over 150 million active users, Facebook is the fourth most popular Web site in the world, and now the most active, social media site in the world. Facebook has become a social revolution, making us all more available, and yet, increasingly inaccessible.

Created by then-Harvard sophomore Mark Zuckerberg, "The Facebook" was initially launched exclusively to Harvard undergraduates in February 2004. By September 2006, Facebook was globally available to anyone with an e-mail address.

The site has evolved from a social network no one wanted to admit they compulsively use, to an active part of everyday student life. As one walks through the dining hall, the air is peppered with spurts of "Oh, he wrote on my wall!" and "Yeah, she friended me on Facebook."

"Friended" has become an active verb in our vernacular.

Each tagged picture, every wall post, each listed relationship: they are all colors we use to paint our own digital self-portraits. Every photo at a party becomes a digital footprint on our social track record. It is now almost standard protocol for employers to search potential clients or employees' Facebook histories before hiring.

However, this does not mean information posted by our peers on Facebook is the most reliable source. With a few mere clicks, a persons' identity can change from J. Crew preppy poster child to an emo-goth rocker.

In fall 2005, Facebook added the photo feature – likely the reason for the increasing number of camera flashes at parties – usually followed by the promise of "I'll tag you!"

A profile picture is your visual stamp for everything you do in this digital social universe. There is myriad of profile pictures to choose from:

1. People usually post a picture of themselves looking their best (a recent night out, before a night of bar-crawling or with their significant other). One can usually tell the depicted individual finds the picture self-flattering. However, in reality, it rarely resembles their visage.

2. The sexy picture, which is usually taken at a very flattering angle and explodes among college girls in the aftermath of Halloween. Most are drawn from a series taken in effort to find that one great picture, usually at expense of the other depicted individuals.

Whether your picture is one of the aforementioned or a picture of a musician, politician, or an advertisement: you are identifying yourself with a picture. That picture is an uploaded statement on how you would like your peers to perceive you.

However, if we are laying out all of the information about ourselves, then what is the point of getting to know someone? All the information someone needs to get to "know" us is right there as we contently lay the bricks on the road to judgment.

"It gives us motive to snoop," claims Kristin O'Neill in a recent article in The Boston Globe, "Facebook Killed My Relationship," "It's just awful."

While there are millions of people all over the world, silently incriminated for "Facebook Stalking," it is silently encouraged on the social networking site.

"Media such as e-mail [and Facebook] certainly broadened the potential social network, which may be good, but [it is also] more superficial," said professor Holt. "E-mails are much less reflective than letters, and certainly much less so than personal interaction."

Essentially, Facebook reinforces relationships that may otherwise lack emotional depth. Although it may be nice to check in with your old friend from summer camp's twin sister, the truth is, without technology making her much more accessible, you probably wouldn't think to get in touch with them.

The technology boom may also be to blame for why it's become so hard to find a date.

In past generations, the order-of-operations was traditionally to date and then hook up. Our generation seems to have flipped this standard into hooking up, and dating afterwards – if there is a sustainable amount of residual attraction.

In her book, "Hooking Up: Sex, Dating, and Relationships on Campus," Kathleen Bogle, Ph.D, points her finger at the technology boom for the popularity our generation finds in ephemeral relationships, or the appeal of hooking up.

"Hooking up existed before cell phones and e-mail, but back then, it required advanced thought – you had to call someone before going out to ensure you'd be able to meet up with them later," Bogle writes. "But with text messaging, IM and Twitter, last-minute plans are possible ... not to mention far less awkward."

Thirty years ago, last-minute plans wouldn't have been an option because of how inaccessible people were before we had Blackberries glued to our palms.

However, Holt strongly argues that nothing can replace our primal dependency on social interaction. "In the end, who you consider true friends are those with whom you have 'chemistry' and who stand the test of time, through their loyalty as friends," she said. "No technology can substitute that."

Europe's hostel life

The 16-bed dorm was a bit cramped for space, though, with eight bunk beds lined across each side of the room which wasn't meant for 16 bunk beds to begin with.

Throwing myself on the bed revealed the springy mattresses for what they were. But as long as I didn't move around too much, it was actually pretty comfortable. The only negative side to the hostel was the showers. From what I had heard, the showers had only two extremes of hot and cold water. So unfortunately, it was a shower-free trip for a lot of us.

In all honestly, hostels aren't as bad as their reputation suggests. A good or even great hostel can be easily found with the right amount of research, and with their low price tags, they are popular inexpensive options.

Most hostels can cost anywhere between $20 to $60 a night depending on the number of beds in the dorm, and whether it's a same-sex or mixed dorm. The fewer number of beds in the dorm, the higher the price will be.

The best hostel I stayed in was St. Christopher's Inn located in Paris. The place was impeccable. Each bed on each bunk had two outlets, a reading light and a small curtain that allowed privacy.

Outside the two large windows in the room was a Parisian view of a sand-covered park running alongside a quiet river. The bathrooms were impressively clean as well. The modern and youthful décor was what pulled everything together. Whether or not this is definitive proof of French style, the hostel, along with the city, exuded chic.

The restaurant and bar in the lobby was an added bonus, providing a lively common area for many of the young customers staying at St. Christopher's.

Besides offering a warm place to stay at agreeable rates, hostels are also popular for creating good social opportunities for the varied group of travelers from around the world. Some achieve this by arranging parties and events in bars or cafes attached to the hostel, while others rely on the people themselves to draw together and share stories of their wanderings.

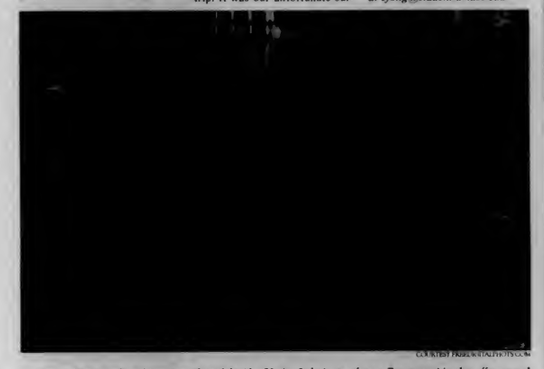
Many of them offer a wealth of information because they have traveled so extensively and frugally. It was in my hostel in Rome, M&J Hostel, where I found the guests to be the most social. In the lounge, our discussions would progress from what the best things to see and do in Rome were, to the strangest places we've encountered in our travels.

Rome is, at the end of the day, a city made up of its rich ancient history and strong Catholic ties. All of the sites are among the most well-known throughout the world and none of them overrated.

If Paris was my best hostel experience, Dublin was unquestionably my worst. This isn't a testament to the city's selection of hostels, just one to my group's research skills for that trip. It was our unfortunate surprise to learn that sheets and blankets were provided for a small but startling fee of two euros. The bathrooms rank among the worst I've seen, with stall doors unable to lock and shower curtains nonexistent.

Needless to say, that was a shower-free trip as well.

With all its faults, the hostel didn't take away from what was the one of the most beautiful countries.



It did become clear after several nights in different hostels that bathrooms were always a gray area. Communal bathrooms aren't a new concept for the average college student. However, the difference is the uncertainty of how often and how well they clean and maintain their facilities as well as the knowledge that strangers worldwide have shared them.

In Rome, the bathroom was unpleasantly small and co-ed. In Barcelona, a co-ed dorm of 10 people shared a bathroom with the toilet and shower in one large stall.

All things considered, I'd stay in a hostel again. The most interesting stories came out of my experiences there and the characters I came across. For some places, it was all about location. In Venice, my hostel was on the other side of the lagoon. So to get there and back, my friends and I took a ferry every morning and every evening of our stay.

There is nothing like a peaceful ride on the Canele di Fusina to greet and bid you farewell to such a uniquely beautiful city such as Venice.

Famous for its canals, architecture and gondola rides, Venice, Italy, is one of many European cities that offers several hostels for tourists looking for an inexpensive alternative to some of the cities more pricey hotels.

Travel Channel's eccentric Bourdain back for new season

By Barbara Booras
Collegian Staff

With the popularity of cooking shows growing exponentially today, celebrity chefs have reached cult status. Viewers are religiously watching untraditional shows like "Top Chef," "Ace of Cakes" and "30-Minute Meals."

The food network isn't the only channel capitalizing on this trend. The Travel Channel has multiple unique offerings for the modern day foodie.

Anthony Bourdain, a culinary arts veteran is currently hosting his fifth successful season of "No Reservations." As a former chef and food author, Bourdain knows good grub. However, it's not necessarily his resume that keeps the viewers coming back for more. His brutal honesty and occasionally crass persona sets him apart from his fellow celebrity chefs.

Although, he hasn't reached Gordon Ramsey status, he is essentially the antithesis of Rachael Ray. Avid watchers of "Top Chef" may recognize Anthony Bourdain as the feared celebrity judge in recent episodes.

The premise of "No Reservations" is centered on Bourdain's travels across the globe and his experiences with the cultures he enters, in particular the food.

In past seasons he has sampled food from across the globe from India to Uruguay, Peru and Saudi Arabia. Some specials have featured U.S. cities such as New York, Las Angeles and Las Vegas.

Along with his TV series Anthony Bourdain has authored a number of books such as "Kitchen Confidential" and "A Cook's Tour". When he's not filming his show, writing a book or blog entry you can find Mr. Bourdain publically speaking at a wide range of events.

This season you can watch the quick-witted and sharp-tongued host travel near and far to Mexico, the Azores, the Philippines and Venice. Although, Bourdain is known for his opinionated nature and tough guy façade, he clearly displays an admirable desire to challenge himself by leaving his comfort zone. From New York City to Vietnam and fetal duck egg to foie gras, no plate goes uneaten or place unexplored.

You can catch Anthony Bourdain's "No Reservations" Mondays on the Travel Channel at 10 p.m.

Like a foodie's Lou Reed, Anthony Bourdain is pure cool – even when he's not making anything.

MESSAGES FROM THE BURSAR'S OFFICE SPRING 2009

Payment Information

The UMassAmherst Bursar's Office has transitioned to a paperless billing system effective with the spring 2009 tuition and fee bills. All graduate, undergraduate and continuing education students will receive their bills to their student UMail account. The email will inform the student that their bills are available to be viewed in SPIRE in their Student Service Center under the Finances section. Parents can also be set up as Authorized Payers in order to view, print and or pay bills online through QuikPAY.

Excess Express

Why wait in line to pick up your refund check? Sign up for Excess Express and have your refund automatically deposited into the U.S. bank account of your choice. To enroll, log on to SPIRE, navigate to the Student Menu ⇨ Finances ⇨ Excess Express. There you will follow the instructions and enter your banking information.

FERPA

The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act is a federal law protecting the confidentiality of your student records. In compliance with FERPA, UMass Amherst must have the student's written permission to release information from your records. You can provide permission by filling out a FERPA privacy waiver online. Completing the waiver will allow whomever you designate to communicate with the university about your bill, financial aid, and housing. You may edit your FERPA waiver at any time to change or eliminate your designees. The FERPA privacy waiver is limited to two categories of information: finances and housing. It does not allow your designees access to your academic information (such as your grades). Fill out the FERPA Privacy Waiver through SPIRE; navigate to the Student Home ⇨ Holds & To Do's ⇨ FERPA Privacy Waiver.

Mass Pirg and Child Care Waivers

Mass Pirg and Child Care can now be waived online. Log on to SPIRE. On your Student Center, click the Mass Pirg/Child Care Waiver link under the Finances heading.

Waiving Student Health Insurance

If you did not waive the student health insurance for fall 2008 you may not waive it for spring 2009 semester unless spring 2009 is your first semester. The student mandatory fee cannot be waived. If you are eligible to waive the Student Health Insurance Plan, visit http://spire.umass.edu for a link to the online waiver process.

Eligible Graduate Student Employees (Those in the GEO bargaining unit who qualify for SHIP Fee Exemptions) who do not waive SHIP are entitled to a 95% reduction of the SHIP Health Fee for an individual. Send the Bursar's Office an email at bursar@admin.umass.edu to inform them that you will be enrolled in SHIP and qualify for the 95% reduction of this fee.

How to Contact Us

The Bursar Teller hours are Monday through Friday from 9:00am-4:00pm and the Customer Service hours are 9:00am-5:00pm. The Bursar telephone number is (413) 545-2368 or you can contact us by email at bursar@admin.umass.edu

Spring economy-friendly essentials

By Heather Waxman
Collegian Staff

As we make the long-awaited transition from heavy trenches and pea coats to light weight jackets, we have more to anticipate than warmer weather. A host of trends have emerged just in time for spring.

Designers certainly had the economy in mind while putting together their spring collections. With these staples comes good news: your wallet won't have to go the extra mile to sacrifice your personal style.

Top 5 for ladies:

Bottoms up

The skinny jean has met its rival (yes, ladies, you may jump for joy now!) and the wide leg has a newfound friend in relaxed fit pants. They have a similar agenda as the boyfriend jean, with a loose fit that goes straight past the hip. However, instead of hiding a woman's assets, they manage to flatter the derriere by donning a more shapely fit and slightly tapering at the ankle.

You can wear them as is or cuff them for a more easy-does-it look, like the model does in this pair from Express. Add a pair of flats for an easy, chic way to head to class.

If you were a kaleidoscope...

As we bid adieu to our winter woes, we can leave extra room for welcoming the bright, blooming hues of spring. Now more than ever, we are seeing spring collections abandoning past rules by mixing and matching boldly colored pieces.

Pair a bright yellow cardigan with a cobalt tank and layer with a magenta-toned scarf. Opt for a subtle pop of color, such as a teal headband, while you sport a white summer dress and brown boots. Or choose an iridescent pattern that speaks volumes for itself like this Old Navy cardigan.

Open cardigans

The cardigan is feeling a bit lazy these days, ditching its buttons for a more lassiez-faire appearance by way of the open cardigan. The vertical opening of the cardigan elongates your frame for a sleeker, vertical line while maintaining a hint of bohemian flair.

Emphasize the boho vibe by layering the cardigan over a flowy dress or sport one, like this Urban Outfitters model, with a tank, striped shirt and a pair of tight fitting jeans for the perfect grab-and-go outfit.

Zipper accents

The spring runways tend to show off a slew of off-kilter looks and zippers were no exception this year. Formerly a requirement reserved for the punk-rock clan, zipper accents are now being seen on everything from tight jackets to flirty skirts. They lend a certain edge to an otherwise feminine ensemble and take their own direction by going at an angle.

It's all geometry to me

Who says fashion isn't reading, writing and arithmetic? This season's bright bulbs of color are being placed ever so meticulously on sweaters, tees and tanks in the form of geometric shapes, such as upside down triangles and slightly-off trapezoids.

Purchase a piece and you'll immediately have an outfit that requires next-to-no thought. Added extras can make your look too busy. Let pieces, such as this Forever 21 tunic, speak for itself with a pair of jeans and brightly colored flats.

Prim ... minus the proper

Take that plaid shirt (see, it really is a necessity!) and slap on a menswear vest for a heightened casual look, like this Vintage Red vest from Macy's. To make sure you don't look like you're ready for a fanciful picnic in the park, add your own twist to it. Wear a brightly colored beanie or a tie scarf around your neck to give your look a modern feel.

Top it off

Fedoras, oversized beanies and flats, like this one from Urban Outfitters, have been edging their way onto the fashion scene for the past few seasons. This spring, they are officially additions to subscribe to. What's more, they're a simple way to add something extra to your outfit – no elbow grease required. The options are pretty much limitless and hats go with virtually any outfit, so use leisurely.

Top 5 for guys:

Hit the road, jack

Men's fashion is seeing its own twist on the rugged outdoorsman in the form of fitted plaid shirts. Fear not, though! Unlike the original lumberjack shirt, which is known for its heavy flannel fabric and tablecloth-esque pattern, fabrics are much lighter and patterns are varied.

You can wear them as is, like this Quiksilver button down, or leave them unbuttoned and throw on a thermal underneath to make a bolder statement. Note: buy in multiples. Once you start wearing them, you won't want to stop.

Cardigans for guys

I know what you're thinking, but there is a method to the madness. There are ways for men to wear a cardigan without feeling like a earbon copy of dear old Grandpa Joe.

If you're wearing a pale-colored cardigan, choose a graphic or striped t-shirt in the same color family as your cardigan, like this DKNY ensemble from Macy's. If you're opting for a black or white one, choose a bright bold color underneath it to make your own statement.

The skinny tie

Like hats, skinny ties have been on the fashion radar for seasons past – decades past, actually. They're a great way to add a cool, vintage vibe to an outfit without having to suit up. This Rag & Bone runway look channels decades past without looking as though he stepped out of a time machine.

Put on a colorful shirt and black skinny tie with jeans and sneakers. If you're more of a risk taker, go out on a limb by mixing patterns with a striped shirt and a patterned tie instead. Better yet, recycle that plaid shirt again and slip on a skinny tie with that.

Another January slip for UM

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

It's developing into an intersession trend. The annual winter break never ceases to bring snow, the too short/too long period away from school and the ever certain bump in the road for the Massachusetts hockey team.

Last season the Minutemen (10-11-2, 5-7-2 Hockey East) won their first two winter break contests but then dropped five in a row, managing a lone tie to make their January record a disappointing 2-5-1.

This season UMass has once again posted a 2-5-1 record while going 0-2-1 at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen are still desperately searching for any kind of consistency as every game becomes more important.

But it isn't all bad news for the Minutemen. UMass coach Don Cahoon has found another line capable of taking over a game and still has two goaltenders that can go any night.

Trio finds spark

In the Dartmouth Ledyard National Bank Classic's consolation game against Army, Cahoon – in perhaps an attempt to spark his team offensively – put T.J. Syner, Casey Wellman and Will Ortiz on UMass' second line. The patchwork line was responsible for three of UMass' four goals in its 4-1 win.

Since then the trio has five goals and 10 assists in its last five games providing the Minutemen with an extra offensive burst.

The line's center, Wellman, is second on the team in points (21) and assists (16).

Winger Ortiz has five points in his last five games and is the workhorse of the line; Syner has four points (2 goals, 2 assists).

Most of all, the line shows tremendous speed, which is evident when the trio enters the offensive zone and cycles the puck along the boards and behind the net.

UMass Hockey

Home problems

The Minutemen are 0-2-1 at home in January, getting outscored 12-8 in the three games. Playing at home these last few weeks surely hasn't been the same.

With a great majority of the student body away on winter break, the Mullins Center hasn't exactly been as exciting over the last few weeks as it had been these last four months.

On the season the Minutemen are 5-5-1 at home.

Not the issue

In UMass' 2-1 loss to No. 7 Vermont on Jan. 23, Minuteman net minder Paul Dainton stopped 17 shots, posting a solid outing but still getting the loss due to the lack of offensive production.

That has been the story this winter for most of UMass' losses. Dainton and Dan Meyers have created a solid goaltending tandem that keeps the Minutemen in every game.

The UMass goaltenders have posted save percentages of .913 and .919, respectively. The defense in front of the net minders is struggling despite the play of the first defensive pairing Justin Braun and Martin Nolet. Meyers saved a career-high 41 shots in UMass' 3-2 overtime loss to New Hampshire and started three straight games from Jan. 9-16.

Mixing it up

At the start of the season the Minutemen boasted one of the most dangerous and offensively potent first lines in the nation. James Marcou, Cory Quirk and Alex Berry were mostly responsible for UMass' fast start, power-play success and high-scoring offense.

Lately though, that hasn't been the story. Cahoon has jumbled up the lines in hopes to spark the offense that once gifted his first line. Lately right winger Chris Davis has seen playing time on UMass' first line especially early on this winter when Berry was disqualified for hitting from behind against Bemidji State in Dartmouth, N.H.

Since then Davis' name has reached the box score often but the chemistry of the first line still isn't there. Cahoon again mixed the lines against UMass-Lowell on Jan. 17. Marcou was put on UMass' first line with Michael Lecomte and Chase Langeraap. The first line tallied one goal and two assists while the ever-improving second line was responsible for the game-winner.

Will Ortiz tries to skate by a Providence College player in UMass' 5-4 loss on Jan. 16. UMass coach Don Cahoon recently put Ortiz on a line with Casey Wellman and T.J. Syner to spark the offense.

McCutcheon tabs Morris as replacement

Worcester Polytechnic Institute (Div. III) for three years, Union College for two seasons, and then back to WPI for six years as the head coach from 1993-98, cumulating a 24-32 record. Before joining Brown at Northeastern in 2000, he spent one season at Stony Brook as an offensive coordinator.

McCutcheon stressed the importance of sustaining continuity in the program, and the hiring of Morris should do just that, as much of Brown's former staff are expected to remain on-board – including defensive coordinator Keith Dudzinski and Brian Picucci, who is expected to be elevated from offensive line and run-game coordinator to offensive coordinator.

Morris will no longer call the plays on offense, but will remain quarterbacks coach. A few spots will be open on the staff with the expected loss of defensive line and special teams coach Sean Spencer to Bowling Green, as well as the defensive backs coach position, which was under Brown's control.

Over the past five seasons at UMass, Morris helped lead a consistently strong offensive attack, contributing to the winningest five-year span (43-19) in program history. In 2006 the Minutemen reached the Football Championship Series national championship game, losing to Appalachian State.

"This isn't a matter of just continuing on what Don Brown did, this was really hinged on Kevin's vision and how he's going to lead the program," McCutcheon said.

With Brown's departure during a busy time in national recruiting, the UMass program was put under a difficult situation in terms of maintaining a strong recruiting class. But Morris is confident the coaching change won't have any negative affects on recruiting.

"The reactions were great, [the recruits are] very excited in keeping the continuity of the program. We've been selling UMass, and UMass attracts a good quality student-athlete," Morris said.

According to Morris one of those recruits (reportedly from a junior college) will be a quarterback – who will be given every opportunity to compete for the starting job which is open for the first time in years with the graduation of Liam Coen, who, under Morris, is the school's all-time leader in virtually every passing statistic.

Mass Attack searches for consistent play

The Minutemen came out quick against the River Hawks, controlled the tempo of the game and didn't let UMass-Lowell gain an advantage at any point.

The teams traded goals throughout the game, UMass scoring first at the 12:26 mark of the period with a goal from Berry. UML scored in the second period to tie the game at 1-1. Langeraap propelled the Minutemen past the River Hawks with six minutes left on the clock, but UML tallied a second goal with 26 seconds remaining to enter the third period tied, 2-2.

The Minutemen scored two unanswered goals, including a short-handed goal by Braun. With 11:30 left, Ortiz scored UMass' fourth goal to secure the win.

UML answered back just 24 seconds later, but the strength in UMass' defensive zone rendered no need for an overtime period.

Providence 5, UMass 4

UMass' defense played a factor in its 5-4 loss on Jan. 16 against Providence. With 53 seconds remaining in the matchup, Providence's Matt Taormina scored the game-winning goal on Meyers (26 saves). Taormina's goal occurred after a position breakdown on a faceoff in UMass' own zone.

The Friars controlled the tempo of the game which ultimately led to their win.

No. 11 New Hampshire 3, UMass 2 (OT)

Chase Langeraap and Ortiz each netted a goal in the Minutemen's loss to then-No. 13 UNH. Meyers took the start in net making a career-high 41 saves.

UMass took the lead first, scoring the lone goal in the second period; but the Minutemen's lead didn't last long and UNH scored a goal 57 seconds into the third.

UMass took the lead again, and for the last time, with Ortiz's goal, but with 10 minutes left the Wildcats scored to send the game into overtime. Forward Bobby Butler scored 1:36 into OT to win the game for UNH.

No. 11 New Hampshire 2, UMass 2 (OT)

UMass outshot UNH 12-10 in the first period, but neither team scored a goal. UNH was the first to score and Syner netted a goal two minutes later. UNH took the lead again going into the third period.

Quirk tied the game with 4.3 seconds remaining, sending the game to overtime.

Neither team was successful on the power play – UMass went 0-7 while the Wildcats were 0-5. Meyers started in net and made 29 saves.

No. 3 Cornell 5, UMass 2

The first loss of the New Year came against then-No. 10 Cornell (Jan. 4). Cornell got on the board early with a goal less than five minutes into the game, followed by a second goal 31 seconds later.

The Minutemen didn't have a lack of effort, though, just the challenge of beating Cornell net minder Ben Scrivens (26 saves).

T.J. Syner and Michael Lecomte gave their best effort at trying to get the puck past Scrivens in the first period with two 2-on-0 chances, but Scrivens didn't let down.

In the second period, UMass controlled the play and scored one goal to cut the lead to 2-1. While it outshot the Big Red 15-6, Cornell came back in the third and scored three goals including one empty netter.

Dainton added 21 saves in the game.

UMass 4, Army 1

Will Ortiz had two goals and Casey Wellman tallied a goal and two assists to help the Minutemen beat Army to win the consolation game of the Dartmouth Ledyard National Bank Classic.

UMass outshot Army, 31-17, with Dan Meyers making 16 saves.

Quirk and Justin Braun scored UMass' two goals in the opening game of the Classic on Dec. 28.

Quirk scored his goal 56 seconds into the game, but Bemidji State answered back with two goals in the first. Each team tallied a goal in the second period and the Beavers had the lone goal in the third to secure their win.

The Minutemen went 0-of-3 on the power play, while Bemidji went 2-of-5. Paul Dainton made 14 saves in the game.

Road woes continue

UM stumbles early in Atlantic 10 play

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

While it is expected to protect your home court, elite teams are those which win on the road.

Do the season, the Massachusetts men's basketball team is 1-7 on the road and 5-3 at home. While its one victory away from the Mullins Center (UMass' first victory of the year was away but at a neutral site against Division II Arkansas-Monticello) was against last year's national champion and then-No. 23 Kansas, the other seven were against lesser teams. Kansas currently boasts an RPI of 38 out of all 343 Division I teams while UMass' (159 RPI) other road losses came to teams currently with RPIs anywhere from 83 (Wisconsin-Green Bay) to 301 (Toledo).

The losses to teams such as Toledo (4-14, 2-2 Mid-American Conference) make the upset over Kansas (14-4, 3-0 Big 12) appear as an aberration, but the Minutemen also pulled off upsets over Dayton (17-2, 3-1 A-10) and Temple (10-7, 2-1 A-10); both in the RPI Top 50, but both with UMass as the host.

From struggling to score to giving their opponents extra possessions, just about all aspects of the Minutemen's (7-10, 2-2 A-10) game declines outside the Commonwealth. UMass has averaged 73.9 points per game in eight home games this season, but that average drops to 62.1 once it hits the road. The Minutemen have been outscored by an average of 10.3 points per game on the road as opposed to 2.6 at home.

"We're just going through some growing pains on the road and with closing out games," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said. "It's doing the little things that is the biggest issue for us on the road."

The poor scoring outputs can be attributed to the team's poor shooting as well as their ball handling. Anthony Gurley has shot nearly 10 percent lower from 3-point range on the road, while the team's 3-point percentage drops to 33.7 percent from 40.1 percent. UMass' field-goal percentage also drops to 40.5 percent on the road from 44.8 percent at home.

On the road, the team averages five more turnovers per game (18 on the road compared with 13 at home) and 5.4 more turnovers than its opponents. Those turnovers result in points for the opposition which averages 21.1 points per game off UMass' turnovers.

The Minutemen have also struggled distributing the ball, averaging 7.1 fewer assists per game on the road than their average of 17.6 at home. The general of the offense, point guard Chris Lowe, has been the biggest offender when it comes to finding the open man. While Lowe has hit double digit assists in 5-of-8 home games and had at least six in two of the other three, the senior has hit five assists just once on the road and averages 3.3 assists on the road compared to 8.6 at home.

"I just have to be more mentally focused and start taking care of the basketball [on the road]," Lowe said. "[I've got to start] playing through bumps and start getting back to the things I did when we were having success."

Rebounding is one of the only skills UMass does not seem to leave behind on trips. Both Gaffney and Bonner have been more productive on the boards when the team travels; with Bonner grabbing 5.3 more rebounds per game on the road, and Gaffney pulling in 2.4 more away from the Mullins Center.

While the losses may be frustrating for Kellogg and his players, the team is optimistic.

"We're still learning as a team and we're getting there. We've lost two really close road games in conference after struggling in non-conference on the road as well," Gaffney said. "It was good to see guys fight and continue to fight when things weren't going our way."

Despite the poor passes, fumbled possessions and poor shooting all being the Achilles heal on the road for UMass, the Minutemen have not been far off from winning a couple of their road games and being above .500. Their most recent road loss, a 69-64 overtime loss to Charlotte, saw the Minutemen up by six with 2 minutes, 6 seconds remaining. Back in December, UMass dropped its fifth game in a row, 57-56, on a last-second tip-in at Toledo. In both games, just one less mistake could have meant a win.

"We just have to keep the games within striking distance," Kellogg said. "Once you figure out how to win on the road, it becomes easier."

UMass' struggles on the road continued over the winter session as it fell to 1-7 away from the Mullins Center. The Minutemen's lone road win came against then-No. 25 Kansas on Dec. 13.

UMass' play erratic

Minutemen follow impressive wins with disappointing losses

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

After embarrassing losses against Houston and Vanderbilt directly before conference play, the Massachusetts basketball team gave its fans little reason to think an upset victory over Dayton (14-1) was in order.

It was. And the Minutemen did it in impressive fashion – beating the Flyers by 13 points. With the impressive win, a subsequent victory over a lesser Saint Louis team seemed like a sure thing.

It wasn't. After the disappointing loss to the Billikens, a tough home game awaited against Temple and the best player in the Atlantic 10, Dionte Christmas. In keeping with the theme, UMass was impressive and pulled out a five-point win over the Owls in Amherst.

UMass Basketball

Again, UMass continued the trend, losing its following game against Charlotte – bringing its conference record to 2-2 and overall mark to 7-10. The Minutemen bucked the trend on Saturday night losing their second game in a row, falling to La Salle 62-54.

Bonner returns

Seven-footer Luke Bonner made his presence felt in a big way in his return from a knee injury on Dec. 20 against Hofstra. Coming off the bench, Bonner put up career-highs in both points (15) and rebounds (nine), despite playing a meager 18 minutes.

Bonner, who now starts in the low-post alongside Tony Gaffney, has been inconsistent since coming back, but recently had another big game against Charlotte with 15 points and a new career-high 11 rebounds. In 11 games this season (eight starts) Bonner averages 6.4 points and 5.6 rebounds per game. He has also hit 38.5 percent of his 3-point attempts (15-of-39).

With Bonner back in the lineup, 6-foot-6 sophomore Matt Glass has seen his minutes decrease drastically. Instead of playing about 15 minutes per game on the block, Glass' minutes have been cut in half but he's been freer on the wing to shoot 3-pointers.

Wilcher leaves

Redshirt freshman Travon Wilcher decided to leave Amherst in mid-January and transfer to Orono, Maine, where he will play for the Black Bears next season. He is already enrolled in school at the University.

After playing at Lee Academy Prep School in Maine, Wilcher had to sit out last season at UMass until he became eligible. He played in just six games this season, a total of 17 minutes. He finished with four points in his UMass career.

Consistently good

From one game to the next, it's tough to know which UMass team will come to play. But there are two sure things every night: Tony Gaffney's monster effort and 20 points from Ricky Harris.

In 81 games entering this season, Gaffney had exactly zero double-doubles. This season he already has seven, including two near triple-doubles against Boston College and Holy Cross. Gaffney had another one Saturday night, finishing with 19 points and 11 rebounds.

Gaffney averages a team-high 10.8 rebounds and 4.61 blocks per game to go along with 11.5 points. He has the top 10 rebounding performances this season, including three games with 16 or more. Gaffney still ranks in the top 10 in the country in both rebounds (ninth) and blocks (second) per game.

Harris is the team's leading scorer, averaging 18.9 per game. He has been solid from long range, connecting on 54 3-pointers on 40.9 percent efficiency. Harris has the top nine scoring performances this season, including a career-high 35 against Boston College on Dec. 6. He's the only player on the team to have at least 21 points in a game this season. However, Harris struggled Saturday against the Explorers, missing all six 3-point attempts and finishing with a season-low six points. It was just his second game under double figures in scoring.

Up and down play

The consistency just hasn't been there with either point guard Chris Lowe or wing Anthony Gurley. Lowe's numbers go down substantially on the road, while Gurley has struggled with consistency with his 3-point shot; sometimes shying away from driving to the basket.

However, both have been key contributors, with Gurley averaging 11.5 points per game and Lowe averaging a conference-high six assists per game to go along with his scoring average of 11.3. How well the pair plays down the stretch will determine how UMass finishes in the A-10 schedule.

News and notes

Lowe needs just 17 points to become the 41st player in school history to surpass 1,000. Harris reached the mark on Dec. 20 against Hofstra ... Lowe is also close to a landmark in the assist department, needing just 40 assists to surpass Carl Smith to become the school's all-time leader with 634 ... Gaffney has 31 out of the 33 dunks so far this season for the Minutemen. Bonner has taken 12 of the 19 charges ... UMass has traveled 11,111 miles this season on road trips, spanning nine games in seven states ... UMass is ranked 165 in the RPI and 49 in strength of schedule.

countering an early 18-0 run by Charlotte with an 18-1 run of its own.

UMass held a 52-46 lead late in the game, but could not hold on as Ian Anderson knocked down two 3-pointers to force overtime. Charlotte controlled the extra period early and two late 3-pointers by Anthony Gurley werenaseren't enough.

Luke Bonner scored 15 points and added a career-high 11 rebounds, Harris added 19 points and Gaffney had nine points to go with 13 rebounds.

UMass 79, Temple 75

This game pitted the top two scorers in the Atlantic 10 against each other as Temple's Dionte Christmas (21.3 points per game) and Harris (19.4) matched up with one another.

Christmas scored 26 points while Harris scored 24, but the difference was the excellent play of UMass point guard Chris Lowe who had 13 points, 11 assists and six rebounds.

Gurley was 4-offor-6 on 3-pointers and the Minutemen went on a 9-0 run late in the game to seal the win.

Saint Louis 69, UMass 64

The Billikens scorched the Minutemen from 3-point land going 9-offor-17 from 3-point range including 6-offor-9 in the second half. This was a back-and-forth battle that featured 17 lead changes.

Lowe was the leading scorer in the game, notching a season-high 21 points on 10-offor-16 shooting. None of the Billikens had more than 14, although four players hit double figures.

UMass 75, Dayton 62

The Minutemen's first conference game this season took place in UMass coach Derek Kellogg's hometown of Springfield and he led his team to a big win over Dayton, which was 14-1 heading into the game.

The Minutemen snapped open a game that was close at halftime with a 15-0 run in the middle of the second half. Tony Gaffney had an outstanding game with 17 points, seven rebounds and seven blocks.

Vanderbilt 78, UMass 48

The final non-conference game of the schedule was one UMass would like to forget. The Minutemen were outscored 50-25 in the second half and shot 28.6 percent for the game.

Houston 80, UMass 54

All the momentum UMass had from their four-game winning streak quickly ended against the Cougars. The Minutemen had an early 8-2 lead, but that was the highlight of the game as Houston had two players score at least 20 points and forced UMass into 17 turnovers.

UMass 64, IUPUI 57

Harris had 23 points to lead all scorers which included a 3-pointer from 40 feet away at the end of the first half as the Minutemen earned their fourth straight victory.

Solid defense was crucial to the UMass win. The Jaguars never trailed by more then seven the entire game, but thedidn't hold the lead at any point in the second half.

UMass 97, Hofstra 81

This game marked the return of Bonner to the active roster after missing a month with a knee injury. He made an impact in his return scoring 15 points and grabbing nine rebounds.

The Minutemen seemingly could not miss from long range, shooting 15-offor-26 on 3-pointers to bury the Pride.

UMass 61, Kansas 60

This is the biggest win of the season so far for the Minutemen, and could very well end up being the highlight of the season.

Kansas was No. 25 in the nation and the Minutemen were 2-6 having just beaten Holy Cross. Almost nobody outside the UMass locker room gave the Minutemen much of a chance.

UMass shocked everyone by playing evenly with the Jayhawks on the road throughout the entire game. David Gibbs cracked open a tie game with a 3-pointer; his only basket of the game, to put UMass up 53-50 with seven minutes remaining.

Kansas came within one point and had a chance to win after Lowe missed two free throws, but Tony Gaffney altered Sherrod Collins' shot on the Jayhawks final possession and the Minutemen held on to pull off the upset.

UMass' slide reaches 4 games

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The beginning of Atlantic 10 play has not worked out the way Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko wanted.

After an 80-51 home route of Northeastern on Dec. 20, the Minutewomen (8-12, 1-4 A-10) dropped seven of their last nine contests, including its past four conference games.

Here is a look of how UMass did over the winter break, and how these games will impact the rest of its season.

Richmond 82, UMass 68

On Saturday, the Minutewomen lost their fourth straight contest, as A-10 foe Richmond outrebounded UMass on the offensive side of the ball and went on to an easy victory, 82-68.

Senior guard Sakera Young had a career-high 16 points, with 14 of those points coming in the second half. Richmond outscored UMass 33-10 in the final eight minutes of the first half, taking a 51-35 lead. The Minutewomen came within eight points of the Spiders, but a layup and back-to-back 3-pointers halted the surge, and UMass couldn't cut the lead substantially.

Despite Kristina Danella and Stefanie Gerardot along with sophomore forward Cerie Mosgrove scoring in double figures, UMass couldn't get things started early in the first half, falling to Xavier, 83-54, on Jan. 21.

A 31-4 run for the Musketeers put away the Minutewomen early. UMass shot an abysmal 21.2 percent from the field in the first half and were 1-for-12 from 3-point territory.

UMass cut the lead to 18 in the second half, but could not get any closer.

SBU 67, UMass 54

The Minutewomen were again put into an early, first-half deficit, despite breaking the single-season record for 3-pointers, even with a season-low two 3-point field goals on Jan. 17. The Bonnies went on an 12-0 run, aided by several of UMass' 17 turnovers.

Charlotte 67, UMass 53

Danella led the team in scoring for the third straight game, but it wasn't enough to defeat the 49ers at home on Jan. 14. The freshman had 18 points, with only her and Gerardot reaching double figures (10 points) along with a team-best seven rebounds. The second half saw Charlotte build a 19-point cushion and never looked back.

UMass 71, Fordham 62

With a win over the Rams, UMass recorded just its third back-to-back win of the season. Danella led the Minutewomen in scoring for the second straight game, tallying 24 points along with three blocks, two steals and four rebounds. The Minutewomen led by two at halftime with a score of 36-34, and would not trail again for the rest of the game. The Minutewomen could have built on the early conference victory, but dropped four straight games.

UMass 63, N.J.I.T. 50

After the three-game skid, the Minutewomen took advantage of another successful second half offensively and buckled down on the defensive front which translated into the victory over N.J.I.T on Jan. 7. Four UMass players were in double figures, led by Danella who scored 16 second-half points.

BC 89, UMass 55

In its final non-conference game of the season, the Minutewomen again struggled offensively early on; but were forced to play catch-up in the second half on Jan. 4. Gerardot led all scorers with 16 points and six rebounds; but it wasn't enough, as the Eagles dominated in every offensive category. This continued the Minutewomen's losing streak to three games.

RYAN HUNT/COLLEGIAN

Stefanie Gerardot and the slumping Minutewomen have lost four straight conference games including a 29-point setback against Xavier.

BU 82, UMass 75

UMass shot above 50 percent for the second straight game, but couldn't edge the Terriers in a home contest back on Jan. 2. Gerardot added her fourth 20-point game of the season, while guard Diatienna Hill notched a career-high 15 points, but a second half scoring surge did not lead UMass to victory, as it dropped its second straight game.

Seton Hall 79, UMass 74

UMass couldn't hold off visiting Seton Hall back on Dec. 29, despite shooting 58.6 percent in the second half and 51.8 percent for the game. Gerardot and Young, along with junior guard Kim Benton, all scored in double figures, with Gerardot leading the team with 16 points. Danella, who has seen her role and minutes increase throughout the season, got her first collegiate start while adding nine points and seven assists. For the second consecutive game, freshman forward Alesia Howard tied a career-best with six points in nine minutes of action off of the bench.

UMass 82, NU 51

Danella tied the record for most 3-pointers in a game (seven), as the rest of the Minutewomen drained 14 3-pointers to coast to a 31-point victory over the Huskies on Dec. 20. The Minutewomen outscored NU 24-9 off turnovers and led in fast-break points (14-2) along with a 28-18 advantage in points in the paint. The Minutewomen will host Saint Louis at 2 p.m., Saturday, Jan. 31 at the Mullins Center.

Slow starts plague UM during break

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

As the Massachusetts women's basketball team ended its non-conference schedule and opened up Atlantic 10 play for 2009, it quickly became apparent that many of the issues that plagued the team in the past year were there to stay.

Of all the concerns facing UMass coach Marnie Dacko's squad, the way the team has started off games slowly is becoming one of the most glaring.

With a 67-44 defeat by the hands of St. Bonaventure (13-4, 2-0 A-10) on Jan 17, the Minutewomen (8-10, 1-2 A-10) showed once again that, even if they have the ability to hang with a team in the second half, the damage sustained in the first half can be too much.

UMass Basketball

St. Bonaventure's 12-0 game-opening run and 44-21 halftime lead was another case of the Minutewomen failing to match their opponents out of the gate. On many occasions, UMass has been simply blown out in the first half of games only to play evenly with the same opponent in the second half.

Even though the Minutewomen came into the second half with a 23-point deficit against the Bonnies, the second half was an evenly played affair, with both teams putting up 23 points.

On the season, UMass has been outscored in the first half by an average of 35-28.8. In the second half, though, the Minutewomen have averaged a 33.7-32 edge.

The slow starts have become commonplace for UMass since the break. In its last 11 games the team has led at the half twice, going 4-7 in that time frame.

With 11 games left in the season, freshman Kristina Danella's 3-pointer in the first half against St. Bonaventure, the team's 118th 3-point shot of the season, broke the school record for 3-pointers in a single season. To date, UMass is shooting 33.8 percent from behind the arc, accumulating 133 3-pointers.

This program milestone is indicative of the new style of offense that has emerged for the Minutewomen this season. With sharpshooters like Danella and sophomore Cerie Mosgrove, who has already shattered the individual school record for 3-pointers in a season with 43, and senior Stefanie Gerardot, the team's leading scorer, Dacko has acknowledged that her team does rely on the three.

Outside of the team's deep threats, the offense receives contributions from guards senior Sakera Young and redshirt sophomore Diatienna Hill, who have the ability to slash to the hoop, in addition to an interior presence in sophomore Teya Wright. However, three of the team's top four scorers have taken at least 25 3-pointers so far this season.

The drastic shift in what the Minutewonien are doing on offense can be attributed to the newly adopted dribble-drive offense of the men's team and graduation. The losses of last year's squad, which included standouts Kate Mills and Pam Rosario, has changed UMass into a shoot-first, dribble-second team. According to Dacko, the Minutewomen are trying to avoid putting the ball on the floor and are looking for success by shooting the ball along the perimeter.

Starting with a 24-point effort against Northeastern on Dec. 20, which almost doubled her career total, Danella has quickly emerged as one of the biggest scoring threats on the Minutewomen. Since hitting her stride in the team's offense and working her way into the starting lineup, Danella has become the No. 2 scoring threat on the team behind Gerardot.

"I've asked Danella to shoot the ball 20 times a game," Dacko said. "And when she does that, when she takes 17 shots, we're usually winning ball games."

Despite waiting until the mid-point of the season to breakout, Danella is already the second highest scorer for UMass this season behind Gerardot. She also currently leads the team in 3-point field goal percentage with 42.6 percent.

Year and was named to the Men's College Scholar All-American First Team by NSCAA/adidas and the TopDrawerSoccer.com Team of the Season Second-Team.

Also receiving awards during the break were members of the football team, including punter Brett Arnold (The Sports Network All-America 1st team), safety Jeromy Miles (2nd team), offensive lineman Vladimir Ducasse and cornerback Courtney Robinson (honorable mentions).

Arnold and Robinson were also named to the I-CAC All-Star Team, along with linebacker Josh Jennings.

Former Minuteman goaltender Jonathan Quick (2005-07) is making the most of his time as the starting goalie for the NHL's Los Angeles Kings. In 13 games (11 starts), Quick has a 6-5 record with a 2.54 goals-against average and a save percentage of .916, which leads the team.

Quick, 23, played in three games last season, including two starts. He was selected as the 72nd overall pick in the third round of the 2005 NHL Draft by the Kings. He signed with the team days after the 2006-07 season ended; UMass lost to Maine in the quarterfinals of its first-ever NCAA tournament.

Former UMass basketball star Gary Forbes may be close to finding himself in the professional ranks as well. Forbes is averaging 16.4 points per game this season in the NBA Developmental League, ranking 39th in the league, despite mostly coming off the bench. His 41.8 percent shooting from 3-point range ranks 13th in the league.

Forbes was traded from the Sioux Falls Skyforce to the Tulsa 66ers on Jan. 20. He is a strong candidate to sign a 10-day contract with an NBA team at some point this season.

Brown goes south, Morris takes over

After five years as the UMass offensive coordinator, Kevin Morris was tabbed by athletic director John McCutcheon to become head coach of the Minutemen on Jan. 19, replacing former coach Don Brown.

After a five-year stint as head coach of the Minutemen, Don Brown decided to step down as coach to take the defensive coordinator position at Maryland; he finished his tenure with a 49-13 record.

Former offensive coordinator introduced as new head coach

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts quarterback Liam Coen jokingly sent a text message to Kevin Morris on Jan. 19.

"You should have gotten the job a couple of years earlier, and then I really would have been able to light it up,'" read Coen's message to his former offensive coordinator.

Next season nobody knows which quarterback will be marching the offense down the field at McGuirk Stadium, but we now know which coach will roam the sidelines – as Morris was announced officially as UMass head coach during a Jan. 19 press conference in Amherst.

UMass athletic director John McCutcheon elevated Morris, 44, to run the program from his position of offensive coordinator, where he served for five years under former head coach Don Brown – who resigned to become the defensive coordinator at the University of Maryland on Jan. 9.

"It's a tremendous program and for the last five years my family and I have been extremely happy out here at the University of Massachusetts . . . and having the opportunity to lead the program is one that I'm excited about and we're looking to further progress we've made over the past five years," Morris said at the press conference.

Morris' contract runs for five years. Financial terms were not announced.

The search for Brown's replacement began immediately after his departure, and included a list of 40 potential candidates which were reduced to nine that had formal interviews.

"In the end analysis, I think we got an individual who knows UMass football, who's familiar with the program, who will bring energy, new excitement, new ideas and a new vision for our program," McCutcheon said. "He's going to represent the program with class and integrity."

Prior to his five years at UMass, Morris spent four years in the same role serving under Brown at Northeastern from 2000-03. Morris got into coaching immediately after graduating from Williams College in 1986, joining the Albany coaching staff for two seasons.

He then moved on to

Brown resigns to run defense at Maryland

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Three weeks after pulling out of the running for the head coaching vacancy at Yale, Don Brown pulled out of his position as the University of Massachusetts coach to become the defensive coordinator at the University of Maryland.

In five years as UMass head coach, Brown reached the national championship game in 2006, made another playoff appearance in 2007 and finished his tenure with a 43-19 overall record.

UMass athletic director John McCutcheon released a statement after Brown's announcement on Jan. 9.

"We want to thank Don Brown for his contributions to the University of Massachusetts and the athletic department as the head coach of the Minutemen," McCutcheon said. "He has prepared us for great success in the future. We wish him good luck in his new endeavors. A national search for his successor is already underway."

Brown released a statement through media relations.

"I am extremely proud of my time at UMass. During the five-year period we experienced tremendous success as a football family. I am proud of the fact that our senior class was the winningest in the history of UMass football," Brown said.

"I want to thank Chancellor Robert Holub and Athletic Director John McCutcheon for their outstanding leadership for the football program and the entire athletic department. I am proud of the fact that I have been a part of every NCAA playoff victory at UMass since 1998. I will always hold a special place in my heart for the University of Massachusetts."

Maryland, an Atlantic Coast Conference team in the Football Bowl Subdivision, finished the 2008 season with an 8-5 record, including a 42-35 win over Nevada in the Humanitarian Bowl. Its defensive coordinator during the season, Chris Cosh, left to take the same position at Kansas State following the season.

In his final season at UMass, Brown and the Minutemen struggled. Known for his tough defensive teams, Brown and the defense had a down season, finishing with a 7-5 overall record and missing the postseason for the first time in three years.

The defense allowed a Don Brown-era-worst average of 26.8 points per game in 2008, compared to a 19.2 average in 2007, a 13.3 average in 2006, a 13.3 average in 2005 and a 23.3 average in 2004, his first season.

UMass remains inconsistent

BY SCOTT FELDMAN AND JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the fall semester ended, the Massachusetts men's basketball team had started 2-6 and seemed to be going nowhere. Since then the Minutemen's (7-11, 2-3 Atlantic 10) season has been a rollercoaster ride featuring a number of impressive victories (at home over Dayton and Temple and on the road against then- No.25 Kansas) and back-to-back blowout defeats against Houston and Vanderbilt. Here's what you may have missed during winter break.

LA SALLE 62, UMASS 54

UMass' final game before classes resumed on campus was a loss to La Salle at the Mullins Center. The Explorers (11-7, 2-2 A-10) took the lead from the Minutemen with 10 minutes, 47 seconds remaining in the first half and never let go.

La Salle built up a 13- point lead at one point, but UMass clawed-worked its way back to within one on two occasions in the final eight minutes of the game.

Tony Gaffney was a spark for the Minutemen when they needed it the most, but it was still not enough. When the deficit was 13, Gaffney helped put together a 6-0 run, scoring four points and forcing a turnover that turned into an easy two points for Ricky Harris.

The two by Harris was the only two he scored in the first half and the A-10's third leading scorer was held to just six in the game; the Explorers held Harris, the third leading scorer in the conference, to six points. The output was the lowest of the season for Harris, who finished 3-of-11 on the night and 0-of-6 from 3-point range.

This game featured both teams making major runs, with UMass

Tony Gaffney and the Minutemen have gone 5-5 over the winter session. UMass has earned impressive victories over Temple, Kansas and Dayton, but also suffered blowout losses to Vanderbilt and Houston.

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon tried not to repeat the fall of his team that occurred in the intersession of the 2007-08 season, but his team's record looks just the same this season.

UMass (10-11-3, 5-7-3 Hockey East) has been inconsistent for the majority of the season, and this January was no different. The Minutemen have gone 2-5-2 since Dec. 28; last season the Minutemen were 2-5-1 for the intersession. They now sit seventh in the conference.

NO. 7 VERMONT 1, UMASS 1 (OT)

Vermont was the first to score with 10 minutes left in the Jan. 24 match up, but the Minutemen didn't stay behind for long when Casey Wellman received a pass from James Marcou on the power play to tie the game with 7:16 left in regulation. Neither team managed to score in the extra period, and the game ended in a tie.

Paul Dainton made the start in net making 27 saves. UMass was 1-of-7 on the man advantage while Vermont was 0-for-5.

Special teams led the way for Vermont in its win over UMass on Jan. 23 when it scored a short-handed goal in the first period and a power play goal in the second.

Alex Berry cut into Vermont's lead with three minutes left in the third. Doug Kubin collected a failed clear from the Vermont zone and sent a pass to Marcou. Berry was down low and Marcou passed to him for the goal.

The Minutemen outshot the Catamounts 26-19, with Dainton making 17 saves in goal. UMass went 0-of-8 on the power play, while Vermont was 1-of-4.

Spring sports starting in coming weeks

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With classes starting, UMass students have to brave the weather as they walk to classes over the next few months or so until winter ends. But frigid weather and a little snow on the ground won't stop spring season beginning a little early for the UMass athletic department.

Men's and women's lacrosse seasons begin in early February, softball starts Feb. 6 and tennis starts even earlier on the first of February. The baseball team has a little extra time off, with its season beginning on Feb. 27.

The rowing team had a training trip in Florida on Jan. 7 and doesn't pick up its schedule until March 21 for a scrimmage. The men's and women's skiing teams each had six events over Winter Break, as their respective schedules are busy over the next few weeks.

MEN'S LACROSSE

UMass has scrimmages on both Jan. 31 (at Drexel in Cross River, N.Y.) and on Feb. 7 at home against Army.

The Minutemen will have to play both of those games – and the entire season – without last year's second-leading goal scorer Peter McNichols. The sophomore standout attack is academically ineligible this season.

Star goalkeeper Doc Schneider will be back this year for his senior season. Schneider was recently named an honorable mention All-American by Inside Lacrosse/Face-Off Magazine.

The women's team doesn't have a scrimmage scheduled this season.

POLL POSITION

The UMass softball team was picked to once again top the Atlantic 10 in a poll conducted by the league's coaches. They have won all 38 conference games in the past two seasons. Only once in the last 14 years have they failed to win the conference title.

The baseball team was selected to finish 11th out of 14 teams in the A-10. UMass coach Mike Stone recently named seniors Adam Tempesta and Jim Macdonald and junior Brian Baudinet as team captains this upcoming season.

SIMMONS PASSED UP

Zack Simmons, by all accounts the greatest goalkeeper in UMass history, was not one of 60 players to hear his name called at the MLS Super Draft on Jan. 15. Simmons was set to be taken according to some experts' mock drafts. However, only five goalkeepers were taken in the four-round draft.

Simmons did, however, receive some better news during the break, receiving numerous honors. Simmons was named the 2008 New England Soccer News Men's Player of the University of Massachusetts juniors Gisel Saillant, Shane Coleman and Genevive Forges are among 12 UMass students who attended the 24th Annual National Black Student Leadership Development Conference (NBSLDC), held from Jan. 8 to Jan. 11 in Washington, D.C.

The Office of Programs and Services for ALANA Students (OPSAS) sponsored the students' attendance at the conference, which featured keynote speakers such as hip-hop activist, journalist, community organizer and vice presidential candidate for the Green Party Rosa Clemente, journalist and author Roland S. # SALE donates, sells textbooks

BY LISA DEBENEDICTIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As students wearily set out to purchase new textbooks for the spring semester while braving the harsh cold and even harsher prices, a student organization at the University of Massachusetts offers another option.

Students Against Lack of Education (SALE), is holding a textbook sale from Monday Jan. 26 through Friday Jan. 30, in the Berkshire Dining Commons from 5 to 8 p.m. At the end of last semester, the members of SALE collected textbooks donated by UMass students, and are now selling them back at half price. In addition to paying less for textbooks, students can help a greater cause, as all of the sales proceeds will be donated to higher education in East Africa.

"We work with non-profit organizations in East Africa, buying text books for students in secondary schools. We work with them to sort of tailor their interests," explained UMass student and founder of SALE, Kenneth Sentamu.

SALE was founded by several UMass students on campus in 2007. At the end of each semester, the organization collects books from the Five College area and sells them back for half price to students at the beginning of the next. Rather than attempt to sell back their textbooks for a highly discounted price at the end of the semester, SALE hopes to persuade students to donate their books, and buy other textbooks from them for half of their full price.

"One hundred percent of the money goes to the organization … to Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, 15 schools in those three countries, and helps them buy textbooks or fund education related projects," Sentamu said.

SALE works in conjunction with another organization, Teachers for East Africa Alumni Association (TEAA), which is an organization within the United State Agency for International Development (USAID). According to Sentamu, he learned of TEAA in part because two of its members are Smith College professors and another one teaches at UMass.

"We sell the UMass textbooks, get the revenues and send them to the organization, and in return the organization will send a receipt of all the projects that they have completed. They send us their proposals first. We work together. These are classrooms of 80 kids and if they are lucky, the teacher has the only textbook. And a lot of times, there is no textbook," said Sentamu.

According to SALE's website, umassale.org, the organization's primary focus is to aid higher education in developing countries.

"Most families in developing countries are forced to choose between financing their children's education or ensuring the health care of the entire family. Even those families that have the funds to provide education for their families only have enough funds to do so for some and in the end, the victims of this affair tend to be the girls, who are relegated to family chores rather than allowed to finish their education," said the members of SALE in a statement on their website.

As a UMass student born in Africa, Sentamu urges students to donate and buy books at the sale, but also to keep in mind just how privileged they are to study in the United States.

"I founded this organization, because I was born in Uganda, and I had the privilege of being able to get an education here, which is something that most people are unable to do because of the financial funding. Even the poorest schools here, they have the funding, they have the books, they have the technology," said Sentamu. "Over there, even the richest schools don't always have the textbooks or the technology. Help these kids get the proper education."

Students look over textbooks at the tables set up by Students Against Lack of Education (SALE) in Berkshire Dining Hall today. The organization will be holding the book sale every night in Berkshire from 5 to 8 p.m. this week, and is always accepting book donations from students.

Survival center holds 'Bowl'

BY MATT ROCHELEAU

Around 500 people will get the opportunity to be served by such local celebrities as University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert Holub and head men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg tonight at Amherst Survival Center's first annual "Empty Bowls Dinner" benefit, which sold out over the weekend, according to a statement from the center.

The meal, served at The Pub on 15 E. Pleasant St. in Amherst, will feature hearty soup, freshly baked bread and salad provided by local restaurants and businesses to assist the Center in trying to help fight local hunger.

Despite recent cutbacks, the 34-year-old Survival Center is "expanding its food pantry, meal service, health clinic and other programs to meet the region's growing needs," the statement said.

"The 'Empty Bowls Dinner' is a great way to support those who have been hit hardest in the recession," said Cheryl Zoll, the Center's executive director. "They need your help more than ever."

The benefit, sponsored by The Pub and People's Bank, "comes at a critical time for the Survival Center," the statement said.

Demand for services at the agency rose by nearly 30 percent in the last year as the global economy weakened and forced the state to cut some of its funding to the Center, according to the statement.

MBA students at the Isenberg School of Management (ISOM) helped publicize the event.

Through a student organization called Net Impact UMass Amherst, students are serving as board fellows on the Amherst Survival Center board. According to the ISOM website, Net Impact UMass Amherst, an affiliate of a larger Net Impact organization, seeks to improve the world "by growing and strengthening a network of leaders who use the power of business to make a positive net social, environmental, and economic impact."

Other guest waiters will include Amherst Town Manager Larry Shaffer, state Sen. Stanley Rosenberg and state Rep. Ellen Story, said Kara Kharmah, an MBA student at Isenberg helping to organize the benefit.

Each guest will receive a hand-crafted bowl by local artisans and will have the chance to bid in a silent auction that includes glass bowls by Northampton artist Josh Simpson. Though he is a local resident, Simpson's work has obtained international recognition and is displayed in collections worldwide, including those of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and Canada's Royal Ontario Museum.

Though all tickets are sold out, the agency accepts donations online through http://people.umass.edu/support.asc/

Hillel hosts Israel trip for volunteers

BY JOSH WALCUTCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Jewish student organization UMass Hillel, in partnership with Brandeis Hillel and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, spent eight days over winter break volunteering in Northern Israel.

Eighteen of the students involved in the program were from UMass, and throughout their visit they worked on a variety of community service projects in the city of Ma'alot-Tarshiha. Ma'alot-Tarshiha was hit with almost 700 Katyusha rockets during the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006.

Students spent their mornings split into three groups working on different projects in a variety of low-income housing neighborhoods. Stairways and lobbies were repainted and cleaned, park benches were refurbished and fading shrubbery were replanted. Students also got the chance to work alongside a local artist to transform an old concrete outdoor bench into mosaic artwork.

Throughout the trip, locals of Ma'alot began to wonder why the students devoted their free time to come help their community.

"An older man stopped by and asked us why we were in Israel. When we explained that we came from America to help out in the community, he reached into his bag and gave apples to our students and the neighborhood children," said Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, a UMass trip leader. "Despite the fact that he was struggling to make ends meet, he, like so many in the neighborhood, opened their doors and their hearts to us, doing whatever they could to let us know how much this meant to them."

Afternoons were spent bonding with the community of Ma'alot. Groups split up time between a home for the elderly, a battered women's shelter and a children's afternoon daycare held in a local

What is your opinion on this matter?

With all the "hype" surrounding President Barack Obama's recent inauguration, do you think that the new administration will live up to Americans' expectations, or do you think people are setting their hopes too high?

"It's going to be hard for Obama because he's in a position to deal with everything that Bush messed up. He is basically starting from square one. Obama has made a lot of promises for change in his campaign and everyone is hoping for everything to get better right away, but that's unrealistic. I think he can change problems with artificial climate change and global warming. The issue is becoming more high profile, and I feel Obama will do more to raise the amount of research, awareness and funding for the environment."

-Courtney Tanner

Electrical Engineering major

"Generally, people are expecting too much because we still have foreign, economic and resource problems. But the great thing about Obama is he is a great speaker and he has the values that we need to go in the right direction. Obama will give people more hope for the future and if people have faith in him they will be less nervous about the state of the economy and more likely to spend money and stimulate the economy. He won't solve all the problems, but he will put us on the right path."

-Jason Dvorsky

Spanish major

"I think it's a good change, but people are expecting too much from a single person. What Obama does accomplish will not be enough for people to see because too much damage has been done to our country already. If there is change, it will be gradual. I think he'll do a great job with health care, but foreign policy will be a problem because issues with Israel and America's role in their problems will have to be decided. There are a lot of expectations for Obama particularly because of his race. There are people in this country who may not even appreciate what he does accomplish because they do not want a black president."

-Ximena Caniz

Finance major

"I think people are expecting too much. People want to see some huge, dramatic change, but Obama has no concrete plan. It will take longer than eight years, if he's even elected that long, to fulfill his promises. The rebound of the economy and housing market will take longer than people would like, and the loss of jobs will not be created easily. Also, we're still continuing to go into more debt with the war, so the money issues with that have not even started to rebound yet."

"Working in Ma'alot was a wonderful experience. For me, it was incredible to learn the personal stories of the teenage girls who I worked with at the women's center and to interact with the community," said UMass senior Sophie Krentzman.

Three days before students set off on their short-term community service trip, Israeli F-16 strike fighters launched a series of attacks in the Gaza Strip, which borders southern Israel. An Israeli ground invasion of Gaza followed a few days later.

"I felt completely safe despite the war raging in [southern Israel]. The people of Nahariya were living their lives completely normally despite the possibility of an impending war. I think by example they taught us all to do the same," said Brandeis sophomore Naomi Iser.

Although no students were harmed during the visit to Israel, three Katyusha rockets landed in Nahariya the day the trip ended. Nahariya was the city in which both the UMass and Brandeis students stayed during their trip.

"The trip is an experience I will remember for a very long time, and I know the work we completed in the city will make an impact for years to come," said Krentzman.

Each student paid for a portion of the trip's cost, while the rest was subsidized by Hillel's Ride to Provide fundraiser.

Mideast peace, first step

By Warren P. Strobel
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON—With the Middle East still roiling over Israel's three-week intervention in Gaza, President Barack Obama dispatched his new Middle East peace envoy, George Mitchell, to the region Monday night with a call for "genuine progress," and "not just photo ops."

Obama emphasized that Mitchell was "fully empowered" to speak for the White House, a departure from the diplomacy of his predecessor, George W. Bush, and a calculated signal of serious intent to Israeli and Arab leaders.

In office less than a week, Obama has moved more rapidly than any predecessor to launch a vigorous diplomatic effort in the Arab-Israeli conflict. It was Obama's second public appearance with former Sen. Mitchell and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in the past five days.

What's not yet known is how Obama will deal with the setbacks his efforts will inevitably encounter in the Middle East minefield. The landscape for diplomacy is bleak, with an Israeli public deeply skeptical of peace efforts and about to vote in national elections and Palestinians split between the moderate Palestinian Authority and the radical Islamic group Hamas.

Appearing before the cameras in the Cabinet Room at the White House, Obama acknowledged that his envoy has "a very tough job."

Still, he said, Mitchell will "engage vigorously and consistently in order for us to achieve genuine progress. And when I say progress, not just photo ops, but progress that is concretely felt by people on the ground."

"Understand that Senator Mitchell is going to be fully empowered by me and fully empowered by Secretary Clinton. So when he speaks, he will be speaking for us," the president added.

State Department officials said Mitchell's mission has three goals.

He will listen to regional leaders' views on an eventual Israeli-Palestinian settlement. But negotiations begun by former President George W. Bush are in limbo until Israeli elections two weeks from now, and polls show former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who opposes compromise, as the front-runner.

A large picture of President Obama hangs over the crowd. Among his first acts is to send George Mitchell as a peace envoy to the Middle East.

More immediately, Mitchell will try to stabilize an unofficial cease-fire between Israel and Hamas in the Gaza Strip following a month of fighting that left hundreds of Palestinians dead and billions of dollars in damage.

Obama's broader peace initiative "is not going to take off" unless the cease-fire can be strengthened, said a State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Just before leaving office, the Bush administration signed an agreement with Israel committing the United States to helping stop weapons from being smuggled to Hamas and other radical groups in Gaza. The United States has also pledged training and technical assistance to Egypt to help it detect tunnels on its Gaza border used for smuggling.

Mitchell will not meet representatives of Hamas, which the United States considers a terrorist group, nor, at least on this trip, will he travel to Syria, said State Department spokesman Robert Wood.

Mitchell's itinerary includes Israel, the West Bank, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and possibly Turkey, but he has no plans to visit Gaza. He also will confer with U.S. allies in Europe.

The third goal of Mitchell's trip is to ensure that humanitarian aid is delivered swiftly to Gaza's needy citizens. Since taking office, Obama and Clinton have gone out of their way to sympathize with the Palestinians' plight.

Even if Obama's foray into peacemaking is no more successful than previous presidents', the new president has set a different tone with the Arab world. Bush waited seven years before trying to broker talks, rarely got involved personally and often sent his special envoys into the region without explicitly empowering them to speak for him.

Speakers discuss race and leadership tasks

changes," said Forges. "[The conference] really made it a point to say that you can ... be more than a person going through the motions of life. If you see problems you can speak out. You don't have to be complacent."

Sponsored by the Stuart Educational Leadership Group, the conference is a combination of workshops and speakers aiming to increase effective leadership among diverse students who are a part of predominantly white college campuses.

"It was about creating leaders, but I think it went a little beyond that. It was more about developing us as people," said Coleman. "It was about learning how to hold yourself among others."

Presenting workshops and lectures at over 400 universities, conferences, rallies and other venues, Clemente shared input on how to create avenues for individual and group expression. She told the students that starting off small and building the community was an important way to start an organization, rather than necessarily traveling to other countries. As an independent journalist, she traveled to New Orleans 10 days after Hurricane Katrina.

"She talked about her role and helping Hurricane Katrina victims, and she talked about things that people try to make look clean and push under the carpet," Forges said. "For me, Rosa Clemente was really memorable because ... she was just real. All the keynote speakers were great, but she said what she wanted to say and she said what was on her mind even when it made other people cringe and she was just honest and it spoke to me."

Clemente also helped to create La Voz Boriken, a social political organization at Cornell University that supports Puerto Rican political prisoners and independence movements, according to Independent Political Report. Protesting against the use of Puerto Rico and the neighboring island-municipality of Vieques as military colonies, the United States finally removed its naval base, once one of the largest bases in the world, from Puerto Rico, according to The Los Angeles Times.

Clemente spoke of her work in Puerto Rico, its history as the oldest colony of the United States, and her belief that it should be a free nation.

Bakari Sellers also proved to be an empowering speaker for all three students, as America's youngest state legislator at 24, a law student, and the son of Cleveland Sellers, a veteran of the Civil Rights Movement.

In his speech, Sellers told students about how he was able to beat an incumbent that had been in office for 25 years.

Recognized as one of the most influential journalists and political pundits of his time as a CNN analyst, TV One Cable Network commentator and senior analyst for the Tom Joyner Morning Show, Martin also had some practical advice for participants in the conference.

Martin spoke of his previous attendance to the very same conference in 1988, where he met some of the very people that aided in his success. He urged students to make contacts and network at the conference as well.

Participants also attended various workshops where facilitators led a group discussion.

"I went to a workshop called Shero, a [woman] hero basically," said Forges, "And it was about Michelle Obama ... and how she's changing the face and image of the black woman in America. That we're strong and we're not what some societies might think of us. That we're not just video girls."

There was also a workshop focusing on the relationship between blacks and Latinos as well as stereotypical ideas about relations within minority categories.

The facilitator discussed how Latinos and blacks interact with each other and how they are grouped together by other ethnicities.

The idea of assumptions stemming from the habit of grouping several ethnicities under the umbrella of "Latino" or "black" resonated with Forges' experiences, as well.

"I'm Haitian-American and I'm under the title of black, and I think that you can't just label someone black or Latina because ... it's not like that," Forges said. "They're completely different cultures. I'm Haitian. I have no idea [about] the culture of a person from Kenya ... but we're both [categorized as] black but there's not really true knowledge each other."

Coming back from the conference, the students felt motivated to put what they learned into practice on campus. All UMass participants are planning a presentation to reflect on and share what happened at the conference with others.

"Basically we want to bring the campus together and not be so divided between different RSOs [Registered Student Organizations] and ... bring all these people together to be more be more diverse and unified in our efforts," Forges said.

"I would say before the conference I knew [of the other UMass participants] and passed them by on campus ... but the conference helped me get to know them in this short amount of time and know we're friends at the end of day," he continued.

"I've thought it's a big school people can have better relationships. It doesn't have to be like, 'OK that's that person and they're doing their own thing and I'm doing mine.' We can actually connect."

"Seeing people at the conference and having all those leaders in the room, I learned that everyone in the group should have the opportunity to step up and be a leader and that everyone can benefit from doing more than they have to," said Coleman.

Degrees, debt and the disgruntled

Hannah Nelson

Back in October, MeritAid.com reported the results of a study that showed that 16 percent of prospective college students are going to postpone college with close to 50 percent reconsidering whether they can afford it.

Past collegiate trends in economic slumps have shown that many students will turn to graduate school and such programs when the job market is starting to look thin. The irony is that instead of starting to pay off existing loans, students will continue to rack up more.

But in the absence of choice for many, it's a more desirable alternative to moving back home. There also lies the hope that with a higher degree there'll be greater opportunity when the time comes again to find funding. To quote numerous information experts agree.

There are graduate admissions officers who justify that the push into graduate programs will give students a firmer foundation when they do enter the work place, whether or not it has gotten less rocky by that point. The conflicting opinions seem to be more realistic with the belief that even after financial assistance many hopefuls still won't be able to fund graduate studies.

Applications are already showing early signs of rising regardless of the shrinking private loan options.

It has been speculated since the 1990s that a four-year degree just doesn't offer the same competitive edge that it used to. But with the economy in the bind that it is, I can't help but beg the question – what amount of higher level education is really going to be the leg up that it needed in the current situation?

Higher level jobs are minimal for those in the liberal arts fields, with old jokes lingering about finding work only in food services. MBA students can only hope that by the time their graduation rolls around that the economy will have steadied in time for their job market debut.

And it's no wonder that law schools have seen numbers lagging given that the profession has one of the highest suicide rates.

As for paying for graduate school, some students are taking both traditional and untraditional steps to paying their way.

Armed services recruitment numbers are up for the first time in four years, with many students – high school and undergraduate levels – taking the most traditional stand-by in hand for funding their education.

As for paying for graduate school, some students are taking both traditional and untraditional steps to paying their way.

In August, colleges are expected to start seeing an influx of veterans due to the 21st Century GI Bill replacing the Montgomery GI Bill. It will guarantee tuition, living expenses and other fees in their residency state to any public institution after 36 months of active duty – an opportunity to too good for many college hopefuls to pass up.

Some students however are taking very untraditional steps, such as Natalie Dylan (a pseudonym), the 22-year-old college graduate who has put her virginity up for sale, with bids up to more than $3 million sale through a Nevada prostitution website. There are 10,000 interested parties participating in the legal bidding.

Though with a possible book deal in the works and a "transaction" (Nevada's word, not mine) yet to take place, I won't be the first to suggest that the follow-through may have been a gimmick as a means to get publicity for a better deal. Lifetime Television has to be just itching to get its hands on the rights for a made-for-TV movie.

The idea of the gap year has actually become more of a reinvented luxury alternative rather than a grace period. The latest programming options promise firmer foundations for incoming students offering real-life experiences that are combinations of internships and study abroad programs that essentially cost the same as or more than a semester at college.

But traditional speaking, it's no great secret that the gap year can often lead to an abyss of college postponement. Some students are opting instead for part-time enrollment so they can work alongside a lightened class schedule. Many more are using the trusty standby of going to some sort of two-year program or community college for starters.

As I sat writing this in my local library over break, I couldn't help but overhear a neighboring conversation and the unsettling relevance it had to what I was researching.

The conversation was between two guys in their early 20s who were discussing unemployment in Massachusetts for young graduates. One of the 20-somethings had been out of state for a while working and the other had had to move back in with his parents to cut costs as he started to search for jobs to pay off his student loans.

They discussed teaching, communications and food service opportunities in Amherst. I couldn't help but wonder if I was getting an eerie peak at my own future.

Presidential skepticism

Eric Magazu

A more equal, safer Palestine

This week, America is continuing to celebrate the Inauguration of Barack Obama as the 44th president of the United States. While the most important attributes of a president are character, integrity and the love and fear of God, Obama's additional attribute – his ethnic heritage – does not represent the majority population and is indeed a remarkable achievement for America.

This celebration stands in marked contrast with the recent slaughter of more than 1,000 civilians in Gaza. No amount of punditry can dispel what our eyes plainly see. The call of compassion must not be limited to our preferred ethnic, religious or ideological associations, because true compassion extends without regard to nation, party or any other distinction.

Experts tell us to blame Hamas, the Palestinian resistance group, for the butchery, but they fail to properly explain the history of the land known as Palestine. The precise definition of this land has changed with the differing occupying regimes, but today Palestine would generally be thought to include Israel itself – along with the occupied territories of Gaza and the West Bank.

The mainstream media in America doesn't teach us properly about the history of Palestine, resulting in a major disconnect between Americans and the rest of the world. Americans often view Palestinian Arabs as being intransigent by not allowing Israel the right to exist and accepting a two-state solution.

This does not correctly reflect history.

Arabs have traditionally viewed Palestine as one area within a much larger region, but Zionism has a different conception of the land. It is the ideology that underlies the modern state of Israel.

Zionism is a national movement founded a little more than 100 years ago. At the time, Zionism reflected the trend among European ethnic groups toward asserting a national identity.

Zionism is not based upon religion. It is unique among European ethnic nationalisms in that it combines a subset of people from many ethnic groups. The vast majority of early Zionists were Jews from Russia and Eastern Europe, who immigrated to Palestine to escape anti-Semitism and in the hope of establishing idealistic socialist communities.

Zionism remains largely disconnected from the practice of Judaism as a religion, as the vast majority of Israelis are secular. Most haredi (ultra-Orthodox) Jews remain opposed to Zionism as a matter of religious law.

While deficient in religious sensibilities, Zionists use unsupported biblical claims to assert a right to an ethnically-exclusive homeland in Palestine.

This is where the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians occurs.

It would be as if a group of non-Americans were to immigrate into Wyoming, refuse to follow American law and then declare a brand new nation-state that excluded or rendered as second-class the Americans who lived in Wyoming.

Even if we add to the consideration that most of Wyoming is presently uninhabited, it is hard to envision many Americans accepting a two-state partition of Wyoming.

Likewise, it seems absurd and morally disingenuous for America to pressure Palestinian Arabs to accept a two-state solution. Even if Palestinians make this concession, Israeli settlements have divided the occupied territories so that it would be extremely difficult to establish a contiguous landmass to suitable for a Palestinian state.

Within Israel, Arab citizens encounter discrimination – both in the attitudes of Israelis as well as in unequal treatment in the rights of land ownership, marriage and immigration. While there are many countries that are far worse offenders than Israel, the difference is that Israel is a Western-style democracy and should be expected to live up to this moniker.

Increasingly, both practically and morally, as well as using our own experiences in America as a guide, what seems to be the fairest solution is to establish a single state encompassing all of Palestine.

In such a state, all citizens would be equal before the law. The safety and rights of Jews, Arabs and others would be inviolate. This should not spell the destruction of anyone's ethnic, religious or ideological identity. As in America, there would still be considerable leeway to establish local traditions and customs within individual towns and villages.

Discussing the situation in the Holy Land is always difficult, especially considering that advocacy for Israel has replaced religious observance as a marker of identity among the vast majority of American Jews.

However, if anything, the safety and security of Jews – by extension Americans – is threatened throughout the world by the use of terror among some extremists. These extremists justify their actions in their own minds by the pervasive sentiment in Arab and Muslim communities over the injustice of the situation in Palestine.

As America celebrates its successes in overcoming past wrongs and yearns to live true to its ideal of extending liberty and justice to all people, all Americans of good will earnestly pray that Obama receive the blessings of Providence in all that he does to effect these ends.

While we pursue our national objectives, we must never forget to bind up the brokenhearted and to declare freedom for the captives, wherever they may be throughout the world.

Increasingly, both practically and morally, as well as using our own experiences in America as a guide, what seems to be the fairest solution is to establish a single state encompassing all of Palestine.

Michael Phillis

Let those who seek to advance [illegible] inducing terror and [illegible] measures, we say to you very clearly that our spirit is stronger [illegible] and cannot be broken. You cannot [illegible] and we will defeat you. Our patchwork heritage is a strength, not a weakness. We can [illegible] that ... our common interests shall reveal [illegible] must play its [illegible] in a new era [illegible] words from the American value will not hold [illegible] face of a terrorist attack [illegible] traumatized [illegible] security and [illegible] American soil in the aftermath of Sept. 11.

Bin Laden believes that our democratic ideals and Constitutional principles would be doomed to collapse when the lust for revenge rise after an attack. In short, we as a country will forfeit our moral clarity and perish.

This is their bet.

I have no concern for the accuracy of Suskind's claims of al-Qaida's game plan. These conclusions do, however, force this country to consider questions that stretch beyond military force – moral clarity and our American ethical framework are themselves weapons in this fight.

Bush spoke to this idea of America's moral foundation as well, but he has his actions to show his interpretation of the source of American strength and influence.

The famed "You're either with us or against us." views expressed by Bush right after Sept. 11 was the beginning. What followed is already written in the pages of history. From the formation of Guantanamo Bay detention camp, suspension of habeas corpus for some, the use of torture to perhaps the most dramatic of all – the forging of a letter from Saddam Hussein's top intelligence official, Tahir Jalil Habbush, saying there was development of weapons of mass destruction. This is the same Iraqi official who had met with intelligence officials in Jordan a little more than a month before the start of the Iraq war. He credibly denied the existence of any weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, seriously infringing on Bush's framework for an invasion.

The Bush administration forged this document and demanded the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) lie to justify going to war – arguably the most important decision a government can make. It is quite clear that Bush was hellbent on using, almost exclusively, military power and doing so in ways that negated any moral authority our country might have earned.

History has now passed and Obama has the ability to either fall into the admittedly appealing policies of force and strong-armed intervention using short-term tactics, or he can complement force by redefining our moral character and fulfilling his promise of change.

Looking back at the past two years of the campaign for president, I think we are all glad it's over. At this point, the lofty promises that have been raised before us must be met by real action and a genuine, hard-won effort to regain our power of moral persuasion to achieve international progress.

These ideas, in Obama's rhetoric of moral leadership are not ideas of the right or left – but instead are American ideas. Done properly, polarization could end and America could reach broadly-desired international goals without hoisting up another "Mission Accomplished" banner.

Skepticism is key, especially from those who have voted for this man. We all wish him the best, but it is his leadership that will define our spirit, common humanity and America's role in ushering in a new era of peace.

Thomas Jefferson in the early spring of 1811 said, "The last hope of human liberty in this world rests on us."

If we are indeed the last hope in this world of providing an example of liberty, then we owe it to ourselves to influence those who opposite our ideals without again getting our own fundamental principles wrong.

Curing the political hangover

Nicholas O'Malley

So, what now?

With the dawn of the new year comes the revelation that many issues that have plagued us over the course of the last year have since been settled. George W. Bush is no longer in office. Gas prices are down – for now.

In Massachusetts, there's still an income tax, marijuana was decriminalized and you can't bet on greyhound racing anymore.

Much like what happened to many people after the shift to the new year, there is a general hangover effect of settling everything we've been complaining about for the last few months and years. After the heated debates and struggle on every issue that emerged in 2008, this January just seems lacking. We need a new hobby.

But what now?

The two biggest issues that remain are the war and the economy. What happens with the war remains to be seen, especially with Barack Obama's planned closing of Guantanamo Bay suggesting a direction toward a de-escalation on the current war on terror. In terms of the economy, though, there isn't a whole lot we can do. You can't really boycott the economy. Well, you can, but that's just called living in a tent in the woods. Although the current state of the raccoon economy most likely hasn't taken a hit from the global financial crisis, going woodsman for the economic crisis doesn't look too promising with the new panhandling laws.

Do what now?

There is still a good deal of issues that remain on the backburner on the national stage. The debates on the drinking age, gay marriage and abortion rage on, but on a local level there's still something lacking.

It was impossible to miss the tabling for the election, Question 2 and buzz on the campus over the slew of issues that emerged during the election. As it stands now, though, there doesn't seem to be anything left worth making people sign things on their way to class.

The economy is the largest issue, but is a monolithic issue. Sure, you could help set up for the socialist revolution that's apparently around the corner. But we'd probably all be better off trying to find an issue that has a chance of actually impacting anyone, like campus funding.

There are still a good deal of issues that remain on the backburner on the national stage.

In case you haven't heard, the University of Massachusetts is losing money, a lot of money. You did read the e-mails that went out to every student from the chancellor's office, right? And you've been keeping tabs on the school's financial decisions and the formation of the Budget Planning Task Force, right?

Save for the six people that went out of their way to read something that the school sent over break that didn't require a check, everyone's sort of in the same boat, remaining ignorant of the issue until it rears its ugly head as an increase in fees, at which point there will be cries for another strike and Gargano-esque effigies.

Unlike the past, however, there's really not much of an excuse for not knowing what's going on outside of indifference. In the past, there were grumblings that the administration had a tendency to keep students in the dark over what exactly was going on with the budget and student fees.

Upon his appointment, though, Chancellor Robert C. Holub has called the collective bluff of the students, taking every action to remain open about what the administration is going through and is deciding during the financial crisis. Beyond the direct e-mails from the chancellor's office are the online resources available to understand what's going on with the school.

It pretty much goes without saying that fees will be increasing. Even though the administration has said they would, whether or not we were actually listening remains to be seen.

Did you know that campus thermostats will be lowered universally to 67 degrees and that $1.5 million will be taken of maintenance and construction? So if you think that Herter and Bartlett are in bad shape now, they're not going to get better any time soon.

So, what now?

Outside the student strike or imminent election, not a whole lot of campus issues have the ability to create a stir. And what the school needs right now is a stir, a commotion or even a brouhaha. The financial crisis is something that deserves attention and, if nothing less, is something that's worth debating.

While another strike wouldn't exactly get much accomplished, there is a need for some sort of catalyst to get the financial issue to boil over. Though it wouldn't necessarily solve the issue, it would at least get the people listening.

Internet makes world music easily available

Forgotten African sounds released in various compliations

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

According to the literal connotation of "world," it would seem as though all music made in this world would fall into the category of "world music." Unfortunately, certain sounds are restricted from Western ears and are stashed away in remote corners of the planet until the time is just right.

It must be brought to light that at this point in time, with the Internet forever decreasing the distance between peoples around the globe, the term "world music" is basically unnecessary. Until now, and even still, Westerners have used the term "world music" to describe anything un-American that does not submit to a pop format, marginalizing non-Western music by bundling it into one catch-all term.

However, there are many record labels that are interested in this concept of making hidden music available to the public, including Analog Africa, Soundway and the notable label Sublime Frequencies. Sublime Frequencies defines itself in its mission as a company intent on "acquiring and exposing obscure sights and sounds from modern and traditional urban and rural frontiers."

The label releases compilations of obscure genres with no physical boundaries, such as "Princess Nicotine: Folk and Pop Music of Myanmar (Burma)," "Radio Sumatra: The Indonesian FM Experience," "Choubi Choubi! Folk and Pop Sounds from Iraq," and recently "Guitar Music from the Western Sahara" by Group Doueh.

Luckily, this time of decades-old reissues is on the rise, and Group Doueh produces the prime example of a sound that could be dug up only in this manner. Though copies of Sublime Frequencies' CDs, DVDs, and LPs are usually limited to a maximum of 1,000 copies, well-appreciated uploaders have slipped through the cracks and contributed to the Internet's glut of music by making these recordings available for download. Many would not know about Group Doueh, or even the label, without their respective download samples.

Combining influences of Western Saharan poetry (sung in Hassanain) with the modal structures of Mauritanian music and the pop sensibilities of Jimi Hendrix and James Brown, Group Doueh make some of the most enchanting and rapturous music brought to Western ears as of late.

Their leader, Bamaar Salmou (also known as Doueh), is a virtuosic guitarist from the Western Sahara town of Dakhla who has been playing since childhood. He is joined by his wife Halima and his friend Bashiri, who both provide the Hassanain vocals. Salmou's guitar sounds range from the searing discord of Hendrix to sugary sweet noodling, spinning psychedelic circles around the listener. Simple percussion and handclaps act as the songs' backbones, as repetition and revolution merge to form euphoria.

It's unclear when these recordings took place due to the oftentimes poor recording quality, especially since Salmou has been playing in various groups since the 1980s. The point here is that it is a very infrequent happening where such inaccessible music is made so public. Listening to the record is like observing a completely foreign religious gathering – it is something one has most likely never before experienced. Instead of traveling across the Atlantic Ocean, an interested party can approach such unfamiliar territory from the comfort of their laptop.

Another label mentioned, Analog Africa, focuses strictly on African music which has not seen the light of day outside the artists' respective home countries. Last March, the label released a compilation of music from Benin and Togo entitled, "African Scream Contest: Raw and Psychedelic Afro Sounds." This collection was compiled in order to set down the groundwork of the 1970s funk scene in these areas, the product of 33 months sifting through thousands of records, conducting many interviews, and receiving exclusive information directly from the artists over eight long trips.

This site-specific material offers a peek into the nightlife of Benin and Togo some 30 or 40 years ago, showcasing artists one could have run into a club or bar in the heart of a Western African city. The "African Scream Contest" recordings are of such great quality one could venture to guess they had been recorded yesterday, as opposed to some of those featured on the Group Doueh record.

French influence reigns over these recordings, as the Beninois and Togolese governments gained their independence from France in 1960, producing groups with names such as Les Volcans de la Capital and El Rego et Ses Commandos. The French language influence is another differentiating factor between these recordings and those of Group Doueh's, as Western Sahara was relinquished by the Spanish in 1975.

The third label mentioned, Soundway, released two highly successful Nigerian compilations this year, the two-disc "Nigeria Special: Modern Highlife, Afro-Sounds & Nigerian Blues 1970-6" and "Nigeria Disco Funk Special: The Sound of the Underground Lagos Dancefloor 1974-79." Both releases highlight a number of Nigeria's brash artists of the 1970s, heavily influenced by the great Fela Kuti, who fathered Afrobeat music and hailed from the republic.

Both albums were featured on National Public Radio's "Song of the Day" series last March, highlighting The Semi Colon's track "Nekwaha Semi Colon." NPR's Christopher Porter notes that the song acts as "a sonic billboard for the band – and for Soundway's compilations," brimming with braggadocio and the general feeling that the highlife is the only life.

There can only be more to come from specialized labels such as these, for the world will never be completely transparent, even with regards to something as universal as music. While such delicacies do have a price, and should for their sheer unavailability, it's a wonder that these gems can be found in the first place, that is, if one knows the right place to look.

The use of the Internet and record companies releasing compilations of various African sounds, such as Group Doueh, is making "world music" more well known throughout the United States.

Holly, Dion live on

Fifty years later the Winter Dance Party is remembered

By Dave Tianen
McClatchy Newspapers

MILWAUKEE — The most storied of all rock tours began Jan. 23, 1959, at Milwaukee's Eagles Club and ended in a frozen Iowa cornfield 11 days later.

They called it the Winter Dance Party, and it featured Buddy Holly, Richie Valens, Dion and the Belmonts, the Big Bopper (J.P. Richardson) and an aspiring teen idol named Frankie Sardo.

The Winter Dance Party was often long on winter and short on party. The tour trekked across the upper Midwest in an old school bus with a faulty heater, visiting obscure venues like the Laramar Ballroom in Fort Dodge, Iowa, and the Kato Ballroom in Mankato, Minn.

It got so cold on the bus that the musicians started burning newspapers in the aisle in a desperate attempt to generate warmth. Drummer Carl Bunch actually had to be hospitalized for frostbite.

The tour eventually made its way to the Surf Ballroom in Clear Lake, Iowa. After the show, hoping to get some rest and escape another night on that chilly bus, Holly, Valens and the Bopper chartered a small plane to fly them to the next stop in Fargo, N.D.

They made it just a few miles from the airport. Their pilot, 21-year-old Roger Peterson, wasn't certified for night flying. Possibly confused by the darkness and a light snow, Peterson apparently thought he was climbing when he was actually diving. The plane may have been hurtling at 150 mph when it hit the frozen ground nose first. All four men aboard died instantly.

It may have lasted just 11 days, but that tour still echoes in legend a half century later. It's been celebrated on film in two hit movies, "The Buddy Holly Story" and "La Bamba," and it was mythologized as "The day the music died," in Don McLean's massive 1971 hit "American Pie" (sung Sunday by Garth Brooks at the massive "We Are One" presidential inauguration welcome event in Washington, D.C.).

The tour's principal players – Holly, Dion and Valens – all have been enshrined in the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Holly and Valens have been honored with postage stamps. The Surf Ballroom holds a memorial concert each year to mark the anniversary. Music fans of a new generation may have been introduced to Holly on the "Juno" soundtrack.

Springsteen at a loss in new album 'Working on a Dream'

By Ann Powers
Los Angeles Times

Bruce Springsteen is the quintessential album-era rock star. Hear me out, ye who would argue Beatles-Dylan-Marvin-Brian Wilson-Who-Pink Floyd-Stones: Those artists might have made superior individual efforts, but none has used the long-player form itself more powerfully over the arc of a career, not only to establish a world through song, but to inhabit an enduring persona.

A string of hit singles alone wouldn't have made Springsteen the bard of America's slide from industrial-era swagger into service-economy anomie.

He needed the track-by-track architecture of albums to flesh out characters, relate each to the other, extend metaphors and build a palpable, detail-strewn landscape through which they could travel.

The album format also has allowed Springsteen to build a sound, both with his stalwart E Street Band (a metaphor itself for the family connections and community spirit his songs celebrate or lament) and in more minimalist projects. But the album era is over. "Working on a Dream," Springsteen's 16th studio album, is not merely a response to this fact. It's partial proof.

"Working on a Dream" rejects the finer points of literary-minded album rock and aims for the instant effect of a string of hits.

It's a charmingly quixotic move; barely anyone has hits in these dark days of the music industry's decline, and especially rockers over the age of ... how old are the Jonas Brothers? So give Springsteen credit for even trying.

But the enthusiasm he and his team bring to these tracks doesn't redeem them. The best thing that can be said about "Working on a Dream" is that it's boisterously scatterbrained, an exhilarating but minor work.

Only a great artist could make an album that's at once so stirring and so slight.

This Is the Boss, after all; he can wring meaning out of a dish towel. And he's obviously enjoying himself, recalling the radio hits of his youth and applying their glitter to his template. But he gets lost in the idea of pop, forgetting to attend to the little details that pump blood into his best work.

There's a lot of variation on "Dream," as befits a foray into the singles game. "Outlaw Pete" is Southern rock done up with symphonic pomp. Partridge Family-style bubble gum inspires "Surprise Surprise," and Moby-ish electronics flavor the rough blues of "Good Eye."

There's much nostalgia too – "Tomorrow Never Knows" nods to both Dylan and the Beatles, while "The Last Carnival," dedicated to late E Street Band keyboard player Danny Federici, floats forth on acoustic finger-picking recalling 1960s-era Laurel Canyon.

The Boss falls short

music, it's "Girls in Their Summer Clothes," the best song on "Magic," Springsteen's previous album. That shimmering, melancholy dollop of California beach rock perfectly balanced corn and careful detail.

Brendan O'Brien's organizing hand contained the floridity of the E Street Band, and Springsteen, trading in his troubadour's drawl for a crooner's open throat, found the plain-spoken truth in pop's sentimentality.

Several songs on "Dream" aim for the same exquisite mood as that one, and occasionally – on the love songs "This Life" and "Kingdom of Days" – Springsteen and crew come close. But they're just as likely to overdo it.

"Queen of the Supermarket," the album's low point, illustrates the consequences of overflavoring a song, an understandable error for an album artist trying to concentrate his gifts.

Roy Bittan's meditative piano opens the track, which has Springsteen moving among the aisles stealing glimpses of his grocery-bagging Beatrice. Had it stayed that spare and mellow, the song might have produced chills. Instead, disco strings, mounting backing vocals and pounding drums turn it into a Broadway number.

It's "The Wrestler," the bonus track that won a Golden Globe for its appearance in the film of the same name, that most clearly realizes Springsteen's undying gift. Tacked on to this shiny package, the song is ancient-school Springsteen: a terse ballad about a beautiful loser, simply arranged around acoustic guitar and modulated keyboards, that gently builds into a secular hymn.

It's the kind of song that says more than its words convey because the listener knows it's part of something bigger. Somewhere – in this case, in a film, but also in the other songs Springsteen has written that give a different bruised face and gritty voice to the same man – the story continues. That's how folk ballads work.

Springsteen might be bored of being their champion, but nobody serves them better, even still, than he.

Critics say Bruce Springsteen's new album, "Working on a Dream" conjures up the sounds of 1950s and 60s-era pop music, but fails to capture the magic of his most influential album, "Born to Run."

Music biopics attempt to stay realistic

By Ann Powers
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — There's method acting, and then there's what Brooklyn-born rapper Jamal Woolard endured to become Biggie Smalls for "Notorious," the recently released biopic detailing the life (and untimely death) of Christopher Wallace, also known to the hip-hop world as the Notorious B.I.G.

Woolard's tales of "Biggie Bootcamp," his immersion into Biggie's predilections and physical tics, guided by the late rapper's friends and family, have earned admiration from both fans and "cineastes."

But none of his stories about gaining weight, guzzling Pepsi or donning Coogi sweaters turns out to be as relevant as the one about the cotton balls.

Inspired by Marlon Brando in "The Godfather," Woolard expanded his jowls with gauze. The act proved crucial because it changed his rhyming flow.

"Biggie had a breathing pattern that was enormous," said Woolard by phone. "Also, he had asthma. So we had to study that. I did things like hold my tongue – it's an exercise that gives you more clarity. And his tongue lay down on the bottom of his mouth. When you put cotton balls in your mouth it causes that."

Woolard faced a challenge particular to actors portraying musicians – a club that's rapidly growing with the recent uptick in musical biopics. Such roles demand more than sensitive mimicry. Whether lip-syncing or actually performing, as most do, actors must tap into their own musicality and align it with the style of the stars they play.

In the age of YouTube, the task is trickier than ever. Artists like Biggie aren't half-forgotten heroes – they live on in videos, performance clips and other archival footage available for viewing at any time on any computer.

Not so long ago, actors could riff on a myth. The carnal innocence of Val Kilmer's depiction of Jim Morrison in "The Doors" or the strength through which Angela Bassett – who plays Biggie's mother Voletta Wallace in "Notorious" – channeled Tina Turner in "What's Love Got to Do With It" emerged through attention to detail, but the stakes are higher now. An artist's fans and fellow travelers easily can call out inauthenticity. For that reason, and also because they themselves are drawn in by pop's rich archive, actors and directors are creating music in films that eerily echo the original recordings.

In "Cadillac Records," Darnell Martin's film about Chicago's Chess Records, Jeffrey Wright gives a dazzling performance as the late bluesman Muddy Waters. He brings the same nuance to scenes of Waters playing guitar and singing as to the ones in which he's interacting with his wife or close friends. Wright said he pored over photographs and film clips of Waters to develop his stance.

"He had a very specific way of moving," said Wright by phone from New York. "He held his body with a sort of coiled rigidity. In some ways, he vibrated from within. And there's a sideways movement. It's almost as though he's emerging out of these constraints."

For Wright, performing as Waters was a way of tapping into a musical birthright and paying tribute.

"That we sing in this movie (instead of lip-syncing) is an homage to the potency of these people, and it's also an homage and a lifting up of our culture," he said. "We're going back and discovering the language of the blues, which is an essential American language with which we attempt, through this movie, to share some breath – to literally share our breath with this cultural legacy."

Such dedication doesn't shock coming from Wright, one of today's most lauded actors, yet immersion is becoming the standard for music-based films. Joaquin Phoenix and Jamie Foxx hit career-high points for their turns as, respectively, Johnny Cash and Ray Charles in recent biopics; since then, Foxx has maintained a side career as a singer, while Phoenix has talked of abandoning acting altogether for music.

In last year's "Control," Sam Riley went so far into his performances as the late Joy Division singer Ian Curtis that it's difficult, even for fans, to tell them from the real thing.

Shane West took similar risks playing Darby Crash, the intense (and suicidal) singer for the L.A. punk band the Germs in Rodger Grossman's film "What We Do Is Secret," now on DVD. Grossman explained recently that lip-syncing would have been impossible for West.

"I felt that what Darby was doing wasn't always singing," he said. "It was animalistic and guttural. It came from a deeper, inner place. And lip-syncing wasn't going to achieve that. I needed somebody that could get up there and really channel Darby from inside."

West lip-synced only one song, miming over his own vocal performance for a scene that depicted Crash in the recording studio.

"We had no choice because it was the last day of shooting and Shane had literally lost his voice," Grossman said.

"What We Do Is Secret" might provide the most extreme example of actors merging with their musical subjects. Grossman enlisted the surviving Germs –guitarist Pat Smear, drummer Don Bolles and bassist Lorna Doom – to teach the "baby Germs" how to play their music. West even eventually began touring with the actual Germs.

Discussing his film's process, Grossman wondered aloud whether it was unique.

In "Notorious," most of Biggie's key collaborators were intimately involved in making the film – his former manager Wayne Barrow was a producer, as was Wallace's mother, while Sean Combs served as executive producer. Actor Derek Luke appears as Combs in the film.

What connects "Notorious" to the new wave of musical biopics is the role music plays. It works not just as color or illustration or even a set of turning points but as the core from which the story itself emanates. Director George Tillman Jr. constructs the film around several key Biggie Smalls performances, from an early street battle to his debut at Howard University's annual Yardfest party to his final tour.

The producers provided Tillman with actual footage for reference.

"We re-created all the elements we thought were important to the audience, important to Big," said Barrow. "Battling on the street showed you what his potential was. That was a special moment."

"I was able to really look at these shows and choose specific shows to capture what Biggie had onstage," Tillman added. He cast Biggie's actual sidemen, rapper Money L and DJ Enuff, in small roles to add energy and "make it as live as possible."

Armed with much study, Woolard stepped into this half-real world and mastered one of the most difficult vocal deliveries in pop history. "Big's voice is really booming," explained Tillman. "His voice stood above the track. Just to do a Biggie freestyle can really be complicated. ... It took months to get to that level."

Jamal Woolard plays Christopher Wallace, also known as the Notorious B.I.G., in the current music bioepic. Woolard did all he could portray Notorious accurately.

Once Woolard had learned Biggie's early style, he focused on his evolution. He worked to feel the rapper's development in his mouth, like those cotton balls.

"His swagger changed, and his wordplay became more comfortable," said Woolard of Biggie's musical evolution. "Battling, this was his first time letting the streets know he can rap. He was really unsure of himself. But when he won, he started believing in himself ... asking himself, 'Why am I so hard and yelling?' In the beginning he had the style, but he was too aggressive."

Woolard rapped a few lines from Biggie's repertoire to demonstrate the change. "Once he learned how to flip that, it was over."

Like most biopics, "Notorious," "Cadillac Records" and "What We Do Is Secret" have their faults – they slide around the historical record and sometimes flounder into sentimentality.

The Winter Dance Party tour lasted only 11 days, but even 50 years later it is still remember as one of the most talked about rock tours of all time. Buddy Holly (above) was one of the three main acts that died in a plane crash a week and a half after the start of the tour.

acknowledged with multiple concerts and events nationally. Here are some of the major happenings:

CONCERTS:

John Mueller's Winter Dance Party, 7:30 p.m. Saturday, South Milwaukee Performing Arts Center, 901 15th Ave., South Milwaukee. $35 adults, $30 seniors, $15 students at (414) 766-5049.

This long-running dramatization of Holly's last tour features Jay Richardson, the Big Bopper's son, and has been endorsed by estates of all three stars. Like the original tour, John Mueller's Winter Dance Party will also play the Riverside Ballroom in Green Bay, Wis., and Madrigrano Marina Shores in Kenosha, Wis.

50 Winters Later: The Commemorative Concert, Feb. 2 at the Surf Ballroom in Clear Lake, Iowa

This star-studded event features Los Lobos, Tommy Allsup and the Crickets, Joe Ely, Delbert McClinton, Los Lonely Boys, Wanda Jackson, Pat DiNizio of the Smithereens, Graham Nash, Bobby Vee, Peter & Gordon, Cousin Brucie and Tim Rice. Special guests are also expected. Tickets are $85; for more information, go to www.50winterslater.com.

FILM:

Two young filmmakers, Jim McCool of Madison and Sevan Garabedian of Montreal, are producing a documentary film tentatively titled "The Winter Dance Party: Revisited and Remembered."

They have interviewed the surviving musicians from the tour and are interested in meeting with anyone who might have attended or have pictures from the Milwaukee performance at George Devine's Million Dollar Ballroom. They are offering to pay for pictures from the show.

Garabedian can be reached at sevan1@sympatico.ca or (514) 931-6959. The crowd at the Devine's show was estimated at 6,000, and so far they have found only four fans who attended.

BOX SETS:

Geffen is marking the anniversary with two new box sets: the three-disc "Buddy Holly Memorial Collection" and the double-disc "Buddy Holly: Down the Line _ The Rarities."

"Memorial Collection" features 60 tracks spanning Holly's earliest country recordings, his classic hits and selections from "The Apartment Tapes." "Down the Line" features tracks from both "The Apartment Tapes" and "The Garage Tapes," unfinished recordings from late in Holly's career.

Modern 'hippies' get technical with sound

Urban bushwacker groups redefine the future of music

By Ann Powers
Los Angeles Times

One way to stay sane in the big gray city is to seek out the wilderness pulling at its seams. In Los Angeles, it's easy. The chaparral pokes through everywhere, throwing tumbleweeds into car lanes; coyotes cross into our gardens at night. The shift in attention can seem harder in older, denser spots like New York, but even there, undomesticated life has a way of wriggling forth – hermit crabs and jellyfish have recently surfaced in the toxic silt of the Gowanus Canal.

Pop music in the age of the universal download is a lot like a megalopolis: sprawling, chaotic, seemingly without borders. Innovative but mercenary power-players peddle corporate pop in its financial centers. Elites – blockbuster rock stars, divas, record producers of note – clink their glasses together in gated communities. Scrappy newcomers and forgotten elders squat in the tenements, hoping for a break.

And then there are the urban bushwhackers: creative people determined to carve some space out of the concrete where something might grow and they might be able to wander a bit.

Since the 1960s, these folks have often been called "hippies," though that term is too specific, and carries too much historical weight. Younger practitioners, including California Summer of Love revivalists such as Devendra Banhart, Jonathan Wilson and the Entrance Band; Oregonian country fuzz rockers Blitzen Trapper; and Atlanta post-punks Deerhunter modify countercultural visions to suit a more pragmatic age.

Think of urban bushwhackers as those sea creatures in the chemical mud, with both the inner city and the outback in their DNA. They're different from the back-to-the-land pastoralists who decamp to yurts in New Mexico. What urban bushwhackers share across the generations, whether they've ridden in Ken Kesey's bus or danced at Burning Man, is an understanding that new technologies can be useful in pursuit of an idyllic vibe.

That's why they don't think it's weird to accessorize a thrift-store dress with an electroluminescent wire necklace. And it's why the musicians among them are leading a trend that feels like the future, even as, on the surface, it celebrates the primitive and the past.

Animal Collective, Bon Iver and Fleet Foxes are three leading urban bushwhackers. They're among the most cultishly followed indie acts – the prolific Animal Collective's eighth studio album, "Merriweather Post Pavilion," is earning wide praise as a front-runner for best recording of 2009, while Seattle's Fleet Foxes and Wisconsin's Bon Iver topped 2008 critics' lists with their debut releases.

These three bands differ somewhat in sound, lifestyle and approaches to music-making. But their popularity can be attributed to the same thing: the ever-renewable urge within the middle class to step away from the timetables of life and find a different source of meaning. Going off-trail is an apt metaphor for what earlier generations thought of as shedding the gray flannel suits. Moguls don't wear suits now, but they'd never enter a space where their cellphone reception might be endangered. Urban bushwhackers try to imagine that space, even though they often use laptops and sequencers to do so.

Animal Collective's career has been characterized by forays into the brush. Since evolving from a bunch of childhood friends into a band around a decade ago, the group became strongly identified with the East Coast avant-rock scene and the more scattered "psych folk" trend. Its sound is hard to describe, let alone classify; it pulls from post-techno dance music, world rhythms, harmony groups and playful 1960s folk-rockers like the Holy Modal Rounders.

The band's sound is as intentionally bewildering (and goofy) as its members' silly stage names (Avey Tare and Panda Bear, for example), and its fanboy followers have turned the game of this music into an obsession. Fans hail AC shows as near-religious experiences and pore over their recordings as if they were I Ching oracle tosses.

The AC catalog may overflow with tangential forays that will interest only true believers. But such undirected play is what bushwhacking is all about.

Like the Grateful Dead, AC fetishizes process over catchiness. This band likes to stretch time and get lost. Its baggy psychedelia doesn't stimulate nostalgia for the hippie era as much as for the early days of raves and Ecstasy, when the drugs made you want to cuddle and the beats per minute were transcendently intense.

There was something deeply insular about rave culture – it was a very white, middle-class, college kid thing. AC suffers from this limitation too. Focusing on one another, these four former prep-school buddies mostly have rejected the pop path of imagining a world that's open to all.

"Merriweather Post Pavilion" goes beyond this closed universe by turning Animal Collective's experiments into gelatinous but still graspable song forms. Choruses, hooks and harmonies that undeniably smack of the Beach Boys make it feasible for songs like "My Girls" and "Brother Sport" to get played on the radio. AC's members, all around 30 now, are learning how to focus. Finally, they've made an album in which even nonbelievers can lose themselves.

Fleet Foxes and Bon Iver have no trouble attracting new followers. Their music is as ordered and pretty as AC's is unhinged, though it's also polarizing and intense. Both hail from regions where country and city meet and meld. Seattle, home to Fleet Foxes, is well known as a place where outdoorsiness and nerdy cosmopolitanism collide. Eau Claire, Wis., where Justin Vernon began Bon Iver as a solo project (he's now formed a band), is a small town, but it's also home to several colleges.

If Animal Collective's musicians are bushwhackers who bury their tracks, Fleet Foxes, a quintet led by 22-year-old Robin Pecknold, are the kind who carefully carve trail markers. The band is still riding the ripples caused by its self-titled summertime debut – the influential webzine Pitchfork recently named it the album of the year and the band played Jan. 17 on "Saturday Night Live."

Justin Vernon also did something very current when he became Bon Iver, went out to the woods, Henry David Thoreau-style, to clear his head. Like Pecknold, though, he was able to take Pro Tools with him. "For Emma, Forever Ago" is a collection of tracks he made in his parents' hunting cabin outside Eau Claire in the dead of winter. The romance of his isolation has helped him attract listeners, but it's what he did with the little bit of technology he could haul with him that makes his music so startlingly rich.

Bon Iver's new EP, "Blood Bank," expands on the layered vocals and ambient sonic pathways Vernon laid down on "For Emma," and proves that Vernon isn't just a novelty artist. Now working with a small band, he widens his path in several directions. The title track is a sexy little story of a coupling that comes after a donation to the Red Cross; it's fairly conventional. But on two other tracks, the piano-driven "Habys" and the Auto-Tuned "The Woods," Vernon shows that for someone committed to the semirural life (he's an avid hunter) he's blessedly uninterested in isolating himself.

This might be the real calling of the bushwhackers: to respond to the impending scarcity that's come hand in hand with cultural acceleration by taking up their tools and making a new path. There's an aspect of escapism to what they're doing. But pushing through the underbrush, they've found a way to breathe.

The Fleet Foxes (above), Animal Collective and Bon Iver are three of the leading urban bushwackers and most followed indie groups as of late because of their ability to find a different source of meaning in life.

Freshmen not as strong in '09

By Blair Kerkhoff
McClatchy Newspapers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – College basketball stardom revolved around freshmen the previous two seasons.

Greg Oden and Kevin Durant in 2007, then Derrick Rose and Michael Beasley in 2008, with many others filling the NBA draft ranks as one-and-dones.

This season is the flip side.

The freshmen are, well, what freshmen traditionally have been – first-year players trying to figure things out at the college level and not playing like sure bets at the next.

Not that this rookie downturn was unexpected.

"You could see this coming two or three years ago," ESPN analyst Fran Fraschilla said. "We had an extraordinary couple of years. Now, with a few exceptions, there aren't many impact players."

Check out the nation's top six teams. Among Wake Forest, Duke, Connecticut, Pittsburgh, North Carolina and Oklahoma, only two freshmen start: forward Al-Farouq Aminu for Wake Forest and guard Willie Warren for the Sooners.

The starting fives for the same group of top teams include 10 seniors and 11 juniors.

All of college basketball is starting to look like the Missouri Valley Conference, where top players tend to play through their eligibility.

"There's probably not a freshman today who could play in a meaningful NBA game," Fraschilla said.

Unlike last season, when Rose carried Memphis to the national championship game and Beasley helped Kansas State reach the NCAA tournament for the first time in a dozen years. They then became the first two NBA draft choices and are well along in their transition to the pro game.

Rose is the only player to start every game for Chicago and is the team's second leading scorer. Beasley is Miami's second leading scorer.

Right behind those first two picks was Southern California freshman O.J. Mayo, who leads Memphis in scoring. Seven more freshmen were taken in the first round.

In 2007, the first NBA draft conducted under the new rule of having to be at least 19 and a year removed from your graduating class, eight of the first-round picks were freshmen, starting with Oden and Durant.

The website NBADraftNet projects three freshmen in the first round of the 2009 draft: Aminu, Georgetown center Greg Monroe and Southern California guard DeMar DeRozan. No freshmen are projected in the second round.

But Texas coach Rick Barnes doesn't see a downward trend in young hoops talent.

"It's a cyclical thing," Barnes said. "A year from now, I think you'll see more impact freshmen."

From this year's high school senior crop, guards John Wall of Raleigh, N.C., and Xavier Henry of Oklahoma City – who will attend Memphis – and Georgia Tech-bound forward Derrick Favors of Atlanta are potential lottery picks in 2010.

The best of this year's crop? Aminu is having an outstanding year for the Deacons, averaging 12.6 points and a team-best 8.6 rebounds.

Warren gives Oklahoma a second scoring threat and is averaging 15 points.

Monroe leads the Hoyas in blocks and steals while averaging 13.2 points and 6.3 rebounds.

Louisville forward Samardo Samuels is second on the Cardinals in scoring. UCLA guard Jrue Holiday has played solid defense, and guard Tyreke Evans leads Memphis in scoring.

The nation's top scorer among freshman is Liberty's Seth Curry, younger brother of Davidson junior Stephen Curry. Seth Curry entered the week averaging 20.8 points, which ranks 20th nationally.

No other freshman ranks in the top 50.

Other freshmen projected to have impact seasons – The Sporting News national college basketball writer Mike DeCourcy said he thought DeRozan and Tennessee's Scotty Hopson would be farther along – haven't.

This year's crop reminds DeCourcy of 2003-04, when the draft's first-round freshmen were Duke's Luol Deng and Minnesota's Kris Humphries.

"But that freshman class had Chris Paul, and he was great," DeCourcy said of the Wake Forest guard who was drafted after his sophomore season. "I don't see a player like that here."

That doesn't mean more won't declare for the draft than are projected today. Fraschilla said it's not unusual for agents or handlers to have had conversations with some high-profile freshmen.

"There are guys not having significant seasons and are nowhere near ready who have already been told to come out," Fraschilla said.

He pointed to former Texas A&M center DeAndre Jordan as an example. Jordan, a 6-11 center who lost his starting spot by the end of last season, was a second-round pick of the Clippers. He's getting some playing time with injuries to the team's other big men.

"He wasn't ready, but everybody knew he was one-and-done no matter if he averaged 20 or two points as a freshman," Fraschilla said.

The numbers for freshmen in this summer's draft may increase, but their probability of helping an NBA team won't.

"I don't see it," Fraschilla said.

Former Texas phenom Kevin Durant was one of many college freshmen who played major roles on their teams. This year, there are fewer first-year players who have significant roles in Division I.

Super Bowl XXV changed everything

By Ray Buck
McClatchy Newspapers

FORT WORTH, Texas — Desert Storm. Tampa Stadium. Whitney Houston.

Scott Norwood … wide right.

Super Bowl XXV remains among the most memorable because it totally changed the way we cover sporting events in this country.

What we media types encountered in Tampa 18 years ago this month was a Super Bowl under siege. We were distracted by TV images of rockets and rumble in Iraq.

Our fears were exposed, our patience strained, our game trivialized.

The NFL considered canceling the Jan. 27, 1991, game out of deference to what was at the time an 11-day-old U.S. military operation known as Desert Storm.

Scud missiles. Stealth bombers. Laser-guided air strikes lighting up the night skies over Baghdad.

And what football game are we covering now?

That's right, Bill Parcells' New York Giants vs. Marv Levy's Buffalo Bills; Jim Kelly vs. Jeff Hostetler (replacement for the injured Phil Simms), Bills favored by a touchdown.

But being credentialed meant being distracted for most of us that week. Never before had it sounded like so much blah-blah-blah leading up to a Super Bowl.

Now words like "blitz," "bomb" and "battles in the trenches" made most of us sick.

Don't get me wrong; questions were asked and quotes were gathered, as we tried to go about business "as normal." But matchups were the last things on our mind.

We emptied our pockets and filed through metal detectors – which was something of a first in covering a sporting event for most of us. I mean, really, never before had so many "freebie" media bags been unzipped and examined at a Super Bowl.

Pat-downs, wand-checks, next question, please: "Hey Bill, how much of a concern is Buffalo's no-huddle offense?"

Security checkpoints had been a part of our lives since the '70s, but mostly at airports. Now, we referred in our stories to concrete barriers, law enforcement and metal detectors as "airport security measures." It was our only real reference point.

A typical 10-minute wait now turned into a 45-minute ordeal, and getting from Point A to Point B required extreme patience. "Herd journalism" at a major sporting event was commonplace – but nothing like SB XXV.

But very few of us, if any, now that I think about it, tried to buck the system. Why should we? We felt protected. It was as much a change in the landscape as the NFL's new postseason rules.

As part of a new $3.6 billion TV package, the NFL had just added an extra game to the wild-card round (per conference), and eliminated the extra week between the conference championship games and the Super Bowl.

The Giants and Bills flew to Tampa straight from their conference title victories the previous day. The Giants were coming from San Francisco, where they had beaten the 49ers. The Bills had won at home against the Raiders.

Media Day on Tuesday was its typical hodgepodge of serious reporters and celebrity types, pros with cameras and players with camcorders, good questions and off-the-wall questions. Downtown Julie Brown was there for MTV.

Buffalo's Bruce Smith wanted the world to know he was the most dominant player in the NFL, a shoo-in for MVP, heir apparent to Lawrence Taylor. Fine … except L.T. was still playing for the Giants.

By Super Sunday, everyone was ready for a football game. The price of the ticket was $150, a record at the time.

A sellout crowd of 73,813 filed through turnstiles and metal detectors to get to their seats. It was awkward. It was a bit unnerving.

But Whitney Houston, outfitted in a mostly white jogging suit and white headband, belted out the national anthem, and made it all worthwhile.

Apparently some fans forgot Frank Gifford's P.A. introduction of the singer and announcement of a flyover by four F-16 fighter jets from nearby MacDill Air Force Base to immediately follow.

Because a few nervous patrons hit the deck when the roar passed overhead.

High school coach dismissed after 100-0 blowout victory

By Barry Horn
McClatchy Newspapers

DALLAS – A Texas high school fired its girls' basketball coach Sunday, the same day he distributed an e-mail and posted on a website that he disagreed with the school officials, who have publicly apologized for the team's 100-0 victory over an overmatched opponent.

Kyle Queal, the Covenant School's head of school, said former coach Micah Grimes "now only represents himself." Queal said he could not answer if the firing was a direct result of his e-mail and posting.

Grimes' e-mail and posting said, "In response to the statement posted on The Covenant School website, I do not agree with the apology or the notion that the Covenant School girls' basketball team should feel embarrassed or ashamed," Micah Grimes wrote in an e-mail sent to The Dallas Morning News. "We played the game as it was meant to be played. My values and my beliefs would not allow me to run up the score on any opponent, and it will not allow me to apologize for a wide-margin victory when my girls played with honor and integrity."

On its website Thursday, the school posted a statement that said it "regrets the incident of Jan. 13 and the outcome of the game with the Dallas Academy Varsity Girls Basketball team. It is shameful and an embarrassment that this happened. This clearly does not reflect a Christ-like and honorable approach to competition." It was signed by Queal and Todd Doshier, board chair of the Dallas school.

Grimes did not immediately respond to repeated e-mail requests for an interview. But his e-mail and website post concluded, "I believe in the lessons that sports teach us. Competition builds character, and teaches us to value selflessness, hard work and perseverance. As a coach, I have instilled in my girls these values. So if I lose my job over these statements, I will walk away with my integrity."

His website is Irving, Texas-based and lists him as one of the program's coaches.

Covenant has been in the national spotlight since Thursday when The Dallas Morning News published a story about its 100-point shutout victory over Dallas Academy back on Jan. 13.

Dallas Academy coaches and administrators say Covenant kept the pressure on until it reached 100 points midway through the fourth quarter.

Sunday's e-mail was the first public communication from Grimes since he e-mailed The News on Wednesday night. In the original e-mail that was copied to Queal and athletic director Brice Hellon, Grimes called scoring 100 points "unfortunate."

"It just happened," he wrote. "Please know Covenant intended no harm against them. I see this as a real learning opportunity, so we can prevent this from happening in the future."

In Sunday's e-mail, which didn't appear to be copied to school officials, Grimes said his team stopped applying full-court defensive pressure after the score reached 25-0 three minutes into the game, dropped into a relatively benign zone defense and began resting his starters in favor of his three bench players.

Dallas Academy coach Andrew Lott agreed Covenant stopped pressing but returned with an alternate press later in the game. "I am 100 percent sure," said Lott, who estimated his team was able to get off "seven shots" all game.

"He's entitled to his opinion," Lott said. "If you ask 10 people about it you might get 10 different answers."

Lott said his team did not videotape the Jan. 13 game hosted by Covenant but he is certain Covenant did as there was a camera was set up near the Dallas Academy bench. "Maybe we could look at the tape," Lott said.

The story has capiured national and international attention.

When posted on dallasnews.com, the first-day story attracted 665,000 page views worldwide, an enormous number for a story on a local private school girls' basketball game.

E-mails have flooded in from across the country and as far away as China and Thailand commenting on the story. Most have questioned the motives of Covenant's coach for "running up" the score. But some have defended the coach for allowing his girls to play to their potential. None have blamed the Covenant players.

Dallas Academy girls, portrayed as lovable losers on the court but winners in life for their attitude after the loss, have been showered with praise nationally. They were on ABC and CBS network morning shows on Saturday and are scheduled to make a repeat appearance on ABC's "Good Morning America" on Monday as well as their "Today" show debut.

Depth apparent in early going

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

For many students, winter vacation is a time to relax. But for the men and women of the Massachusetts swimming and diving teams, it was all but relaxing.

With a month consisting of two invitational meets and ending with two dual meets in the last weekend, the UMass teams have been working hard. And with less than a month until the Atlantic 10 Conference Championships, hard work and key performances will be the winning strategy.

For the men's swimming and diving team, the top performers aren't aiming at anything less than perfect. Junior Juan Moliere has kept his momentum right through the break finishing in the top spot of his normal events, the 50-yard freestyle and 100-yard freestyle.

Four out of six of Moliere's competitions resulted in first-place finishes for the junior, with the other two being second-place showings to fellow Minuteman Chris Howard.

Freshman Joey Sbordon has also been tough to beat. For the third time this season, Sbordon has earned the honor of A-10 Rookie of the Week, this time honoring his performance in the Rhode Island Invitational. Sbordon has numerous wins this season and has yet to be beaten in his strongest events, the 500-yard freestyle and 1,000-yard freestyle. Sboredon's only loss was a second-place finish in the 200-yard freestyle.

Freshman Jason Cook remains the men's top diver, as he extended his winning record with four top spots last weekend, two in both the 3-meter and 1-meter dive. And as Cook sat out during the Rhode Island Invitational, sophomore Adam Duffield claimed a first and second-place spot and proved UMass' depth in diving.

After a dominating 191-109 performance against Boston College this weekend, Colgate reminded the women that their top performers are needed most if they want to claim the A-10 Championship.

For the Minutewomen, senior Karen Upperco is far from falling from her first-place finishes. In the last six diving events for the women, Upperco has taken first in each event. In her last competition at Joseph Rogers Pool in Boyden Gym, Upperco broke her personal record with a score of 297.45 in the 3-meter diving event.

Christa Narus also kept her winter break a busy won by posting seven wins in the last three meets. Narus notched three of those wins in the 200-yard freestyle, and two in both the 100-yard and 200-yard butterfly stroke. As a senior, Narus is a solid part of the women's swimming team.

The effort from the team also comes from many different swimmers and divers. Sarah Hortsmann and Hannah Swift are always nipping at Upperco's heals in both diving events as they round out the top three consistently. Freshman Kathryne Chaliklis has put a few wins of her own on the score sheet while Chelsea Downing, Elizabeth Walsh and Jennifer Corriveau keep notching top-three finishes in their respective events.

UMass women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb looks on as his teams competes. The Minutewomen are 4-3 in dual meets this season.

Minutemen strong over winter session

Cook landed his usual double-victory in the one and three meter events. According to Yarworth, the high-precision skills of Cook and veterans like Byron Johnson seem to have influenced the entire diving roster.

"Don't forget John Clark – that kid is talented," Yarworth noted. "Zach Lichter is also getting his dives in there and I'm very pleased with the potential they have for finishing the season at A-10s with some dominant performances."

Joey Sbordon, new owner of 18 individual wins this season, topped out the 200-, 500- and 1000-freestyle. With a team that's just returned from five weeks of double session training, Yarworth seemed confident.

"This was a day we were kind of aiming at in my season plan to swim fast, and we're definitely swimming fast," he recalled. "[The team was] mentally there and physically starting to come around."

Colgate 171, UMass 127 (women)

After the BC meet, Newcomb prefaced Colgate by saying it is one of the toughest challenges of the Minutewomen's dual meet season. His prediction rang true, as only cracked the list of first-place finishes that was dominated by the Red Raiders, who remain undefeated.

Coming in second to Narus' 2:11.95 win in the 200-yard individual medley was Downing, with a time of 2:13.67. She earned second-place in the 1,650 freestyle race, finishing at 17:46.58.

But on a day honoring seniors and parents at a pre-meet luncheon, the true silver lining was captain Karen Upperco. The veteran diver said goodbye to Amherst in style, putting some finishing touches on a new personal 3-meter diving record of 297.45.

Minutemen 188, Colgate 95 (men)

Two meets in 48 hours did little to faze UMass, as junior Mike Berthaume and Brian Schmidt led the way with three individual wins apiece. After the back-to-back dual meet victories, Yarworth says the traditional post-intersession taper of rest will begin this week.

"[The team] deserves some rest because they've been working hard," Yarworth said. "You also have to be careful because the start of classes is exhausting. They have to start walking around campus and they have to use that grey matter up in between their ears which they haven't used for a while, other than for swimming."

Both teams are scheduled for a final dual meet tune-up in the Bronx, N.Y., against Fordham on Jan. 31.

UM home for Nolet

the UMass coaches kept with Nolet that eventually brought him to commit to UMass.

"The coaches came and saw a lot of games, they showed a lot of interest and they called me a lot," Nolet says. "They said they would give me a lot of ice time and that was most important to me."

UMass coach Don Cahoon and his staff lived up to their promise. Martin was teamed with Mike Kostka on UMass' first defensive pairing. Before signing a free agent contract with the Sabres on March 26, Kostka acted more like a mentor and teacher than a mere teammate.

"Kostka was the one that took care of me," Nolet says. "I pretty much just spoke French so it was hard for me to communicate."

Whenever Martin struggled on the ice or had difficulties off it, Kostka made sure that he became comfortable and in a timely fashion.

"He came to me and talked to me whenever I had a problem," Nolet says. "He was a great player. If you watch him play you just learn so many things."

After Kostka graduated and moved on to Buffalo's AHL affiliate, the Rochester Americans, the affiliate has since been changed to the Portland Pirates, Martin paired with Justin Braun, another defenseman with a bright future ahead of him, at the start of the 2007-08 season. The two were roommates during the season and the experience of living with each other seemed to have profited them both, according to Martin.

Braun was a Pittsburgh Penguins draft pick but was traded to the San Jose Sharks. Braun, like Kostka, also acts like an on-ice mentor. But this relationship is much more beneficial to both players.

"I use him, and he uses me," Nolet says. "This year I'm just trying to make his life easier because I know he's trying to get into the NHL."

Martin also has had his experiences with the NHL, especially on draft day in 2006. That day he knew that he was on the draft list but far down – so he spent the day on a local lake with his girlfriend and family.

"We got back from the lake, and I went and checked where my name was and I noticed that I was bumped or passed," Nolet says. "I had a call at my house from the [New York] Rangers … they called my house to see if I was there – I wasn't. So, I could have been playing for the Rangers instead of the L.A. Kings."

The Los Angeles Kings picked Martin with the 144th pick of the draft, and if he'd been in his house at the time of the phone call he would have been a member of the Rangers just five picks earlier.

Like anything else – the team's record, his playing performance and the safety of his teammates – Nolet uses the fact that he could have a future in the NHL as daily motivation.

Martin Nolet mans the point and prepares to receive the puck in game action. Despite Nolet's play the Minutemen have been slumping recently, going 1-4-2 in their last seven contests.

Minuteman defenseman Martin Nolet celebrates after scoring a goal in a game last season. Nolet has scored two goals and added four assists this season, while the Minutemen are 10-11-3 this season.

Wright main presence in post

Jones has the speed of Avebe and the patience of Wright. The best example of this was in a loss against then-No.21 Xavier (17-4, 5-0 A-10), a game in which she had four blocks. Her performance was a strong positive because it showed her tenacity under the basket, a trait that greatly benefits the Minutewomen right now.

Stephanie Lawrence is another player that Dacko can utilize in the post when one of her primary players is either tired or in foul trouble. While Lawrence isn't as big as Wright, Avebe or Jones, she has the physical presence that complements the speed of them.

Like the others, she has an intense focus while on defense but she can pull out and make short-range jumpers as well.

Lawrence is more of a defensive stopper rather than a full-fledged big body in the post.

Yet Dacko has little concern for the lack of offensive productivity from the post outside of Wright, because the dribble-drive offense is organized to create outside looks for her perimeter players.

"When the ball's not going to the basket for our post-players, all we have to do is rebound and play defense," Dacko said of the missed chances down low. "All three of our post players are capable of doing that. We have to let the defense create our offense."

While the philosophy is to have the defense create the offense, the key to this is boxing-out aggressively and often. UMass is hurt by second-chance points. In the past two games alone, the Minutewomen were outscored in put-backs, 30-10.

Wright said that UMass is a different team during practice than during games. The continuity of the team as a whole shows when all the players are simply practicing against each other, trying to push one another to be better. The dynamic changes when you're playing against players who are trying to do just the opposite.

Danella works way into starting lineup

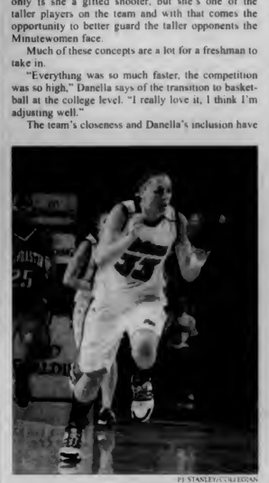
leading-scorer Stefanie Gerardot, has given the Minutewomen a revitalized perimeter game in which they can do many things.

Danella replaced Mosgrove in the starting lineup after erupting for 24 points off the bench against Boston University on Jan. 2. Mosgrove is no less talented, but she gives the UMass second unit a great boost from beyond the arc, while the other perimeter shooters work in the first unit. This gives the Minutewomen a balanced attack throughout their entire lineup.

Since entering the starting lineup, Danella's averaged 13.3 points per game, almost identical to Gerardot, a senior guard who leads the Minutewomen with an average of 13.5 during that stretch of time.

The game against the Terriers was a much-needed confidence-booster for Danella.

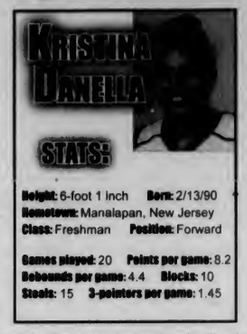
Though like any great player, Danella is not without her faults.



"Where she needs to enhance her play is defending without fouling," Dacko says about Danella's defense. "She's [also] got to fill the lane much quicker than she does."

This is an issue with many young players as they come into college because they're not used to the caliber of opposition they will routinely face. Not only is she a gifted shooter, but she's one of the taller players on the team and with that comes the opportunity to better guard the taller opponents the Minutewomen face.

Much of these concepts are a lot for a freshman to take in.



"Everything was so much faster, the competition was so high," Danella says of the transition to basketball at the college level. "I really love it, I think I'm adjusting well."

The team's closeness and Danella's inclusion have enhanced the chemistry level and intensity of practice. Danella is a quick learner and is taking in anything that comes her way when she's around her teammates. Junior point guard Kim Benton and Danella can frequently be seen together and she also learns a lot from Wright.

PJ STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Kristina Danella has hit 29 3-pointers this season, hitting on 42.6 percent of her attempts.

Height: 6-foot 1 Inch Born: 2/13/90
Hometown: Manalapan, New Jersey
Class: Freshman Position: Forward

Games played: 20 Points per game: 8.2
Rebounds per game: 4.4 Blocks: 10
Steals: 15 3-pointers per game: 1.45

From Wright, Danella has learned the valuable quality of slowing down and not trying to do too much at one time. As a freshman last season, Wright was expected to step in as the starting center and control the defense anchored by then-senior forward Kate Mills.

Mills was an All-Conference player, leading the team in blocks and Wright learned a lot from her on the defensive side of the ball. Wright frequently had a problem of taking on bigger defenders in a very aggressive way that often resulted in frequent fouls.

However, Mills frequently missed practice because of a demanding schedule as an engineering major, so Wright didn't have as much time to study Mills as she could have.

Yet Wright is there more for Danella and she is learning the patience that has led to Wright becoming more of a dynamic, physical presence beneath the basket. She also gives Danella a unique look at a forward who is quick on her feet and is very good at causing turnovers when opposing players put the ball on the floor.

Danella's willingness to alter her game to better herself and her team is paying dividends, and she's exhibiting the qualities of the new type of player seen in women's basketball today. Her versatility is incredible and her eagerness to learn can only help her.

While the Minutewomen as a whole may have difficulty pulling out tough victories by not sticking to sound fundamentals for an entire game, Danella believes it is only a matter of time before her team experiences success.

"It might not show on the court, but we're a tight-knit group. We're going to get there," Danella says of the team taking its game to the next level. "If we execute like we do every day in practice, we'll be fine."

Competing in the long jump were junior Holly Heinricher and sophomores Jaclyn Imhoff, Elaina Zizza and Ida Okkonen, a transfer from University of Jyvaskyla in Finland. Okkonen placed second in her section, had the second-best mark overall as well as the longest distance on the team with a jump of 17-06.00. Heinricher recorded a distance of 15-11.50, finishing fourth. Imhoff came in eighth place with a jump of 14-10.75, followed by Zizza with a mark of 14-05.00.

In the mile run, sophomore Elizabeth Fisk finished first on the team and fifth overall. Harlow finished right behind in sixth with a 5:33.68 mark. Darling finished in seventh with 5:33.69 and in 10th was freshman Jaime Mastrorio.

GREAT DANE CLASSIC

The Minutewomen accumulated 55 points, ranking fifth out of 30 teams Friday at the Great Dane Classic in New York. The meet was hosted by the University of Albany, which won the event.

Bakanowski and Shiyi Zan turned in first-place performances in their respective events to lead the squad. Bakanowski vaulted a height of 12-03.50, improving from her mark at the BU Multi-Team Meet. Zan won the 5,000-meter in 17:50.86, finishing 26 seconds before the second place finisher from Toledo.

Junior Brittany Bakanowski came fifth in the 500-meter run with a time of 1:16.84. Freshman Claire Pettit finished third with a time of 2:17.51 in the 800 meter. With a time of 3:02.35, Gina Perno ranked fifth in the 1000 meter event.

In the field events, Lisa Wilson finished third in the shot put with a distance of 44-feet, 6 inches and fourth in the weight throw, recording a mark of 50-04.00. Ida Okkonen had a distance of 18-09.25 in the long jump, finishing third overall.

In the relays, the distance medley "A" squad finished fifth overall, crossing the finish line in 12:50.35. The top 4x400-meter relay team ranked 10th with a total time of 3:59.27.

The Minutewomen return to action next Friday for the Reebok Games at the Reggie Lewis Track in Roxbury, Mass.

MINUTEMEN TO BEGIN SEASON

After a disappointing 2008 indoor track season, men's coach Ken O'Brien said he feels the 2008 outdoor season is a good indicator of the 2009 indoor squad.

"The team grew a year older during three months last spring," he told UMass Media Relations in an interview. "I have every reason to believe that the returning veterans will combine with some promising newcomers and give the UMass fans a lot of things to cheer about."

The Minutemen are looking to continue the success of the 2008 cross country season that won their second Atlantic 10 championship in school history.

The Minutemen began that quest Saturday at the Boston University Track and Tennis Center. There was no team score for the event, but six Minutemen qualified for the IC4A Championships with their efforts. Among them was junior Brian Miller, who finished second with a high jump of 6-feet, 4.25 inches.

Also qualifying were Tyler Cotto (high jump), Jonathan Pierce (3000 meters) and the quartet of Sean Duncan, Dan Schwatz, Pete Fortunato and Andrew McCann in the distance medley relay.

Nolet trades in figure skates for time as Minuteman

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Wrestling with a Boston College player behind the net in UMass' game on Nov. 22, Martin Nolet was doing what any defenseman does: stick up for the smaller forwards that attract most of the unwanted attention.

The tussle came after he had already scored a goal and added an assist in UMass' 4-3 overtime win. With the hard-nosed defenseman scoring goals and getting into shoving matches, it's hard to imagine that Martin first stepped on the ice not with the intent of a prosperous hockey career, but for figure skating.

Martin grew up in Quebec City, Quebec, and started playing hockey when he was 5 years old. But before he laced up skates with his friends and acted out the moves of famous Canadian players, the future hard-nosed Minuteman decided that the frail sport of figure skating was the best option.

After being confronted on his decision to do something that males usually shy away from, he laughed and thanked his UMass Media Relations representative, John Sinnett, for providing such information.

Martin started figure skating when he was 3 years old. He immediately passed the blame onto his father for making such a decision.

"It was actually my father's choice," Nolet says with a laugh. "It's basically how I learned to skate. He wanted me to be a figure skater before I became a hockey player."

When looking back on his years of figure skating, Nolet thinks the overall experience helps him to this day.

"Skating backwards is one of my strengths," Nolet says. "Figure skating proved that it helped me."

On the ice, Nolet finds comfort skating from side to side, forward and backward. Many of his teammates say he skates as fast backward as he does forward and Nolet attributes that to his early years as a figure skater.

Figure skating was the topic of many of his friends' jokes as he grew up, and Nolet knew that. In his best effort to not to be the laughing stock of his team, he skated with hockey skates instead of the typical figure skates.

Oddly enough, Martin fared pretty well. He won numerous competitions and by the time he joined his first hockey team at the age of 5, his skating ability far exceeded that of his teammates.

"I did [figure skating] for 12 years," Nolet says. "I noticed a big difference in skating between me and the kid's at my age."

Martin played hockey like it was the only thing to do growing up. His friends and neighbors would go outside, play in outdoor rinks created by the flooding of backyards. Every so often, when there were open ice times in indoor rinks, Martin and his companions would venture there.

"Everyone there plays hockey, it's like [the United States] with football or baseball – it's huge," Nolet says. "Even the kids stop going to school just to play hockey."

After Martin graduated high school he had a choice to make: continue to play hockey in Canada or get an education and play hockey on the side. Education seemed too pivotal an asset to ignore for him.

Martin chose to get an education but still play hockey at a notable school. He received numerous offers from different schools, many of them in the Ivy League. But Nolet wasn't interested in Ivy League schools; he knew they were good schools academically, but he desired a school that was known for its hockey program and still had established itself has a fine academic institution.

It was the dedication and the open lines of communication that

Danella making her mark

Freshman cracks starting 5, provides scoring punch

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Kristina Danella learned the hard way that if she wanted to be successful on the basketball court she couldn't be one-dimensional any longer.

Danella enjoyed great success while playing basketball at Red Bank Catholic High School, but that soon changed when opponents learned how to guard her. The forward from Manalapan, N.J., had to change the way she played.

RCHS was very disciplined and so, too, was every player. Similar to what she would experience in college, Danella entered high school basketball as a very timid player who had a good skill-set and a willingness to learn.

Danella was naturally gifted around the basket and was versatile with the ball in her hands, making her the constant target of opposing defensive schemes. She began to utilize the perimeter in her game and it proved deadly against opponents.

Danella transformed from a post player who could shoot to a perimeter shooter who could and would work the post.

Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko sees great things in Danella, including the freshman's desire to improve.

"She's just a basketball junkie," Dacko says. "She's what you want in every one of your athletes. For her, it's just growing into those shoes. We need her to step up and take 20 shots a game and not hesitate. In recognizing that, she will help the team. The team is behind her."

If Danella isn't lifting weights with her teammates, she can be found on the court shooting or practicing offensive sets. Sophomore center Teya Wright remarked that even as a freshman, Danella is one of the hardest workers on the team.

The biggest thing for Danella to battle with is her confidence. Being one of the purest shooters on the team, she needs to eliminate thinking before shooting. Coming into college, Danella somehow lost confidence in her prolific shooting because she was so intimidated by the speed of the game at the college level.

Dacko notes that there are players who can take a pass and drive the line for the basket, but right now Danella is thinking too much and putting the ball on the floor instead of catching and shooting.

Sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove does an excellent job of this. The shooting of both Danella and Mosgrove, to go alongside Marnie Dacko] says then I'll have a successful game."

Wright most often gets into trouble when she's beneath the basket and trying to box out against a particularly aggressive player. Charlotte senior forward Danielle Burgin was especially difficult for Wright to guard because of the height disadvantage and because of Burgin's strength.

Burgin had 13 defensive rebounds in the win against UMass and led all scorers with 21 points in addition to limiting Wright to four points and five rebounds. However, a sign of Wright's growth was the fact that she committed just one personal foul because she planted her feet and defended the ball on the ground instead of leaving her feet and going for the block.

Wright's improving knowledge of the game is good for freshman Nicole Jones and sophomore Valerie Avebe to learn from. All three players are Dacko's primary post players and the core to her defensive front.

Avebe is a speedy player who runs the floor well, which constantly gives her good defensive positioning to stop the opposing transition. She isn't a true scoring threat but with her strong and more consistent defensive play, Dacko can look past that fact.

Freshman Kristina Danella, left, improved dramatically over the winter session and moved into the starting lineup. She has scored in double figures in five of the last six games, including a 24-point effort against BU.

Wright's versatility in post big for UM

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While hybrid forwards are becoming increasingly more common in women's basketball, guarding the post is still a basic defensive concept. Big players are dual threats on either side of the 3-point line.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team doesn't have the largest group of players in the Atlantic 10; because of this, it has to create other ways of combating its taller opponents.

Sophomore center Teya Wright is the primary post player for the Minutewomen (8-12, 1-4 A-10), and she contributes to the team in her own way. She averages eight points per game and nearly eight rebounds per game, but the statistic that's most uncharacteristic of a center is her team-leading 34 steals.

At 6-foot-1, Wright is one of the smaller post players in the entire conference and she's acknowledged the disadvantage.

"It's hard to keep fighting someone that's bigger than you," Wright said of the fatigue that sets in after guarding a bigger and oftentimes stronger player.

"Even though they're bigger than me, size-wise and probably a little taller than me height-wise, the only thing I can think of is moving my feet and also [I know that] I'm faster," she added. "If I listen to what [UMass coach

The Massachusetts women's track and field team began its 2009 indoor season at the BU Multi-Team Meet on Jan. 15. UMass finished fourth overall, suffering defeats to Boston University, Sacred Heart and Boston College in dual meets.

Redshirt senior Kristen Bakanowski had a standout performance in the pole vault, outdistancing the second-place height by over one foot with a mark of 12-03.25 feet. Bakanowski's performance qualified her for the New England Championships on Feb. 27 and the ECAC Championships on March 7.

The Minutewomen placed seven athletes in the 3,000-meter event, the most of all four schools. Coming off recent success in the cross country season, redshirt sophomore Shiyi Zan placed first in the 3,000-meter run with a time of 10 minutes, 11.29 seconds. Placing sixth with a time of 11:02.42 was sophomore Kristen Darling, followed by senior Beth Harlow, who finished in 11:14.36. Finishing the race were sophomores Anna Eboch and Jamie Richmond and freshmen Jennifer Harkey and Laura Houde.

Junior Lisa Wilson easily won the shot put event with a distance of 42-04.25, defeating the second-place finisher by 1-foot, 2.75 inches. Wilson also came in fourth in the weight throw event with a mark of 45-11.75. Sophomore Stephanie Aguguo placed first in the triple jump with a distance of 37-09.50 and freshmen Sarah Kelley and Deanna Julian led their sections in the 400- and 500-meter runs, respectively. Kelley finished in 1:00.49, while Julian recorded a time of 1:20.12.

Narus, Sbordon continue success

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN

After 10 January days of what Massachusetts women's swimming and diving coach Bob Newcomb calls "heavy tanning and training" in Puerto Rico, the Minutemen and Minutewomen are home and starting off well in anticipation of the Atlantic 10 finals.

An emotional weekend of dual meet action saw the UMass seniors say farewell to competition at Joseph R. Rogers Pool. With a sweep of rival Boston College and Sunday's split with Colgate, the Minutemen and Minutewomen enter their final weeks of preparations at 5-1 and 4-2, respectively.

Here's a recap of how the teams did over winter break.

UMASS 191, BOSTON COLLEGE 109 (WOMEN)

Saturday, Newcomb paced a pool deck littered with blinding T-shirts his seniors had printed up for their underclassmen teammates. The message adorning the yellow neon, a slogan concocted back when today's veterans were once freshmen themselves, was succinct: "Bring the heat."

Backed by three wins from senior captain Christa Narus, that's just what the Minutewomen did, dominating BC on the leaderboard all afternoon.

"My freshman year, I believe it was [Taryn Prout] that came up with it," Narus explained. "We're going to wear the shirts at A-10s."

Newcomb supports his veterans' passing of the torch.

"Coming up from their freshman year and the year of having to put the lane lines in and get the water for everybody, [the seniors] have developed now to being the leaders and letting the freshmen know what they need to do," Newcomb said.

Narus and Prout's underclassmen counterparts seem to have gotten the message. Freshman Chelsea Downing led the way with victories in the 500- and 1,000-freestyle, while junior Elizabeth Walsh, freshman Elizabeth Sullivan and sophomores Jessica Starosielec and Jennifer Corriveau all chipped in with first-place times.

Pub fills for 'Empty Bowls'

Sell-out crowd dines at Amherst Survival Center benefit

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Hundreds of local residents packed into The Pub on East Pleasant Street in Amherst last night for the Amherst Survival Center's first annual 'Empty Bowls Dinner.'

The sold-out benefit brought in around 500 people in an effort to combat hunger in the local community.

Guests were served by a waitstaff which included locally-known figures like former University of Massachusetts point guard and current head basketball coach Derek Kellogg, Chancellor Robert Holub and his wife Sabine, Amherst Police Chief Charles Scherpa and Town Manager Larry Shaffer.

"Everyone that's working here tonight is a volunteer, which is amazing," said event organizer Ruth Wade.

Kellogg said he was excited to be there and came to The Pub earlier in the afternoon to practice serving tables and carrying around trays.

"I've been pretty good," said Kellogg, mentioning that he was told by one of the workers in the kitchen that he "might have a future in this."

Other members of the volunteer staff were also glad to help out.

"I love the Survival Center and the work they do there," said Shaffer. "Whatever I can do to help out, I'm happy to do."

"In these economic times, I'm more than happy to do as much as I can to help people out," agreed Scherpa.

State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg and state Rep. Ellen Story were scheduled to serve food as well, but could not make it due to legislative responsibilities, said Wade.

As people entered, they picked out their own ceramic bowls made by local artisans, which they could keep after the dinner. Those in attendance could choose from a wide selection of soups and were also served salad and freshly baked bread.

Randi Stein of Amherst and Ruth Love Barer of Hadley, Mass. said they both came to support the Survival Center.

"This is a wonderful way to support [the Center]," said Barer. "The crowd here is amazing. I'm proud to be here."

"I'm impressed with this bowl," said Stein. "It's such a tangible representation of what is needed."

Amherst resident Tammy Parks said she purchased her tickets soon after they went on sale.

"I came to support a good cause, to get a beautiful bowl and to have soup," she said.

Despite recent cutbacks, the Survival Center, established in 1975, is "expanding its food pantry, meal service, health clinic and other programs to meet the region's growing needs," outlined a recent statement.

"The 'Empty Bowls Dinner' is a great way to support those who have been hit hardest in the recession," said Cheryl Zoll, the center's executive director. "They need your help more than ever."

The benefit, sponsored by The Pub and People's Bank, "comes at a critical time for the Survival Center," the statement said.

Demand for services at the agency rose by nearly 30 percent in the last year as the global economy weakened and forced the state to cut some of its funding to the Center.

MBA students at the Isenberg School of Management (ISOM) helped publicize the event. Through a student organization called Net Impact UMass Amherst, students are serving as board fellows on the Amherst Survival Center board. According to the ISOM website, Net Impact UMass Amherst, an affiliate of a larger Net Impact organization, seeks to improve the world "by growing and strengthening a network of leaders who use the power of business to make a positive net social, environmental and economic impact."

Guests also bid in a silent auction which included glass bowls by Northampton artist Josh Simpson. Though he is a local resident, Simpson's work has obtained international recognition and is displayed in collections worldwide, including those of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and Canada's Royal Ontario Museum.

UMass student gets book deal

UMass sophomore Zac Bissonnette has been recognized for his expertise in finance, resulting in several accolades including a recent book deal.

BY NEINA HEIKKINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sophomore Zac Bissonnette is not your typical college student. An editor for WalletPop.com, America Online's financial site and blogger for TheDailyBeast.com, the 20 year old has a new addition to his already impressive resume – a book deal.

Publishers Weekly announced last month that the publishing company Portfolio beat out other bidders for the first book to be written by this entrepreneurial legal studies major.

"[The book] is about how students and their parents can make better decisions choosing colleges," Bissonnette explained. More specifically, Bissonnette's book will address the real-world value of a public versus private university education and explores how taking on ever-increasing amounts of student debt is affecting students and their parents.

How exactly does a UMass sophomore manage to get his very own book deal? According to Bissonnette, it's all about being aggressive and ambitious.

"You have to be willing to put yourself out there," he said.

Bissonnette exemplified this philosophy a year ago when he sent an e-mail to Andrew Tobias, a well-respected financial writer as well as Treasurer of the Democratic National Committee and one of Bissonnette's role models.

"I told him how much I admired his work and sent him an article that I wrote," he said.

Kuhn liked what he heard.

"He struck me immediately as unusually curious, talented and ahead of his years, a financial and business writer full of original ideas," said Kuhn of Bissonnette.

Kuhn thought that they would be able to develop the idea further and sell it to a publisher. A few short months later, they did just that when Portfolio, an imprint within Penguin Group, won the bid for the book.

Bissonnette looks back at his initial e-mail to Tobias as the real start to getting his book deal.

"The whole book thing wouldn't have happened if I hadn't e-mailed him," said Bissonnette.

UM scientist battles bacteria

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Doctors may soon have a new weapon to fight bacterial infections, thanks to research from the University of Massachusetts.

Gregory Tew, a polymer scientist at UMass, along with scientists at the University of Illinois, developed a new synthetic compound that kills even drug-resistant bacteria. The compound also destroys bacteria's ability to mutate, which is what causes bacteria to become drug resistant in the first place.

"This newly designed molecule inserts into the cell wall of bacteria and changes its curvature," said Tew in a statement. "Instead of forming stable membranes, cells treated with the new antibiotic have increased curvature which makes a hole form in the wall, killing the cell."

Finding new ways to kill bacteria is important as bacteria changes and develops resistances to previous antibiotics. Penicillin, for example, was once used to cure pneumonia, but now has little effect. New antibiotics are being used, but even those are becoming less effective.

"Understanding the details of how this antibiotic works is essential for expanding our tools for fighting infectious diseases," said Tew.

Karen Lienkamp, a post-doctoral researcher working with Tew, said the compound may find use in hospitals with instruments that have long-term contact with the body, like catheters.

These instruments are prime places for drug-resistant bacteria to develop, particularly the deadly MRSA bacteria. According to the CDC, MRSA causes 100,000 deaths every year, with $510 billion spent yearly on treatment.

However, Lienkamp says it's difficult to get poly materials, like the one they have developed, approved by the FDA, so it may be a while before the compound comes into use.

The new compound is unique in its targeting of phosphoethanolamine (PE) molecules. These are fat molecules found in the cell membranes of bacteria. The compound has potential to work in the human body because Tew says while bacteria membranes are rich in PE molecules, human cells are not.

Traditional antibiotics work by attacking other parts of the cell, like ribosomes, but have the traditional problem of bacteria developing resistances.

Finance blog leads to book

He advised other students to take advantage of the power of e-mail to get in touch with people they admired who may otherwise seem inaccessible.

"If there is someone you aspire to be like career-wise, don't be afraid to e-mail them. You'd be surprised by how they respond," he said.

Finance has been an interest of Bissonnette's since childhood. He said playing the stock market game in sixth grade was what initially sparked his interest in the subject. At 16 years old, he started blogging about finance and business. The fact that he was still in high school did not stop him from expressing his opinion.

"I felt like I had something to say," he said.

It wasn't long before people started to take notice.

"Someone at AOL saw the blog and hired me to freelance for WalletPop.com in my senior year in high school, and then I became an editor," he said.

Managing Bissonnette's full schedule is a challenge. He is working to put himself through college and complete his regular homework along with writing his book and working as an editor and blogger.

"It's a major time commitment, doing that on top of a full course load," he said. "It's very time-consuming."

Bissonnette emphasized the importance of doing things beyond academic work in college.

"I think, and this is my opinion, that a lot of people get bogged down in a set system," Bissonnette said.

"Don't be afraid to do something off the path of just getting good grades. Be entrepreneurial," he advised.

Bissonnette's book is scheduled for publication August 2010.

Boy pretends to be cop, twice

By Noreen S. Ahmed-Ullah
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — A 14-year-old boy charged with impersonating a Chicago police officer over the weekend had been caught twice before for donning a police uniform and pretending to be a cop.

Prosecutors said he is currently on probation due to a similar charge of impersonating an officer dating from December 2007. His pastor, the Rev. Roosevelt Watkins, said the boy had also been stopped by officers just last month at the Ford City shopping mall for wearing a police uniform.

On Saturday the Chicago boy signed out a police radio and ticket book at the Grand Crossing District station and went on traffic stops with an officer for about five hours before his escapade was discovered.

In the wake of the incident, top Chicago police commanders met Monday to talk about how such security breaches could be prevented, said Monique Bond, spokeswoman for the department. Police will look into how the boy obtained the police uniform but say the incident may have been prevented if other officers had earlier noticed he wasn't wearing a police star.

"We need to identify...what procedure was not followed," Bond said. "There are strict uniform guidelines and there are measures in place specifically designed to ensure supervisors check to make sure that uniforms (are in) compliance."

Most police districts are relatively open to the public, with few if any metal detectors at entrances and random checks of identification.

Fraternal Order of Police President Mark Donahue, while acknowledging the incident was embarrassing, called it a fluke and not indicative of a wider security problem.

On Monday, Watkins, pastor of Bethlehem Star Missionary Baptist Church in the Englewood neighborhood of Chicago, painted a picture of a boy whose obsession with becoming a cop and troubles at home led him astray.

The 8th grader at Gillespie Elementary School pleaded not guilty to the charges before Juvenile Court Judge Andrew Berman. Broad-shouldered and muscular, he stood before the judge with his hands cuffed behind him. Although only about 5 foot 3, he looked mature for his age. The judge ordered the boy held for a psychological evaluation until his next court appearance on Feb. 27.

For more than a year, the boy was a police explorer, shadowing cops and hanging out at the Englewood District, where he presumably picked up police lingo, Watkins said.

He was kicked out of the program after he was arrested in December 2007 when officers spotted him dressed in police clothes near the Englewood District station and grew suspicious because of his young appearance.

After a juvenile court judge assigned him the boy's temporary care, Watkins said the boy lived with him and his wife until recently and flourished under a more structured lifestyle.

The boy was arrested Saturday in police-issued cargo pants, a vest with a name tag and boots and also had a handcuff case and keys, an empty holster and a fake police badge, prosecutors said. Some of the police paraphernalia may have been stolen, Watkins said, but the boy bought some gear at a police uniform shop.

But bosses at uniform shops, required to request police identification before they sell official uniforms, scoffed that a young boy could make such a purchase.

Monday evening, a manager at Tri-Taylor Uniforms, located near Juvenile Court, turned down a customer asking to buy a security badge because he did not have proper identification.

"If they're not in full uniform, we always ask for ID," said manager Alex Alcala.

Recent job cuts leave 33,000 unemployed

By Tim Logan and Steve Giegerich
McClatchy Newspapers

ST. LOUIS — The job cuts came heavily Monday, bad news from some of the big names of American commerce.

Caterpillar. Pfizer. Home Depot. Sprint Nextel. General Motors. Texas Instruments.

When it was done, 33,000 more people faced unemployment, soon to be pitched into the worst job market in a quarter-century and an economy that seems to get gloomier by the week.

Monday's events were the latest sign of how the problems that began in housing have infected the rest of the economy. Now workers from cashiers to software engineers are getting pink slips in a market that doesn't discriminate.

More than a half-million jobs were cut in each of the past two months nationwide, and January is on a similar pace.

"Businesses are cutting jobs at a rapid pace," said Sara Johnson, an economist with IHS Global Insight. "They're reacting perhaps more quickly than in the past, anticipating that this will be a deep and lengthy recession, so there's less incentive to ride it out by holding onto their workers."

Johnson co-authored a survey released Monday by the National Association for Business Economics, in which 44 percent of companies reported job cuts in the fourth quarter, and 39 percent expected to cut more in the next six months.

"Clearly, the labor markets will get worse before they get better," she said.

While there are certainly economic reasons for these mass layoffs, at another level they spring from a kind of herd mentality, said Peter Cappelli, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business.

"Once you start getting a couple of big layoffs, then these guys feel like, 'Everybody's laying off and we'd better, too, or we'll look like we're not being efficient,'" he said. "That's a really bad reason to lay people off."

But there are fundamental problems driving this too, said Jack Strauss, an economics professor at St. Louis University. The credit crunch has stalled business on several fronts. Confidence is low. And if history is any guide, that bodes poorly for the months to come.

Strauss pointed to research that recessions triggered by upsets in the banking sector tend to last longer, and run deeper, than other downturns. This episode is already approaching the two longest since World War II in duration, with no end coming soon.

"It's going to take several years for us to really turn around," Strauss said.

The news isn't all bleak.

Health care companies and schools are still expanding. Johnson's survey found services companies are still growing. Government agencies, including the Census Bureau and the FBI, have launched recruitment drives.

But Michael Waltman, spokesman for the Missouri Department of Economic Development, said he sees job postings at an "all-time low," and big cuts such as the ones announced Monday are becoming more and more frequent.

Home Depot was among several major American companies to announce significant job cuts Monday.

Caterpillar has seen its business socked by the global slowdown, reducing demand for its mining and heavy construction equipment. Representatives of Sprint Nextel and Home Depot said their job cuts will allow each company to focus on its core business. For Sprint, that means networks and customer service, a spokesman said. Home Depot will re-emphasize home renovators and construction.

"Our goal is to focus time and resources on our core orange box stores," said Home Depot spokeswoman Paula Drake.

Home Depot will spend the next two months phasing out its high-end Expo design centers. Most stores employ between 100 and 150 people Drake said, and Home Depot will try to employ them elsewhere in the company.

Outside the Ballwin, Mo., Home Depot Expo store Monday, a handful of customers eyed $90 trash cans, $75 solid brass towel racks and $90 toilet seats. Ron Geiger of Chesterfield, Mo., said he and his wife shopped there for granite countertops, tiles and other items.

"It's too bad," he said. "They have a unique selection of goods here that you can't get anywhere else."

And that includes, Geiger added, the traditional Home Depot a mile up the street.

But the recession is forcing everyone to get back to basics, Drake said, and the market for big-ticket items has shrunk.

"The economy has certainly not been our friend," she said. "The Expo business has not performed well financially and it's not expected to improve any time soon."

Indeed, Cappelli said, it's hard to know when things will get better. With Federal Reserve interest rates near zero and lending still sluggish, businesses slashing spending and consumers hunkering down, there aren't a whole lot of levers left to pull to turn the economy around.

Blagojevich uses airwaves to defend himself as trial begins

By Ray Long and Rick Pearson
McClatchy Newspapers

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — The lead prosecutor in Illinois' historic impeachment trial urged the state Senate on Monday to remove Gov. Rod Blagojevich from office for crimes against the public while the governor spent the day in New York, lashing out at his accusers on national television.

Blagojevich was a guest on national TV shows from morning until night, including sharing the couch with the women of ABC's "The View," to plead his case that lawmakers were unfairly throwing him out of office.

At the Statehouse, prosecutor David Ellis used his opening statement to directly challenge Blagojevich's televised complaints that the political trial was rigged, saying the covert recordings by federal investigators and evidence of the governor's repeated abuse of power were all they needed to convict and remove the governor.

"We will ask you to convict Gov. Blagojevich because of his own words, not those of anybody else," said Ellis, who was appointed by House lawmakers after they impeached Blagojevich. "We are holding him accountable for things that he said and he did."

While the Senate noted for the record that neither the governor nor his representatives were there, the talk show hosts he sought to woo even questioned why he wasn't in Springfield, Ill.

An exasperated Barbara Walters asked Blagojevich whether he was "wasting time" on TV by refusing to acknowledge the accuracy of secret recordings of him allegedly trying to sell the U.S. Senate seat vacated by President Barack Obama as part of an "expletive golden" opportunity.

"I can't confirm or deny anything when I haven't had a chance to hear all the tapes," Blagojevich said. "Under no circumstances was I trying to sell a U.S. Senate seat. Under no circumstances did I break any laws, and what I'm looking forward to is an opportunity to make my case."

Blagojevich used his TV time to say he had considered talk show host Oprah Winfrey to fill the Senate vacancy left by the election of Barack Obama as president, but feared naming her would look like a gimmick. Winfrey said on Sirius XM radio that she was "pretty amused" by the governor's comment but was "just not interested."

It was the covert recordings of Blagojevich, obtained by federal agents, that Ellis said would provide the crux of the case against the governor, whom he said "repeatedly and utterly abused the powers and privileges of his office."

Ellis said an affidavit of those recordings, filed with a federal criminal complaint that led to the governor's arrest on Dec. 9, would show senators, in Blagojevich's own words, that "the governor put up his office for sale."

Senators expect to hear Tuesday a select segment of four covert recordings of the governor that federal and House prosecutors have said will allegedly show Blagojevich trying to shake down campaign donations from a horse-racing industry official in exchange for signing a bill to divert casino gambling revenues to horse tracks.

Those recordings, totaling about six minutes, are expected to be accompanied by the testimony of Daniel Cain, the FBI special agent who wrote the affidavit. The playing of the recordings and limited testimony by Cain in the Senate impeachment trial were approved by U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald in an unusual move since federal prosecutors had asked lawmakers to stay away from the criminal case while their investigation against the governor continues.

Former Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich.

Blagojevich, appearing on CNN's "Larry King Live" Monday night, said a Senate vote to remove him from office, likely only days away, was a "fait accompli." He and his lawyers have declined to mount a defense in what he alleges is a "witch hunt."

"But I'm a big boy, and I'll get over it," Blagojevich said.

Ellis dismissed Blagojevich's complaints that he could not call witnesses such as Rahm Emanuel and Valerie Jarrett, two top advisers to President Barack Obama, who previously held the Senate seat the governor is accused of trying to sell. Federal prosecutors have asked that such witnesses not be called because of the criminal investigation and lawmakers have obliged.

In contrast to Blagojevich's declaration that his rights to due process were being violated, Ellis noted "impeachment and an impeachment trial is not a criminal proceeding."

"It is not punitive in nature. We are not here today to punish Gov. Blagojevich," said Ellis, who is the legal counsel for House Speaker Michael Madigan, the head of the state's Democratic Party and a longtime nemesis of the two-term Democratic governor. "The purpose of impeachment is remedial. It is to protect the citizens of this state from the abuses of an elected officer."

Many GOPs against stimulus plan

By David Lightman
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives is expected to approve on Wednesday an $825 billion plan aimed at reviving an economy that's rapidly falling into what may be the worst recession since World War II, but President Barack Obama is likely to fall short of getting the strong bipartisan consensus he wants.

Obama made a visit Tuesday to Capitol Hill, meeting separately with Republicans from the House and Senate.

Participants praised the comity, but afterward, few GOP lawmakers said they were ready to vote for the Democratic plan.

"I'm not sure how successful he was today," said Rep. Glenn Thompson, R-Pa. "Our concern obviously isn't with the president; it's with being locked out of this process."

Democrats don't need Republican support and have accepted virtually none of their major initiatives. Democrats expect to lose at most a handful of their 255 members, 218 are needed for passage.

They'll be considering a bill that includes $550 billion in spending and $275 billion in tax cuts, measures aimed at jolting an economy that's been in a downturn since December 2007.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office reported Tuesday that without a stimulus, the shortfall in the nation's output relative to its potential would be the largest, in terms of both length and depth, since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

The CBO estimated that the current recession will last until the second half of this year, which would make it the longest since World War II. The 1973-75 and 1981-82 downturns each lasted 16 months.

The House bill includes Obama's "Making Work Pay" credit, providing rebates of $500 in payroll taxes for most taxpayers. Also included are breaks for college tuition, renewable energy and school construction.

In the spending area, the bill would create a $79 billion State Fiscal Stabilization Fund. That includes $39 billion to local school districts and public colleges and universities; $15 billion for other education aid; and $25 billion to "prevent layoffs in high priority areas such as public safety and other general services."

As the House prepared for the debate, Democratic congressional leaders and Obama seemed to be moving in different orbits.

The president listened to Republicans tell him their concerns that spending in the bill wouldn't flow quickly enough to the economy and that more tax cuts are needed.

Obama made no commitments and tried hard to be conciliatory, saying that he's "absolutely confident" that Democrats can eventually deal with Republican issues, "but the key right now is to make sure that we keep politics to a minimum."

Obama wouldn't get specific, saying only, "There are some legitimate philosophical differences with parts of my plan that the Republicans have, and I respect that. In some cases they may just not be as familiar with what's in the package as I would like."

Republicans, in turn, made it clear that they soon could agree to a bipartisan bill. The Wednesday House vote is only the first step in what's likely to be a two and a half week process.

The next stop will be the Senate, where the Finance and Appropriations committees wrote their own versions of the stimulus bill on Tuesday. Appropriations approved by 21 to 9 the $366 billion spending portion of the bill. Four Republicans joined Democrats in voting yes.

The Finance panel added a provision that would give more than 20 million taxpayers a break from paying an alternative minimum tax this year. That would add about $70 billion to the stimulus package's cost.

The full Senate plans to debate and vote on the bill next week, and because its rules are different from the House's, Republicans will be able to offer dozens of amendments.

Thus, the Senate legislation could look quite different from the House version.

Negotiators from both houses will work out the differences, with final votes likely the week of Feb. 9.

Republicans thought that Obama, who was accompanied by Transportation Secretary Ray LaHood, a highly respected former GOP congressman, had his eye on that final product.

"The real test is what happens about a week from now," said Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Ga.

Obama, noted Rep. Vern Buchanan, R-Fla., "might not get a lot of support or any support on the House bill, but I think what he's done is set the right tone for the long term. It will bring him some good will."

President Obama met separately with Republicans from the House and Senate yesterday as he continues to push his $825 billion stimulus plan.

That's not likely to be evident on Wednesday, because House Democrats were showing little inclination to give Republicans much of a chance to offer amendments. Democrats made some concessions. Officials said they'd eliminate $200 million for family planning services for lower income families, a provision that infuriated anti-abortion lawmakers.

Republicans wanted a lot more.

"So much of the spending that's in the bill ... has no place in the stimulus bill, which ought to be focused like a laser on the preservation, protection and creation of jobs," said House Minority Whip Eric Cantor, R-Va.

Republicans pointed to a CBO study last week that said only 38 percent of key infrastructure spending programs would be used by Sept. 30, 2010.

Democrats countered with a new CBO report Monday night that looked at the entire stimulus plan and found about 64 percent would be pumped into the economy during that period.

The new data, said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., "makes clear what experts have been saying all along," that the bill "provides immediate stimulus."

Lunar trip in question

By Robert Block
McClatchy Newspapers

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Kennedy Space Center on Monday unveiled a renovated building where the National Aeronautics and Space Administration hopes to assemble the space capsule that will return humans to the moon by 2020. There's just one catch. It isn't clear whether the Obama administration is going to continue the agency's moon program.

The uncertainty, however, did not stop dignitaries from Washington and Tallahassee from celebrating the opening of the new "operations and checkout facility," complete with a mock-up of the new Orion capsule.

"I am very thrilled to be here and honored to be part of this great celebration," said U.S. Rep. Suzanne Kosmas, D-New Smyrna Beach, who toured the facility along with fellow congressional freshman Bill Posey, R-Rockledge.

Both warned the crowd that extra money to accelerate NASA's moon program was not going to be easy to find. Kosmas also said she did not know what plans President Barack Obama has for the human spaceflight program.

The renovated building was built in 1964 to test and assemble the Apollo spacecraft and lunar modules.

After the Apollo program was canceled in the 1970s, the 70,000-square-foot building was used as a warehouse. Then, two years ago, the state put up $35 million to entice Lockheed Martin, the main contractor designing and building Orion, to agree to assemble the craft at KSC instead of at NASA facilities in Houston or Alabama.

Assembling Orion is expected to save as many as 400 jobs at KSC, which will lose at least 3,500 positions when the space shuttle is retired in 2010.

The building was gutted and rebuilt. The floors were designed so they can function as a giant air-hockey table, pallets carrying the capsule will be moved around effortlessly on a cushion of air.

The ribbon-cutting ceremony took place amid stepped-up efforts by NASA and its contractors to keep the moon program on track. The Constellation program, which includes both the Orion crew capsule and the Ares I rocket that will carry it into orbit, is supposed to return astronauts to the moon by 2020 and later go to Mars.

Concerns over budget, technical and schedule woes have prompted a review of the program, especially the Ares rocket, by the administration's transition team.

Faced with this uncertainty, NASA officials used Monday's event to stress that the Constellation program is not just an agency dream.

"This is a real program," KSC Director Bob Cabana said. "This isn't Power Points (computer models) ... we have real hardware here."

Cabana said the new building showed that "we are ready for Orion. We are ready to go back to the moon."

Agency officials also said some version of the Orion capsule would be needed even if NASA were ordered to use a different rocket, as some have urged.

Public schools lack state funds

Many people turn to the University of Massachusetts for their four years of undergraduate studies because it is the more affordable option.

Though the school may cost less compared to many private schools in the state, UMass and the rest of Massachusetts' public institutions of higher learning do not measure up on a national or international level. Massachusetts residents are barred from the institutions created for them, graduates are faced with enormous amounts of debt and economic decline is sustained by the dismal state of funding for public higher education.

The UMass website lists the total cost for a full-time student in the 2008-2009 academic year in tuition and fees as $10,232. In addition, housing and meals come to about $8, 114, amounting to a grand total of $18,346. This number is prohibitively large for some low and middle-income students. With rising costs each year, more and more students are forced to either withdraw from school or accumulate thousands of dollars worth of debt in loans.

Education is a right that should be granted to all people. By setting the cost prohibitively high, institutions of higher learning prevent residents of this nation and of this state from obtaining an education. Thus they also prevent residents from obtaining a decent job with decent wages. An education is the single most important thing that can help people toward the path of success and financial stability.

Massachusetts is seen as a great beacon of knowledge with some of the best universities in the country, yet these institutions are nowhere near affordable. The amount of state funding for public higher education is pitifully low, as is financial aid. According to College Board, UMass gives about 40 percent of aid in scholarships and grants, while the other 60 percent is comprised of loans and jobs. Being forced to leave college with $21, 000 worth of debt, the Massachusetts average in 2007 according to The Project on Student Debt, should not be tolerated. How can we foster a good economy without educating our people?

Though we face hard times, affordable education is within reach. A number of countries around the globe including Brazil and Cuba provide free higher education for all of their citizens. We could do this as well, but instead the state spent $1.14 billion on correction facilities in 2007, and $600,000 on new signs for the campus.

Massachusetts is seen as a great beacon of knowledge with some of the best universities in the country, and yet these institutions are nowhere near affordable.

Meanwhile, for every dollar the state spends on education, eight dollars are generated in the economy. Also, the majority of Massachusetts graduates remain in Massachusetts. With these facts in mind, it is irresponsible for the Commonwealth to underfund and neglect higher education the way it has been. Not only is education a right that our low-income residents are denied, it is also a smart investment that will both enable the people of Massachusetts to earn a living wage and produce eight times the amount of economic stimulus.

We can provide high-quality, affordable education. This is one problem that has a solution. It is simply a matter of making education a priority. The United Nations' International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights states that education is a right and, in order to ensure this right, higher education should be made accessible to all, specifically by the progressive introduction of free higher education.

Therefore, it is the state's duty to provide affordable, if not free, education for all. But thus far, we have fallen exceedingly behind. By providing more state funding and more grants and scholarships as opposed to loans, the school system in Massachusetts could improve immensely. Doing this would be advantageous to all. However, if Massachusetts doesn't support education, the economy of the Commonwealth will continue to suffer.

Forming a Palestinian Haaretz

Greg Collins

Yes, Israel has done wrong. And no, it is not anti-Semitic to say so.

It has not disciplined violent Jewish settlers in the West Bank to the extent that it should have in the past.

Its targeting and bombing of the American International School in Gaza during the most recent war destroyed one of the few positive glimmers of Western influence in the area. And it continues to provide material incentives to Jews living abroad to settle in Israel and the surrounding territories without giving equal assistance to Palestinians.

The list goes on and on. These criticisms are generated not just from anti-Israel groups in the Palestinian territories, surrounding Arab countries, and the United Nations, but are frequently expressed within Israel itself.

I remember visiting Jerusalem and reading the Haaretz, a leftist Israeli newspaper very critical of the government's policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and an ardent opponent of settlement expansion in the West Bank. Various human rights groups in Israel regularly condemn the country for its treatment of Palestinian citizens.

Put simply, there is vigorous debate within Israeli society about how to treat Palestinians, whether to expand settlements and where to draw the line between negotiating with Hamas or Fatah.

The question, then, is where is the Haaretz of the West Bank and Gaza Strip? Where is the vigorous debate within Palestinian society about these issues?

While living in Egypt and traveling throughout the West Bank and Jordan during my study abroad experience last spring, the biggest problem I observed was the lack of a diversity of viewpoints, particularly about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. When I would ask Arabs to list three criticisms of Israel, they would be quick to respond, but would struggle to utter one or two criticisms about Palestinian leadership when asked.

The stereotype in the West is that all Arabs and Palestinians think alike: anti-American government and anti-Israel. At the surface, this is undoubtedly true. If you look deeper, however, Egyptians and Palestinians do voice deep, if not popularly accepted, concerns about the conflict.

Many Egyptians are very skeptical of Hamas. They feel that the terrorist group is at least partly to blame for the escalation in violence during the past couple of years. A couple of Palestinians I have talked to have expressed deep reservations about Hamas's commitment to peace. Go on BBC.com and you will easily find articles about Palestinians in Gaza, explaining that he or she feels Hamas is at least partly at fault for the bloodshed, but are unafraid to speak up because of the large influence Hamas wields over the area.

This failure of a free, vibrant flow of information stifles critical thinking and inhibits any progress toward exploring different ways to solve political issues. Just like the free marketplace of goods and services in which those with the best utility for the people are used most effectively, the free marketplace of ideas allow the most substantive and effective thinking to be explored and seriously considered.

This failure of a free, vibrant flow of information stifles critical thinking and inhibits any progress toward exploring different ways to solve political issues.

And what happens when these ideas are stifled? What happens when people either don't have the courage to confront alternative viewpoints or when they are intimidated from doing so?

Political violence surpasses critical thinking as the most effective way to get your message across. In this case, innocent Palestinians get hurt by extremist Palestinians.

Take the words of Palestinian journalist Ashraf Ajrami, who analyzed an attack on the American International School in Gaza:

"The fight that used to be directed against the occupation has instead turned into destructive fighting that ended the relative peace and quiet," he wrote. "Internal violence has increased, including killings, theft, attacks on property, terrorizing people for political and ideological reasons and violent confrontations between Hamas and Fatah."

Ajrami himself was injured by Hamas members in a violent dispute with his family.

But it goes beyond Hamas. Other Muslim extremist groups strike fear into the hearts of innocent Palestinians and further undermine the free flow of information, as well as tarnish their own religion. For instance, the Swords of Islamic Righteousness, an al-Qaeda-sponsored group, has targeted and carried out attacks on Internet cafes, movie theaters and music stores in Gaza.

A Palestinian Authority member described the network as "a dangerous group of thugs who are using Islam as a pretext to carry out their crimes. These people are distorting the image of Islam."

Such sentiments bubble below the surface of Palestinian society. I have witnessed firsthand the incredible commitment and passion innocent Palestinians have for their people and their cause.

Now it's time to use that passion publicly to form the Palestinian Haaretz.

Many to blame for economic woes

Nick Milano

So, Bernie Madoff has become public enemy number one, the perfect example of a money-grubbing monster.

It is no surprise that the press are descending on Madoff like mad dogs. He is an easy target for the public to channel their anger to over the economy.

It's unfortunate, not only for Madoff, who has probably been seeing much more of himself in the news than he would like, but also for the rest of us. With all the attention on Madoff, it appears that one of the major players in creating the economic mess in the first place, along with the major player in being unable to do anything of substance to fix it, seems to be getting away unscathed. They deserve as much attention and obsession as Madoff.

Remember Phil Gramm? He was the silly McCain economic advisor who called the United States a nation of whiners. While I bet he's the one now whining that Barack Obama is president, his wrongdoing was working ardently for the sake of investment bankers while he served in the Senate.

Gramm was not just a lobbyist who pushed for deregulation of the investment banking community. Rather, he was the chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, which granted him unimaginable power over the United States' attitude toward shady investment methods. For example, by attaching a 262-page amendment to a spending bill, Gramm opened the door for the widespread use of financial tactics that have taken much of the blame for the economic downturn.

Senator Gramm's long-winded amendment to an omnibus spending bill, which was, in reality, a huge bill that was longer than anything a Senator could actually read and understand before voting on it, deregulated a variety of financial instruments, most notably the Credit Default Swap (CDS).

The CDS is basically a craps game in which the players gamble on whether a person faults on a home or business. It became a $62 trillion craps game – greater than the gross domestic product of the entire world. And when the dice went cold, kaboom.

So, after opening the floodgates for years of an incredibly risky investment system as a senator, can you guess what company Gramm moved into after leaving the Senate? He became a vice chairman for UBS, a Swiss investment bank. By August, it had lost some $43 billion related to the sub-prime crises. Do they appreciate his work now?

Hope's cavalier statement says it all. Why should the banks put the public sector before themselves just because they were asked?

If Phil Gramm's amendment single-handedly created a torrent of foolhardy investment tools, then former Treasury Secretary Paulson's bail-out might be responsible for prolonging the financial crisis.

A recent report in the New York Times found that many banks are simply refusing to hand out more loans as Paulsen had hoped would happen if he infused the banks with millions, if not billions of dollars. The Times article quoted John C. Hope III, the chairman of a New Orleans bank that received $300 million from the federal government.

"Make more loans?" Hope said to the Times in an interview. "We're not going to change our business model or our credit policies to accommodate the needs of the public sector as they see it to have us make more loans."

This sentiment sums up all that is wrong with Paulson's poorly designed and even more poorly implemented bailout. The government did not actually force the banks to do anything.

The United Kingdom, however, can thank the leadership of Prime Minister Gordon Brown, who forced banks to give up seats on their boards, to stop making dividend payments to shareholders and to stop executive bonuses, among other concessions. Most importantly, though, the government and banks made a legal agreement that they lend money to homeowners and small businesses.

In the United States, the opposite happened. Shareholders will still get dividend payments, executives will still get their bonuses and the government has no voting interests in any banks nor does it have seats on any boards.

Hope's cavalier statement says it all. Why should the banks put the public sector before themselves just because they were asked?

Secretary Paulson was unable, or as a former CEO of Goldman Sachs, unwilling, to force anything from the banks. Without a requirement to actually increase lending, who would refuse billions of dollars to pocket, as the Times' article found to be the case? He should not disappear into the fog as a departing Bush official. He may be responsible for incredible damage to the United States and the connected global economy.

For Phil Gramm, it cannot be argued that he is not to blame, at least partly, for the growth of risky and stupid investment tools, games that hurt. Bernie Madoff will get what he deserves when his jury comes back with a guilty verdict. There are many others who need to be held responsible by the new administration for the damage they did to the American economy Gramm and Paulsen are only a start.

A deadly conflict fueled by American funds

Jan. 7, an American-made jet bombs a United Nations school while hundreds are seeking shelter inside from an unbearable war. Some 50 innocent civilians are killed; their limbs splattering across the streets of Palestine.

Jan. 4, an American-made bomb falls on a mosque while 200 worshippers pray inside, causing 16 deaths and wounding 60, many of them children.

Zamil Akhtar

Jan. 16, American-purchased white phosphorous shells, a banned chemical weapon according to the Geneva Conventions, incinerate part of Al Quds Hospital, where hundreds of injured are being treated.

This is Israel's war on Gaza, which United Kingdom parliament member Sir Gerald Kaufman described as akin to the Nazi atrocity against the Jews of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Israel's wars are America's wars because they're armed with $5 billion worth of annual aid from the pockets of American taxpayers. The Arms Export Control Act, which regulates the export of US weapons, permits them to be used for "legitimate self-defense" but forbids their use in an "escalation of conflict."

But who escalated the conflict in Gaza, which turned into a three-week massacre by Israeli forces, whose bombs claimed 1,300 Palestinian lives and injured over 5,000?

CNN anchor Rick Sanchez investigated the matter, and in a Jan. 5 report confirmed that it was Israel who broke the Gaza ceasefire by killing six members of Hamas in a raid on Nov. 4, 2008. Hamas responded by launching rockets at Israeli towns. No lives were claimed until Dec. 27, when Israel, having broken the ceasefire initially, escalated the war further by launching a full-scale invasion of Gaza, claiming it "self-defense" against the rocket attacks.

Israel calls itself a democracy – but when you deny justice to a people based on race, and that race happens to be the majority, that is not democracy. It is apartheid.

But a look at the roots of this conflict flips this claim on its head. After the creation of Israel in 1948, Zionist settlers ethnically cleansed south Israel of Palestinians, expelling or killing them, turning those who survived into refugees. Where did these refugees go? Most escaped to the Gaza Strip.

Suffocated from all sides, Gaza is one of the most densely populated places in the world, a ghetto where 1.5 million people are barely surviving under a cruel embargo. How ironic that when Gazans fire rockets at south Israel, they are targeting the very land that was stolen from them. If Israel is "defending itself," they are doing so against people they have unjustly expelled from their homes, herded into an "open air prison" and blockaded from all sides.

"Apartheid" is what former President Jimmy Carter called it. Israel has denied Palestinian refugees their right to return home, which is guaranteed by UN General Assembly Resolutions 194 and 3236, because of their race. Israel calls itself a democracy – but when you deny justice to a people based on race, and that race happens to be the majority, that is not democracy. It is apartheid.

There are 10 million Palestinians, 4.25 million of which are refugees, most of whom live in destitute refugee camps. Compared to 5.5 million Jews in Israel, Palestinians constitute the clear majority, yet they are treated worse than black Africans were in apartheid South Africa. The apartheid government of South Africa never bombed their African population with F-16s.

"Gaza is ablaze. It has been turned into a burning hell," said Miguel Brockmann, president of the UN General Assembly. "[This is] a war against a helpless, defenseless and imprisoned people...the violations of international law inherent in the Gaza assault have been well documented: collective punishment, disproportionate military force, attacks on civilian targets, including homes, mosques, universities, schools," Brockmann continued.

Amnesty International has charged Israel with war crimes over its use of white phosphorous, a chemical weapon that sticks to the skin and burns flesh to the bone. Donatella Rovera, a researcher with Amnesty, stated, "Such extensive use of this weapon in Gaza's densely populated residential neighborhoods is inherently indiscriminate."

They are joined by Human Rights Watch, the International Red Cross and the UN, organizations that have accused Israel of various war crimes, from blocking access to injured people to unprompted attacks on civilian infrastructure. Mission accomplished Israel? Yes, if your mission was to heap suffering upon innocent civilians.

What do we Americans have to gain by supporting this atrocity? While you are losing your job, while your house is being foreclosed, billions of your dollars are going to Israel's war machine, which has satisfied itself in the killing of 400 children in 22 days of bombing. This was not America's war, yet we paid for it.

The US Congress confirmed that we are a partner in this crime by producing a resolution, 390-5, in favor of what Israel has done in Gaza. If you don't want to be part of the problem, then be part of the cure. Refuse to be liable for this oppression by standing up against it. We the American people, who respect human rights, democracy and equality in our homeland, must advance these causes for all humanity instead of hypocritically supporting the opposite of these virtues in the Middle East.

Fashion blogger shows influence in industry

By Emma Lifvergren
Collegian Staff

For the style-conscious individuals living in the Pioneer Valley, the closest you can usually get to high fashion is through magazines and the Internet.

Fortunately, there is a virtually endless number of fashion blogs out there, and Tommy Ton, founder of Jak & Jil blog, succeeds in keeping his readers up to date on the savvy styles of fashion's elite.

Ton began the site in 2005. Since then it has grown into a major blog, receiving dozens of comments a day from active readers.

Based out of Toronto, Canada, the 24-year-old blogger updates the site every day, posting images from his fashion week adventures. From Emmanuelle Alt to Gloria Baume, Ton captures fashion's most prominent figures and brings them to the rest of the world.

Not only does Ton have his hands full with Jak & Jil, but he is also a regular columnist for Canadian magazine Flare, as well as the creative director for Vintagecouture.com.

The Daily Collegian asked Ton a few questions about blogging for Jak & Jil, his life in Toronto and his fabulous adventures abroad.

Daily Collegian: How did you get involved in fashion at such a young age?

Tommy Ton: Persistence was the key. I started when I was 16 actually. I worked at a men's suit store and was really tired of fetching coffee and dusting the suit racks. So, I wrote a letter to Wayne Clark, Canada's Badgley Mischka you could say. He gave me the chance to intern for him, and then, he offered me a job as a production assistant. After that, I worked for a luxury retailer both on the sales floor and in their buying office. And now I work for an online e-commerce site and contribute a monthly column to Flare Magazine.

DC: Have you always been a fashion junkie?

TT: I have since I was 13. I knew instantly I wanted to be in fashion when I was watching Fashion Television and when I caught a glimpse of Tom Ford's spring/summer 1997 collection for Gucci. I was floored by how the models looked and was taken away by the way Tom Ford spoke so passionately. From that moment on, fashion became my everything – and still is.

DC: Describe your personal style.

TT: My own personal style has changed considerably over the past several years. It's gone from punky eccentric to nu rave. But now it's very safe and casual. After going to fashion weeks abroad, I've keenly observed the greats of my industry and have taken inspiration in the way that they dress so effortlessly. So basically I wear a lot of black now, but I make sure everything fits well. My everyday uniform now consists of a blazer, a loose fitting t-shirt, narrow fitting jeans and Pierre Hardy sneakers. Pretty simple and boring.

DC: Who/what are your style icons and inspirations?

TT: My style has changed quite considerably over the years, but I'm probably most content with how I dress now – something that can be attributed to my work and meeting the greats of my industry. It's funny that my style icons are women, but I'm inspired by Emmanuelle Alt and Kate Lanphear in particular because they have certain ease and an effortless way of dressing that I can relate to. Their style is based on this uniform way of dressing which is very much about investment dressing. They have this way of developing an essential wardrobe that carries on season after season. They never look dated. Plus, they wear a lot of black. So yeah, they've inspired me to be more conscious about my purchases and to always buy what goes well with what I have. When in doubt, buy black.

DC: Tell me about your experiences covering fashion month in September.

TT: Fashion month is a whirlwind of experiences. Over the course of 30 days, you're constantly on the go, moving from city to city, chasing after the most fashionable people in the world and trying to take their picture. It's the most exhilarating and exhausting experience of my life. At the beginning in New York, you're so eager to be a part of it and you're in such a good mood and so eager to take photos, but when you arrive to London and Milan, you've lost the desire to get up everyday and go to a dozen fashion shows. By month's end, you're so happy it's almost over, and Paris's fashion week hosts the world's most premier designers and everyone comes to Paris. I generally don't party in New York, London or Milan, but in Paris everything is so laid back that you can't help but want to enjoy yourself and mingle with the greats of the industry.

DC: Who is your favorite designer?

TT: I find that to be a difficult question just because in fashion there are so many designers, and you appreciate their aesthetic for many different reasons. I have favorite designers for certain periods. I favor Cristobal Balenciaga and Christian Dior for the 1950s era. In the late 1990s and early 2000s, I favored John Galliano, Alexander McQueen and Tom Ford very much. They inspired me to get into fashion. But if you were to ask me who my favorites were today, I'd say Ricardo Tisci for Givenchy, Stefano Pilati for YSL and Rick Owens. I feel they understand the modern woman and what her wants and needs are.

DC: Where in the world do you consider the most stylish people to live?

TT: I would say that London hosts the most stylish people. Everywhere you go in London, the city reeks of style. Londoners just have an innate, effortless sense of style. There's just an eclectic mix of individual style there. I guess you can attribute it to the city's love of culture. The city and people thrive on the energy, and it's reflected in their style.

DC: Other than Jak & Jil, what are your favorite fashion blogs?

TT: I like different blogs for different reasons. I really like New York Magazine's The Cut just because of the immediacy of it and how many times they update on a daily basis. I think Fashion Toast and Style Bubble are fantastic, just because they've influenced many girls and inspired them to want to play dress up. I love Just Jr.'s blog because it's so well laid out, and he's such a talented artist.

DC: How do you keep up with so many different endeavors, like the blog, being a style photographer and columnist and running Vintagecouture.com?

TT: There's really no explanation for that actually. All I can say is that my love for fashion is what really motivates me. If I didn't love what I do, then I probably wouldn't be able to juggle so many endeavors. Passion is the driving force for me. My passion for fashion.

DC: If you could raid anyone's closet, whose would it be?

TT: Ohhh...that's a very tough question. Um, I would probably raid Ashley Olsen's closet. I love how her wardrobe consists of a uniform and everything is always perfectly tailored in her closet. Plus, she has killer accessories.

DC: What is the style scene like in Toronto? Does it inspire your own personal style?

TT: It's funny, when you go to cities like New York and Paris, it becomes very clear to you what style really is. So unfortunately, I have to say that there's really no style scene in Toronto. You can't really define it because it's sort of uninspiring and vague. I really have no desire to dress up here in Toronto. Comfort has been in favor more than ever in my everyday style.

DC: What words do you live by?

TT: I don't think I live by any words, but I know I try not to live by negative words. It really gets under my skin when people use the word "hate." If anything I guess, I try to live my life positively and fill it with positive words. "Positively" being the key word. Sounds corny, I know.

McQueens's designs strike Target with affordable prices

(MCQ)

Alexander McQueen brings his unique style to Target, which will allow its consumers a chance to purchase his designer clothing for affordable prices.

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Correspondent

This March, Target retailers will release their latest fashion-forward clothing line to the bargain-loving masses. The event will be a cause for celebration for its most stylish customers, who will be able to afford clothes produced by major, high-fashion designers.

The program, called Designer Collaborations, is Target's latest plan to make high-fashion designers' lines available to the common shopper, who couldn't normally afford a $325 pair of pants. Designers for the program are asked to create affordable collections based on a specific muse.

The corporation has created other similar programs, such as GO International, which featured lines from up-and-coming international designers.

The most recent designer to create products specifically for the Target brand was Anya Hindmarch, who designed a series of handbags in October. Inventories of her bags sold out almost immediately.

Alexander McQueen, widely known as the "bad boy of fashion," designed the first line for the Designer Collaborations initiative. His muse is Leila Moss, frontswoman for the English band, Duke Spirit.

The line is an edgy take on classy looks, with an obvious punk rock aesthetic. McQueen incorporates dark colors, skinny jeans and studs into the line, which will be called "Alexander McQueen for Target."

Pieces from the collection range in style from relatively basic looks to more complex, detailed designs. The designs include an asymmetrically-cropped cap-sleeved jacket, an all-black one piece, and several solid and patterned dresses. Most are black with a hint of color – pink, blue, white or patterns – for contrast.

While not all of the pieces in the line are asymmetrical, the ones that are appear to be among the most high-fashion-looking looks available. Each look lives up to McQueen's reputation as one of the most unconventional high-fashion designers in the industry.

McQueen also played with different shapes in his collection, adding rounded sleeves to a top and a dress. He also featured a one-strap bubble dress. Each look is airy and light, perfectly appropriate for spring.

The collection also includes an elegant piece of swimwear in the form of a black bikini.

The line may be considered a retail-friendly version of one of McQueen's previous collections, called McQ.

Unfortunately for consumers, the line does not include McQueen's fabulous stiletto heels featured on each page of the collection's look book.

McQueen has also designed for Givenchy and Puma. He has done other work with Gucci, and released a line of cosmetics with MAC in 2007.

Look for Alexander McQueen's line at Target between March 1 and April 11, 2009. A new designer's line will take its place shortly after. Target has yet to release more information about other designers participating in Designer Collaborations.

Collegian's fashion writer sifts through crowds to find satirical seers on campus and beyond

By Heather Waxman
Collegian Staff

The Daily Collegian took a look around campus for some fashion enthusiasts, and this week we found Lisa Ho.

The Basic Info
Lisa Ho, Sophomore
Major: Communications; Minor: Women's Studies

The Attire
Wrap: Vintage Fox Fur
Belt: Salvation Army
Dress: American Apparel
Tights: Target
Heels: Nine West

The Interview

Daily Collegian: Who do you look to for style inspiration?

Lisa Ho: I would say [model] Vanessa Traina and Lou Derwin and the Gainsbourg family. French 1960s icons and menswear really inspire me.

DC: When did you start to develop your own personal style?

LH: I think it started probably junior year of high school. Before then, I was kind of a mess, always wearing generic clothes and then I just got into it.

DC: You mentioned the Gainsbourg family. Does music play a big role in your fashion?

LH: Definitely music. I mean, everyone grows and changes, and I guess my fashion [and music taste] just changed when I did.

DC: What are some staples and go-to items?

LH: I always wear black. I'm always in black, so that's my go-to item. It's kind of hard sometimes getting ready in the morning because everything in my closet is black. So I kind of sift through everything. I really like black because you can do pops of colors with things. It stands out, it's basic and it looks good with everything.

First lady overcomes wardrobe faux-pas

Michelle Obama's fashion hopes to be different than standards of president's wives in the past

By Robin Givhan
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Few first ladies have caused as much breathless anticipation for their Inauguration Day wardrobes as Michelle Obama.

But soon after she stepped onto the national stage as the candidate's wife, Obama was elevated to a fashion star whose tastes ran from high-end designers to mass marketer H&M. She had the impressive height of a runway model, the figure of a real woman, a size 12 according to one fashion publicist and took an admitted delight in looking "pretty."

For the historic moment when she became this country's first African American first lady, Obama chose a lemon-grass yellow, metallic sheath with a matching coat by the Cuban-born designer, Isabel Toledo. The dress followed her curves, paying special attention to the hips, and announced that the era of first lady-as-rectangle had ended. It signaled a generational shift in what women could be on the national stage. They could boldly embrace color and reveal their power, their femininity and their legs.

Recent first ladies seem to have tried, at least during the first term, to hold on to the idea of normalcy, no matter that they are living in the White House with staff, security and the albatross of history. At their husbands' first inaugurations, Hillary Clinton and Laura Bush wore uninspired clothes that seemed to make a case against women being unique.

Obama's mere presence on the Capitol steps Tuesday was an anomaly, and her clothes celebrated that. Her coat and dress made her look exceptional, and vaguely regal, as she stood holding Lincoln's cranberry-hued Bible in her gloved hand as her husband took the oath of office. Her daughters, Malia in a grape-colored coat and black tights and Sasha in pale pink and tangerine, were like her little ladies-in-waiting. President Obama, he was the somber one, in his dark overcoat with a tiny flag pin, his white shirt, red tie and his face tilted ever so slightly to the sky.

With Toledo, Michelle Obama reached into the loftiest corners of the fashion industry and chose a small design house where the person whose name on the label is the same person hunched over the sketchpads, following production and fretting about whether she will be able to get her merchandise to market on time. Obama avoided the expected names, the well-funded houses and the corporate designers. Toledo does not advertise. Her wares are sold in only a handful of stores, from Barneys New York to Chicago's Ikram, the North Rush Street shop where Obama has been a regular customer.

She wore the ensemble with olive leather gloves and Jimmy Choo pumps that were a deeper, forest shade of green, refraining from going dreadfully matchy-matchy. The entire picture spoke of womanliness, grandeur and elegance, and it declared Obama's ease with being a woman of modest background thrust into extraordinary circumstances. Shy and retiring personalities do not wear glittering citron under the noon sun.

For her inaugural gown, Obama chose another young New York-based designer, Jason Wu, 26. His custom-made gown, in flowing ivory silk chiffon with a single strap, was embroidered with silver thread and adorned with Swarovski crystal rhinestones. This is the barest gown that a first lady has worn at an inauguration since Nancy Reagan wore a James Galanos gown to usher in Ronald Reagan's first term. Wu's dress bares Obama's arms and shoulders and brings the first lady into the modern era, in which glamour is defined by Hollywood and the red carpet rather than protocol and tradition.

The dress speaks to Wu's signature style: grown-up clothes with a youthful flourish. Wu, who was born in Taipei, Taiwan, and studied in Paris and Vancouver, B.C., as well as at Parsons School of Design in New York, has been in business only since 2006. Obama wore his clothes and Toledo's during the campaign.

Obama's grace Tuesday gave no hint of her ambivalence about the public obsession with her style, which began early in the campaign. Her appearance on "The View" in a $148 sundress proved that she not only could stir interest in fashion, but also could move merchandise simply by wearing it. With her Ivy League pedigree, her high-powered job and her soccer-mom credentials, she made the case that any woman could and should embrace fashion. When she casually commented that she never wore pantyhose, the definition of dressing for success changed. When she bounded onto the stage in her sleeveless dresses, with her muscular post-Title IX arms in full view, the definition of a strong woman changed.

Obama has been compared to Jacqueline Kennedy, the last first lady to so thoroughly embrace style as a form of communication. Much is made of the fact that they both wore sleek, sleeveless dresses and had an affection for pearls. But the real similarities may be in the way they used clothes to set a tone for their husbands' administrations.

As her husband's administration promises more jobs and help for small-business owners, and emphasizes creativity as one of this country's greatest assets, Obama's choice of an iconoclastic, immigrant female designer with a modest business sends a profound message of intent.

The frantic guessing game of what Obama would wear was fueled by scant information and even fewer rumors. She kept her secret by calling in multiple gowns. A small village of designers created daywear. Her spokeswoman, Katie McCormick Lelyveld, said that in the days before the swearing-in, the first lady had been in no hurry to pick out her wardrobe. Her focus was on her children and getting her family moved, not once but three times, McCormick Lelyveld said.

Obama saved any announcement of her final choices until the last minute. But once the wardrobe began to roll out, beginning with the whistle-stop tour from Philadelphia to the nation's capital, it was clear that she would continue to shift between price points, alternating between fitting in and standing out. For the train trip, she wore a black swing coat, one that she'd been photographed wearing in Chicago this winter, with a purple three-quarter kimono sleeve jacket by Zero Maria Cornejo. Who? Cornejo is another New York-based designer with a dedicated following and virtually no profile outside the fashion industry.

Obama chose a custom-made pale purple Narciso Rodriguez coat when she accompanied her husband to Arlington National Cemetery, where he laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns. And on Sunday afternoon, she was again wearing custom-made Rodriguez: a camel wool coat and matching skirt with a black silk beaded blouse. She paired it with nude legs and low-heeled pumps. (A quibble: The line of that ensemble might have been better served with a pair of boots rather than those sensible heels.) The look was accessorized with a pair of diamond chandelier earrings by Loree Rodkin that retail for $17,313. They were lent by the Chicago boutique Ikram.

The bill for the entire inaugural trousseau was paid by the Obamas, McCormick Lelyveld said.

The easy shift between price points has captivated observers accustomed to recent first ladies who have dressed in either pricey designer fashions by Seventh Avenue heavyweight Oscar de la Renta or nondescript blahness. Obama dresses the way contemporary women do, mixing J. Crew with the splurges in their closet. They combine pragmatism with polish. And for this inauguration, despite the dire shape of the economy, they also brought glamour.

First lady Michelle Obama opted for looks from young designers for the inauguration, including threads from Cuban-born Isabel Toledo and New York City based- Jason Wu.

At a brunch sponsored by Essence on Sunday afternoon, the room was filled with black women, black women like Michelle Obama with fancy degrees, big jobs and a sense of style. They admired Obama immensely. In fact, the January issue of the magazine with Obama on the cover is on track to surpass the record set by the Tyler Perry cover, which sold 319,000 copies. They admire how she has shifted the perception of how a first lady should look. Perhaps all the attention to her clothes is unfair, too demanding. Perhaps folks should have been breathlessly anticipating what sort of initiatives she will ultimately champion. But where's the fun in that?

"The attention to clothes is always too much, but it's part of the fun. You're curious to know: What style is she going to set for this presidency," said Alexandra Martinez, assistant dean and director of admissions at the Harvard Kennedy School.

Martinez was wearing an aubergine suit by Lafayette 148 and had in her possession no less than three Badgley Mischka gowns, one for each of the balls that she would attend. "Who would wear the same dress twice in one inaugural weekend?" she asks. And more to the point, why should a successful, smart and fashion-conscious woman have to?

Solid blacks and severe geometry display at Pugh's London fashion debut

By Adam Tschorn
Los Angeles Times

PARIS — A pair of newcomers to Paris men's fashion week set out their stark vision of menswear, and they didn't so much push the envelope as light it on fire and beat out the flames with a gilded elk horn.

Avant-garde London-based designer Gareth Pugh, known for his intricate geometric designs and out-there pieces, closed the four days of Fall/Winter 2009-2010 shows in Paris on Sunday with the debut of his men's line.

It was a collection full of black patent-leather trench coats, side-buttoning tuxedos that recalled goth matador costumes and shredded and sliced jeans. Jackets were cropped, and there were silver, metallic fabrics looking like leather chain mail, as well as fur, and silver, shard-like epaulet details.

Some pieces were embellished with carpet tacks in a Pinhead-from-"Hellraiser"-meets-futuristic-porcupine sort of way. Heavy, black, multi-buckled boots rose nearly to the knee, and a plethora of intricate black and white triangle designs recurred in a motif that also cropped up on silver trousers and silver leather trenches. All of it seemed pulled from a sharp, imposing future, or sliced out of a double helix – except when it came to the quilted puffer vests and long jackets (it's nearly impossible to look ominous in a quilted nylon vest).

It was rumored that LVMH (which owns or has stakes in a stable of luxury men's brands, including Louis Vuitton, Givenchy and Dior Homme) had taken an interest in Pugh, a 27-year-old who graduated from Central Saint Martins College of Art and Design in London in 2003 and mounted his first London Fashion Week solo show just three years ago.

Pugh's aggressive goth severity was reminiscent of Rick Owens' men's runway debut in Paris two days earlier (not too surprising, as Owens mentored Pugh). With music from the opera "Salome" playing, models – some with partially shaved heads and others with locks as long and flat as the designer's – strode forth, bundled in layers of skins, tunics and wraps atop a collection of boots so malevolent-looking that they could have clip-clopped out of the same shoe store of the damned where Gene Simmons gets his demon boots.

Belted black trench coats (some without sleeves) were cinched into wasp-waistedness. Floor-length shifts were open under the arms from shoulder to hip bone, and the only accessory in the entire show was a lone gilded elk horn worn as a necklace.

"I wanted it to be severe," Owens said after the show, and you didn't need a "Mission Accomplished" banner tacked up behind him to know he had succeeded.

As he met with well-wishers and media backstage, the California native held up an all-access pass. It depicted his decapitated head on a serving platter, shoulder-length hair flowing off the plate like blood. It was a quirky, macabre moment, an inside joke as layered as the tunics on the runway, involving the opera soundtrack and the biblical story of Salome (she demanded the head of John the Baptist on a platter). And in a way, it's a commentary on what could happen if his men's show doesn't inspire buyers.

But despite the dark overtones, Owens grinned from ear to ear, head still firmly attached to his neck.

Sixty-five year reunion in Superbowl XLIII

By Harvey Fialkov
Sun Sentinel

The Steelers and Cardinals can trace a close relationship to long before 2005 when Arizona coach Ken Whisenhunt and offensive line coach Russ Grimm were on Bill Cowher's staff that directed Pittsburgh to its last Super Bowl title.

The two franchises endured a brief, yet rocky one-year marriage in 1944 when the NFL was short on manpower because of World War II. Then-Commissioner Elmer Layden asked patriarchal owners Art Rooney of the Pittsburgh Steelers and Charles Bidwill of the Chicago Cardinals – who had gone winless the year before – to merge into the Card-Pitt combine.

It didn't take long before they were dubbed the Car-Pits – as in carpets – because as one fan put it, "teams walked all over them." Card-Pitt finished 0-10, leading Steelers co-owner Bert Bell to summarize: "The season couldn't have turned out any worse than this one."

Vince Banonis, a two-way standout at center and defensive tackle for the Cardinals from 1942-50 before finishing his career in Detroit, considers himself lucky for leaving the team after three games when a Navy admiral noticed one of his charges was playing in the NFL.

"I'd take a weekend leave, hitchhike from Wildwood, N.J., to Philly. Take a train to New York and a midnight plane to Chicago, and get in at 5 a.m.," said Banonis, 87, who said he was wearing his No. 32 Cardinals jersey back home in Southfield, Mich., during a telephone interview.

"The linebacker got injured so I played both ways for 55 minutes... then the Admiral called and that was that.

"Most of the players were leftovers, 35-year-old guys rejected by the service who practiced at night and worked factory jobs all day. That's why we didn't do so hot. I'm glad I left because it was pretty rough not being able to practice with the team all week or stay in shape running."

Card-Pitt split their home games and uniform colors at Chicago's Comiskey Park and Pittsburgh's Forbes Field. The respective coaches of the 1943 Cardinals and Steelers, Phil Handler and Walt Kiesling, were co-head coaches, which instantly divided the locker room.

The co-coaches' bizarre decision to punt on first down deep in their own end rather than run out the clock cost them a sure victory in a season-opening 30-28 loss to the Cleveland Rams.

"The coaches couldn't get along," said former Card-Pitt tackle Chet Bulger, 91, of Fairfax, Va. "We didn't have a punter so we all tried out. Tackles, ends, but they couldn't get a guy to play football."

Starting quarterback Coley McDonough was drafted into the army after the second game, a 34-7 loss to the Packers. After another dismal 34-7 loss to the Chicago Bears in which Card-Pitt managed just four first downs, the co-coaches fined Johnny Butler, John Grigas and Eberle Schultz $200 apiece for "indifferent play." The players went on strike, refusing to practice the following Tuesday.

"We all went across the street and sat down," Bulger said. "We left the coaches out there by themselves. It was silly."

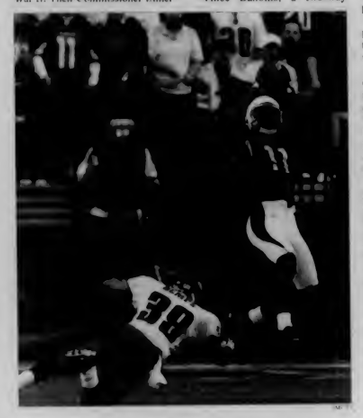
The whole season was "silly." After a hearing with Rooney, Grigas and Schultz returned, but Butler was shown the door.

During a 42-20 midseason loss to the Redskins, Bulger broke his nose in a huge brawl that had to be broken up by the D.C. police.

Despite a chance to win the rushing title, Grigas pulled a Ricky Williams the night before the season-finale 49-7 loss to the Bears when he left the team with a soulful note in his hotel room.

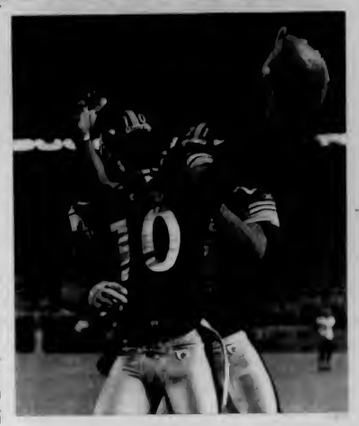
"When your mind is changed because of the physical beating, week in and week out, your soul isn't in the game," Grigas wrote.

The miserable merger was mercifully dissolved. It's the only winless season in Steelers history. Statistically, Card-Pitt was truly the pits, finishing with eight touchdown passes and 41 interceptions, still the third-highest mark in NFL history. They were outscored 328-108.



Ernie Bonelli missed the '44 season, but he played halfback for the Cardinals in 1945 before being traded to the Steelers in 1946. Bonelli, a spry 89 who still plays golf near his Sarasota home, won't have any divided loyalties Sunday.

"I'm from Pittsburgh, went to Pitt, so my vote goes to the Steelers, but if the Cardinals win, what the heck," Bonelli said. "We have to handle their good end Larry Fitzgeraldt. He went to Pitt, too."



Banonis and Bulger returned to Chicago following the Card-Pitt's lone season and along with Bonelli were part of a 28-game winless streak. But with the influx of returning soldiers plus the addition of the "Dream Backfield," led by Georgia $100,000 phenom and future Hall of Fame halfback Charley Trippi, the Cardinals won their first and only NFL title in 1947.

Bonelli said his Steelers taskmaster coach Josh Sutherland had the team practicing an unprecedented twice a day but still Pittsburgh didn't win its first championship for another 30 years in Super Bowl IX.

Now 61 seasons later the Cards are finally on the brink of another while their former other halves pursue an NFL-record sixth Super Bowl title.

Larry Fitzgerald has caught 23 passes for 419 yards and five touchdowns in Arizona's first three playoff games.

Santonio Holmes caught two passes for 70 yards and a touchdown in the Steeler's 23-14 victory over the Ravens in the AFC Championship game.

Former UM coach hired at Miami U.

By Susan Miller Degnan
McClatchy Newspapers

MIAMI, Fla. — University of Miami football fans worried that the team will lose recruits without a coordinator in place, please exhale.

The Hurricanes will have a new offensive coordinator Tuesday.

A high-ranking source close to the situation told The Miami Herald on Monday that Philadelphia Eagles offensive assistant Mark Whipple has been hired as the Hurricanes' offensive coordinator.

Pending human-resources protocol, including drug-test results, Whipple's hiring is expected to be announced Tuesday. A news conference likely will be held after the announcement is made.

Whipple, 51, will be the Hurricanes' fourth offensive coordinator in five seasons. He will replace Patrick Nix, who coached at UM for two seasons and was fired in December. Before Nix, there was Rich Olson and Dan Werner.

UM's new offensive coordinator will hit the road almost immediately to convince any wavering recruits that their best opportunities will come in Coral Gables.

Whipple was hired by the Eagles in late January 2007. He is known for being creative and smart and not being afraid to throw the ball, and throw it often.

"I didn't know Mark that well, bringing him here," Eagles coach Andy Reid told The Philadelphia Daily News in late July. "I just knew the things he'd accomplished. I talked to (ex Steelers-coach) Hill Cowher, and Bill really liked him, said he'd be one of the first guys he'd hire if he came back as a head coach."

He is an Ivy Leaguer, having earned his bachelor's degree in political science in 1979 from Brown University, where he was the Bears' starting quarterback from 1977-78. More importantly for UM fans: Whipple spent 16 seasons as a head coach on the collegiate level, compiling a 121-59 (.672) overall record and leading Division I-AA Massachusetts to the national championship in 1998. That same year he was named Division I-AA Coach of the Year.

He also has a Super Bowl ring.

Whipple was the Pittsburgh Steelers' quarterbacks coach from 2004-06, developing quarterback Ben Roethlisberger. Roethlisberger became the youngest starting quarterback to win a Super Bowl after the Steelers defeated Seattle 21-10 in Super Bowl XL after the 2005 season.

Whipple coached at UMass from 1998-2003, at Brown from 1994-97 and at New Haven from 1988-93.

McNeal leads Eagles over Irish

By Todd Rosiak
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — The Marquette Golden Eagles' senior class left the Joyce Center on Monday night the same way they came into it three seasons earlier – with a victory.

Thanks to a 27-point night by Jerel McNeal and some strong defense down the stretch against reigning Big East player of the year Luke Harangody, MU recorded a 71-64 victory over Notre Dame, becoming the second consecutive team to win on a home court that had played host to 45 consecutive Irish triumphs prior Saturday.

Wesley Matthews added 16 points, Dominic James 15 and a team-high nine rebounds and Lazar Hayward 13 as the Golden Eagles (18-2, 7-0 Big East) ran their winning streak to 10 games and remained atop the league standings, one-half game ahead of fellow undefeated Louisville.

"They were tougher than us the last five minutes," said Notre Dame coach Mike Brey. "They were the more mature team tonight."

Harangody scored 29 points and grabbed 17 rebounds to lead the Irish (12-7, 3-5), who are in the midst of a four-game losing streak and a stretch that sees them face five consecutive ranked opponents.

The Golden Eagles shot 43.1 percent and were out-rebounded, 47-34, but countered by holding Notre Dame to just 36.4 percent shooting – including gunner Kyle McAlarney to just nine points on 3-for-12 shooting – and committed an incredible three turnovers.

MU's season low for turnovers this season was eight, and seven last season.

MU, which rose to No. 8 in the Associated Press' media poll earlier in the day, utilized the same small lineup in the second half that helped turn around the Providence game last weekend, but to limited effect early as Notre Dame turned a three-point halftime deficit into a 45-42 lead with 11 minutes 48 seconds remaining in the game.

It was at that point that the Golden Eagles' offense came alive, as they stopped settling for 3-pointers and instead concentrating on driving to the rim.

Three layups by McNeal, two by James and a short jumper and a jump hook leading to a three-point play by Hayward got MU back in front at 57-53 by the 5:39 mark, and Hayward's two free throws with 3:01 left put the Golden Eagles back in front for good, at 61-59.

MU held Notre Dame to just two field goals over the final 4:16, and Harangody to just one basket over the final 11:47.

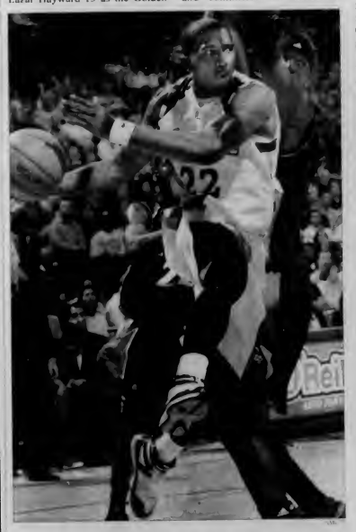
James who went down in pain in the closing seconds after being bumped on a layup by Harangody, suffered a bruised right shin. The injury is not considered to be serious.

The first half was more like McNeal vs. Harangody than MU vs. Notre Dame.

McNeal scored 16 of the Golden Eagles' 33 points in the opening 20 minutes, including 11 consecutive helping them take a 20-14 lead at the 9:12 mark. He did a little bit of everything over that stretch, with a pair of traditional three-point plays, a 3-pointer from the left corner and a runner.

Harangody, meanwhile poured in 17 of the Irish's 30 points, showing an array of moves that even included a 3-pointer from the top of the key. He also did a good job of getting both of MU's post men, Dwight Brake and Pat Hazel, into foul trouble as Burke went into halftime with two and Hazel three.

MU took its biggest lead of the first half at 24-17 on a Matthews jumper, but saw its advantage dwindle to 33-30 on a putback by Harangody with 2:33 left in the half.



The Golden Eagles managed just two field goals over the final 4:55, but still went into the locker room at halftime with that 33-30 lead.

MU shot 41.2% and was outrebounded, 24-17, but mitigated that by holding Notre Dame to 34.4% shooting. Key in that figure was Kyle McAlarney's 1-for-4 shooting in 20 minutes, as he finished with just three points after being hounded for most of the first half by McNeal.

The Golden Eagles also helped themselves by committing just two turnovers, but went just 2 for 2 from the free-throw line – a huge dip from their usual numbers there.

As expected, Brey made two changes to his starting lineup entering the game: Jonathan Peoples for Ryan Ayers, and Tyler Zeller for Zach Hillesland.

Zeller scored eight points in 13 first-half minutes, powered by 2-for-3 shooting from 3-point range.

Marquette's Jerel McNeal's 27-point effort against Notre Dame on Monday night helped lift the Eagles to a 71-64 victory over the Irish.

Providence finds a mid-season revival

opportunities – a 20.5 percent success rate.

"The first half of the year, our power play was hurting," Northeastern senior Ryan Ginand said to The Boston Globe following the Huskies 6-3 win over Providence Saturday night. "During the Christmas break, we had team building and we said, 'We have to amp up our power play if we want to be a national contender.' The special teams separate the games. We've been working on it a lot, and things are starting to click."

Still, a regular season conference championship means very little. It may guarantee a bid to the 16-team NCAA tournament, but a Hockey East championship is the current goal of the Huskies.

RARE MIDSEASON ACQUISITION

The same people who planned for Northeastern's eventual demise assumed Providence was destined for a last-place finish when the first half of the season ended.

PC coach Tim Army decided midway through the first semester to find another goaltender in hopes of salvaging the final three months.

Army and his staff settled on Alex Beaudry, who was in second year at the University of Ottawa. Since Beaudry is a Canadian citizen, Army had more to worry about than enrolling him at the College.

"It took some time," Army told USCHO's Jim Connelly. "I felt that we had to find somebody for the second term. We had a number of goalies we were evaluating.

"Verbally we had things done [quickly], but you have to go through the paperwork," Army continued. "Being a Canadian citizen, there's immigration to go through and so forth – it took time. With the holiday, it was hard to get everything done."

Army finished the process of enrolling Beaudry at Providence on Friday, Jan. 9. Beaudry practiced with the team that day and was the starting goaltender the next night against UMass-Lowell.

Since Beaudry became Army's first-choice goaltender, the Friars have climbed into the race for the eighth and final spot in the Hockey East tournament.

Slumping Maine made it easier for the Friars with four losses in its last five games. The Black Bears, however, hold a four-point lead over PC; both teams have 12 regular-season conference games remaining but do not meet again this season.

PAIRWISE PREDICTIONS

The latest PairWise Rankings have Boston University as the No. 1 overall team in the nation. The PWR is a system designed by the college hockey media to mimic the formula used by the NCAA when finalizing the field of the 16-team NCAA tournament. Although the NCAA does not endorse the method, it has correctly predicted the last eight NCAA tournament fields.

The champions of college hockey's six postseason tournaments earn automatic bids to the NCAA tournament. The remaining 10 slots go to the teams with the highest PWRs that did not win conference championships.

As of now, Boston University, Northeastern, Vermont, Boston College and New Hampshire would qualify for the tournament – assuming one of those teams wins the Hockey East tournament. The conference tournaments do offer surprises on occasion, so any team that qualifies for the conference championship could potentially earn an automatic bid.

If one of those five teams were to win the Hockey East tournament, the other five would qualify. Should another team win the tournament – UMass, for example – Hockey East could have as many as six of the 16 teams in the tournament.

Crowder works on and off ice

advantage from his relationship with Cahoon; he had to put in as much effort as anyone else.

"He has a rich athletic background in his family, but you would never know that unless you asked him or heard about it from someone else," teammate Chris Davis said. "He doesn't use it to his advantage or anything like that because he doesn't have to. He's a good player."

Scott Crowder celebrates with Brian Keane during an exhibition game prior to this season. Crowder has been named to three consecutive Hockey East All-Academic Teams.

Crowder typically plays on the fourth line and is tasked with preventing the other team's top offensive threats from scoring. He is not the most athletic or imposing player on the team. Standing 5-foot-11 and weighing 192-pounds, he's not exactly small, but can't rely on superior size or strength. His success comes from doing the little things and understanding the game.

"[Crowder's] not going to score a lot of goals, but his most noticeable traits are more about finishing checks, grinding and making it difficult for the other team," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

"[Crowder's] a guy who'll finish his check, get the big hit and get the puck out at the right time, and grind their defense down. He's just an all-around hard-working guy," linemate Brett Watson said.

There isn't a whole lot of recognition gained from playing on the fourth line. His statistics of one goal and two assists in 20 games this season doesn't exactly make professional scouts drool, but Crowder and the 'checking line' are just as important to the team's success as talented goal-scorers like James Marcou or Alex Berry. If the Minutemen's fourth line can stifle the opponent's best players, it makes the game easier for everyone else. It's a high-pressure job, but it's a position Crowder enjoys.

"You can go out there and turn a whole game," Crowder said. "You can go out there and drop somebody, and that gets that crowd going, which gets the bench going. That can turn the whole momentum of the game for your team."

Obviously, Crowder would like to score more goals, but he knows if he makes life tough for the opponent, he's done his part.

"If I'm not putting the puck in the net, I'd rather put somebody on the ice," Crowder said.

Being raised by a coach did help teach Crowder one thing about not only hockey but life itself. He saw firsthand that effort and consistency are traits coaches and teammates value most.

"I think with coaches [they care] more about accountability and what you are going to give every night," Crowder said. "Coaches don't like players who, one game, will give a 10 [in effort] and the next game give you a two."

The rink is not the only place that Crowder displays his work ethic. He has been named to the Hockey East All-Academic Team three times in a row and majors in business and sports management, an achievement that makes his father glow with pride.

"For me, I'm probably more proud of what he's doing academically than what he's doing athletically. He's going to get out there with a dual degree," Bruce said. "He didn't take the easy way out academically; he made sure he was taking the full load [of classes]."

It's likely that Crowder will not get to play in the NHL as his father did, but Bruce could care less. He's just happy to have raised a good kid.

"We're very proud of both our boys, they've never given us a stitch of trouble and they've been good kids. Once you have kids and you can say that when's it's all said and done you did a good job," Bruce said.

Atlantic 10 lacks a consistent parity

see it all come together in a big win. So they expect more. But it rarely comes.

Every now and again, one of these teams would sneak up to a level of Tier 2, but again, it doesn't last. That's why these teams are in a group below. And while these teams raise your blood pressure, it's all the more rewarding when they make the NCAA Tournament because it doesn't happen often these days (UMass hasn't made one in over a decade).

4. THANKS FOR PLAYING

There are six remaining teams in the conference – Saint Louis, Duquesne, La Salle, St. Bonaventure, George Washington and Fordham – which I'll place here.

I'll admit, it's a bit offensive to the former four to be lumped together right now with the latter two programs. But let me explain.

I'm not saying a Duquesne-Fordham matchup is going to be an even game. The Dukes (13-6) would trounce the 2-15 Rams. So would the Billikens (11-8), and so would the Explorers (11-7).

But these six teams are clearly a notch below the third group. These are the six teams that are at the bottom of the conference standings almost every year. You'll see Saint Louis or Duquesne in the middle sometimes, but they're not about to make March Madness. Maybe next year they'll win 20 games, but you can pretty much lock all these teams into the bottom half of the league every time.

CONCLUSION

Xavier will make the NCAA Tournament.

Out of Dayton, Temple and Saint Joseph's – one or two of them will make it.

Out of group three, a few of them will get their fan base's hopes up – and none of them will make it.

And for teams like George Washington and Fordham? They'll be rooting for the Cardinals in the Super Bowl, and they'll go to bed afterwards dreaming it could happen to them on the hardwood.

It won't. That reality is reserved for Xavier only.

A sports debate, Orr the greatest

Ryan Fleming

The debate goes on in every sport – amongst writers, fans, players and owners. They all bicker over who the greatest ever was. The player who competed the hardest, the player who changed the game for the generations to come after him; the single individual who lives on in memories, floating around until we realize that it was their great, monumental moments that made us love the game.

Despite how we witness their greatness, their overwhelming domination over the competition, whether it was live and in person, on the television or through a book of pictures, we know who the great ones are.

In the NHL, there have been players that made their mark, destroyed records and replaced the former names with theirs. Wayne Gretzky, Mario Lemieux, Maurice "Rocket" Richard, Bobby Hull and Steve Yzerman have made their mark on this international game, but none are so tremendous as Bobby Orr.

Robert Gordon Orr changed the way the game was played; he changed the mentality of defenseman for years to come. In 1966-67, the year Orr joined the Bruins, defensemen played their position differently than they did before he transformed it. Defensemen would stay at home, not really thinking about joining the offensive attack. It was almost as if Orr decided to throw the position's ritual out of the window and say, "I'm going to play how I want." That's pretty much what he did.

It was Orr who charged up the ice, leading the offensive rush. Orr, signed at age 12 by the Boston Bruins, was tested in his first season with the club. At that time, the NHL had players, or "goons" as they are still called now, who would go up to the young rookie and challenge him in a scrap. That was the only year he would be bothered.

Orr's offensive abilities were uncanny. He won the Art Ross Trophy, leading the league in scoring in 1969-70 and 1974-75 – the only defenseman ever to lead the league in scoring. In the 1970-71 season, Orr had 139 points, most ever in a single season by a defenseman. Some 102 of those points were assists, again, most ever by a defenseman. Orr is also the owner of the highest plus/minus in one season with a +124.

In his trophy case, however large and wherever its location might be, Orr is the holder of eight Norris Trophies, from 1968-75, given to the best defenseman in the league. He is also the only player to win four trophies, (beside the Stanley Cup, which the Bruins also won in 1970) Norris, Art Ross, Hart Memorial Trophy (MVP) and the Conn Smythe (MVP in the postseason). Oh, and he also won the Calder Memorial Trophy (Rookie of the Year).

He didn't have a teammate to protect him; he did his own dirty work. He forced opposing teams to alter their style of play in an attempt to slow down the 1979 Hall of Famer (youngest ever inducted at 31). Orr, the Boston Globe's greatest athlete in Boston history, skated faster, played harder, fought better and did all of those things with such great ease each time he stepped onto the ice.

Xavier and the rest

Eli Rosenswaike

Surely you picked the Arizona Cardinals to make the Super Bowl before the season started. You probably also picked the Tampa Bay (Devil) Rays to somehow make the World Series after a decade of futility.

The Rockies in 2007? You saw that coming. The Dolphins making the playoffs after a 1-15 season? Check.

Your nose is longer than Pacman Jones' rap sheet if you claim you legitimately thought any of that was going to happen. Truth is, you can't. You know these things do happen, you just don't know which team will do it or when.

That's called competitive balance, parity. From one year to the next, any team could come out of nowhere and compete for a championship.

So any time now, pencil in the Fordham men's basketball team for an Atlantic 10 Championship.

Not exactly.

College basketball is different. Each year there seems to be a team that makes a surprise run – Davidson in 2008 and George Mason in 2006 – but you don't see these teams winning championships. That's reserved for the big-time programs: North Carolina, Duke, Kentucky, UCLA, Kansas, etc.

The same applies to the Atlantic 10. There's Xavier, and then there's everybody else. But if you examine it closer, you can break the A-10 into four separate and distinct categories.

1. XAVIER IS BETTER THAN YOU

This program just gets it.

They are supremely talented, especially compared to the rest of the conference. They are coached exceptionally well under Sean Miller. They recruit well. They play the right way, with stifling defense and team-oriented basketball.

And they basically kick the rest of the A-10s collective butts on a yearly basis because of it. At 17-2 (5-0 A-10), the No. 10 Musketeers are in line for their third straight regular season conference title and seventh in the last 13 years.

They're in the NCAA tournament every year and the only team in the conference that can legitimately state they can compete for a national title. They made a run to the Elite 8 last season and will likely do the same in March.

2. XAVIER'S KID BROTHERS

Just as you would do with a younger brother, Xavier picks on the second-tier of the Atlantic 10: Temple, Saint Joseph's and Dayton.

These programs are consistently strong and typically make the NCAA Tournament, but Xavier always shows these teams who's boss come March.

When they beat a ranked team, it's not such an upset. You expect them to be in the mix for an at-large bid, but you come to expect them to be one-and-done in the NCAA Tournament.

Every once in a while one of these three teams will make a Sweet 16, but it's far too infrequent for them to be in the same echelon as Xavier.

3. HELLO, MEDIOCRITY!

That title is not meant to slight Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Charlotte or Richmond. Those are four solid programs that are always competitive.

It's just that, well ... they are as inconsistent as Britney Spears' parenting practices. One day they're beating ranked teams and looking like a talented contender, and the next they're dropping home games to whom they have no business losing.

Take UMass for example. They've been real strong the past two seasons during the regular season, earning a first-round bye in the A-10 Tournament both times. And how did they follow that up? They got bounced out as quickly as possible – not even an 18-point lead against Charlotte held up last year – and missed out on the NCAA tournament because of it.

See ROSENSWAIKE on page 8

Sean Miller and the No. 10 Musketeers are off to a 5–0 start in Atlantic 10 play and host UMass on Saturday at noon. Xavier is hoping to win the conference regular season title for the third year in a row.

BRIAN TELLERMAN – COLLEGIAN

Northeastern has been the surprise team in the Hockey East this season. The Huskies currently hold a four-point lead over second-place Boston University and a six-point lead over third-place Vermont as they head to Amherst on Friday.

Huskies holding first in Hockey East

By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

College hockey fans on either side of Commonwealth Avenue don't worry too much when it's late November and a team like Northeastern occupies the top spot in the Hockey East standings.

Every year, one of the typical underdogs puts together a few nice wins and cracks the top 10 in the national polls; and every year, it seems, that team finishes fifth and sixth before a prompt exit in the first round of the conference tournament.

It happened again this year. People chuckled when Northeastern, led by junior goaltender Brad Thiessen, won eight of its first 12 Hockey East games. The annual drop-off was scheduled for sometime around the beginning of February.

Well, February starts in three days, and the Huskies enter the stretch run four points clear of second-place Boston University and six ahead of third-place Vermont.

The Huskies travel to Amherst for a Friday night meeting with Massachusetts before The Beanpot begins Monday night; they take on Boston College in the first round of the annual event. Although Monday's game doesn't count in the conference standings, a win will provide the Huskies with a decided psychological advantage when the teams meet again to end the Hockey East portion of their schedules.

Hockey East

NU coach Greg Cronin relies mostly on Thiessen and his defensemen. The offense is more about the timeliness of its goals rather than the raw number of them. Only strengthening their bid for a Hockey East championship is the play of its penalty kill. The unit kills off a conference-leading 89.9 percent of its penalties. Lately, NU's power play has enjoyed similar success, scoring on seven of its 34

Crowder making a name all his own

Senior follows father's footsteps

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

Scott Crowder's father was a professional hockey player and a collegiate hockey coach for 14 years. Crowder grew up around hockey all his life and is currently a forward for the Massachusetts men's hockey team. Despite this, he said that his father was never a "hockey dad."

"We've always tried to keep it just father and son. Our relationship has never been about hockey," Crowder said. "It was obviously a huge part of our lives, but it wasn't like 'you've got to go to the gym; you've got to stick handle for an hour,' it was more like 'have fun, do whatever you want.' He didn't force it on me."

Hockey is in the water at the Crowder household. The entire family lives and breathes hockey in some form. However, when Crowder was growing up with his father, they rarely talked about the sport. Crowder noted that hockey was his dad's job and after all, how many kids talk about what their father does for a living on a daily basis?

Crowder's father, Bruce Crowder, played on the Boston Bruins for three seasons, notching eight goals and adding four assists. When his playing career ended, he spent the next 14 years coaching. Bruce worked behind the bench at Maine, UMass-Lowell and, most recently, Northeastern where he was the head coach for nine years. Through his father's experience, Crowder learned from an early age what hockey was all about.

"I had the opportunity to go into the locker room and talk with the college kids when I was like six or seven. My whole life was like that – the hockey lifestyle, the hockey everything. Friday, Saturday night I would be driving to either my games or his games," said Crowder.

Bruce is proud of his son's accomplishments on the ice and is happy he chose to follow in his footsteps, but he emphasized that the choice to play hockey was made by Scott.

"The one thing I told both my boys (Crowder has an older brother Kevin who also played hockey) was that this is their dream. I lived my dream [of playing in the NHL]," Bruce said.

Because his father had to travel so often as a coach, Crowder didn't get to work with his father too much and learned the game on his own. He developed his own style and became known for his physical play and nonstop effort. Eventually, Crowder assumed that he would one day play for his father at Northeastern. However, it was not meant to be as Bruce Crowder was fired from Northeastern in 2005, just before Crowder entered college. He did not want to play for a school that his dad was fired from, so he looked at other schools in the same conference (Hockey East) because he wanted to play in the conference he grew up watching.

Luckily for Crowder, many of the coaches in Hockey East were familiar with him due to his father's position. Crowder has known UMass coach Don Cahoon since he was six years old. The two were close enough that when Crowder was in high school, Cahoon had Crowder babysit his grandchildren while he attended a coach's convention in Florida. So when Crowder did not go to Northeastern, Cahoon was happy to give him a shot.

Despite the family connection, Cahoon did not and still does not give Crowder any special treatment. Several times during his freshman and sophomore years, Crowder was left off the active roster and was forced to attend the game as a fan rather than a player.

"When you're sitting up there and you worked as hard as the other guys in practice and you see them playing over you..." said Crowder.

The experience of being left out only served to motivate Crowder further to work hard in practice. It also proved to Crowder's teammates that he was not going to get or accept any Senior Scott Crowder was left off the active roster at times during his first two years at UMass, but that just served to motivate the defensemen. This year, the senior has played in 20 games and added a goal and two assists while playing on UMass' fourth line.

UMass student receives book deal after running financial blog

By Niina Heikkinen

An editor for WalletPop.com, America Online's financial site and blogger for TheDailyBeast.com, the 20 year old has a new addition to his already impressive resume – a book deal.

Publishers Weekly announced last month that the publishing company Portfolio beat out other bidders for the first book to be written by this entrepreneurial legal studies major.

"[The book] is about how students and their parents can make better decisions choosing colleges," Bissonnette explained.

More specifically, Bissonnette's book will address the real-world value of a public versus private university education and explores how taking on ever-increasing amounts of student debt are affecting students and their parents.

How exactly does a UMass sophomore manage to get his very own book deal? According to Bissonnette, it's all about being aggressive and ambitious.

"You have to be willing to put yourself out there," he said.

Bissonnette exemplified this philosophy a year ago when he sent an e-mail to Andrew Tobias, a well-respected financial writer as well as Treasurer of the Democratic National Committee and one of Bissonnette's role models.

"I told him how much I admired his work and sent him an article that I wrote," he said.

Bissonnette's assertiveness paid off. Last July, Tobias invited him to attend a benefit lunch for Barack Obama in New York.

At the event, Bissonnette met another one of Tobias's guests, literary agent David Kuhn of Kuhn Projects LLC. Grabbing the opportunity, Bissonnette pitched the idea for his book.

Kuhn liked what he heard.

"He struck me immediately as unusually curious, talented and ahead of his years, a financial and business writer full of original ideas," said Kuhn of Bissonnette.

Kuhn thought that they would be able to develop the idea further and sell it to a publisher. A few months later, they did just that when Portfolio, an imprint within Penguin Group, won the bid for the book.

Bissonnette looks back at his initial e-mail to Tobias as the real start to getting his book deal.

"The whole book thing wouldn't have happened if I hadn't e-mailed him," said Bissonnette.

He advised other students to take advantage of the power of e-mail to get in touch with people they admired who may otherwise seem inaccessible.

UMass sophomore Zac Bissonnette has been recognized for his expertise in finance, resulting in several accolades including a recent book deal.

New interim chief for UMPD

By Adam P. Coulter
Collegian Staff

Johnny C. Whitehead has been appointed interim director of public safety and chief of police at the University of Massachusetts, filling the position left by last semester's departure of Chief Barbara O'Connor.

Joyce Hatch, vice chancellor for administration and finance, said the appointment was effective Jan. 4.

"I look forward to working with Deputy Chief Whitehead in his new role," said Hatch. "I am confident that he will lead in an exemplary fashion and continue to grow UMPD's reputation as a top law enforcement unit in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

Whitehead has served as deputy chief for operations at the UMass Police Department since March 2007. In 2007, O'Connor described him as "a capable, accomplished, professional individual."

"As chief of operations I was responsible for the operational components of the department, including the patrol and traffic safety functions, the Detective Bureau, K9 Unit, Mounted Unit, Tactical Arrest and Control Team and training," said Whitehead.

As interim director and chief at UMPD, Whitehead will oversee 63 officers as well as the many different facets involved with promoting and policing a safe and productive campus community.

"I am responsible for the performance of the entire police department and all of its functions and services," said Whitehead. "My priority is to ensure that our officers and staff have the resources and support they need to help the campus community achieve its research, teaching and learning goals in a safe and orderly environment.

"One of our immediate challenges is to maintain the momentum of emergency preparedness. The university has made significant investments in technology and emergency notification systems; training and implementation of these new technologies remain a priority for the department," he added.

Before joining the UMPD Whitehead was senior policy advisor on public safety issues to the lieutenant governor of Maryland from July 2001 to January 2003. In this capacity he oversaw policy development and provided research and advice on law enforcement and safety issues such as community-based policing, domestic and gun violence and state and federal legislation.

From 1997 to 2001, Whitehead served as director of operations for the Maryland Department of Transportation's Motor Vehicle Administration, where he directed more than 900 employees in 25 branch offices and 19 vehicle inspection stations. He also managed operations components of the agency and dealt with customer service, fraud prevention and detection and budget management.

Before serving in Maryland, Whitehead climbed through the ranks of the Baltimore County Police Department from 1979 to 1997, advancing from police officer to colonel and finally to chief of the Field Operations Bureau.

As a colonel in the BCPD from 1995 to 1997, he oversaw 1,300 employees in eight precincts, with marine, aviation, auxiliary, tactical and K-9 units. He also was in charge of a traffic section and youth and community service sections as well as a $55 million budget.

UMass' community is smaller in both size and scope, but Whitehead says that won't change his job description.

"While jurisdictions may differ, the issues and challenges remain the same regardless of size and complexity. Throughout my law enforcement career I have practiced a community policing philosophy," said Whitehead. That philosophy consists of "crime prevention: enforcement strategies; and community outreach."

Starting in 1994 through 1995 he was a major and commander of the Towson Precinct, overseeing 105 officers. He also commanded the employment and basic training division as a captain from June 1993 to December 1994 in charge of recruitment and basic training, and worked as a legislative connection to local, state and federal lawmakers as a sergeant and lieutenant from 1986 to 1991.

Whitehead earned a master's degree in applied behavioral science from John Hopkins University in 1996 and a bachelor's degree in criminal justice from the University of Baltimore in 1992. He also graduated from the FBI National Academy and the Federal Executive Institute.

Chief Barbara O'Connor served in the UMPD for 25 years and left the Amherst campus in January for a job as the executive director of public safety at the University of Illinois.

Pub fills for 'Empty Bowls' benefit dinner

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

Hundreds of local residents packed into The Pub on East Pleasant Street in Amherst last night for the Amherst Survival Center's first annual "Empty Bowls Dinner."

The sold-out benefit brought in around 500 people in an effort to combat hunger in the local community.

Guests were served by a waitstaff which included locally-known figures like former University of Massachusetts point guard and current head basketball coach Derek Kellogg, Chancellor Robert Holub and his wife Sabine, Amherst Police Chief Charles Scherpa and Town Manager Larry Shaffer.

"Everyone that's working here tonight is a volunteer, which is amazing," said event organizer Ruth Wade.

Kellogg said he was excited to be there and came to The Pub earlier in the afternoon to practice serving tables and carrying around trays.

"I've been pretty good," said Kellogg, mentioning that he was told by one of the workers in the kitchen that he "might have a future in this."

Other members of the volunteer staff were also glad to help out.

"I love the Survival Center and the work they do there," said Shaffer. "Whatever I can do to help out, I'm happy to do."

"In these economic times, I'm more than happy to do as much as I can to help people out," agreed Scherpa.

State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg and state Rep. Ellen Story were scheduled to serve food as well, but could not make it due to legislative responsibilities, said Wade.

As people entered, they picked out their own ceramic bowls made by local artisans, which they could keep after the dinner. Those in attendance could choose from a wide selection of soups and were also served salad and freshly baked bread.

Randi Stein of Amherst and Ruth Love Barer of Hadley, Mass. said they both came to support the Survival Center.

"This is a wonderful way to support [the Center]," said Barer. "The crowd here is amazing. I'm proud to be here."

"I'm impressed with this bowl," said Stein. "It's such a tangible representation of what is needed."

Amherst resident Tammy Parks said she purchased her tickets soon after they went on sale.

"I came to support a good cause, to get a beautiful bowl and to have soup," she said.

Despite recent cutbacks, the Survival Center, established in 1976, is "expanding its food pantry, meal service, health clinic and other programs to meet the region's growing needs," outlined a recent statement.

"The 'Empty Bowls Dinner' is a great way to support those who have been hit hardest in the recession," said Cheryl Zoll, the center's director. "They need your help more than ever."

The benefit, sponsored by The Pub and People's Bank, "comes at a critical time for the Survival Center," the statement said.

Demand for services at the agency rose by nearly 30 percent in the last year as the global economy weakened and forced the state to cut some of its funding to the Center.

MBA students at the Isenberg School of Management (SOM) helped publicize the event. Through a student

UM scientists fight 'superbugs'

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Doctors may soon have a new weapon to fight bacterial infections, thanks to research from the University of Massachusetts.

Gregory Tew, a polymer scientist at UMass, along with scientists at the University of Illinois, developed a new synthetic compound that kills drug-resistant bacteria. The compound also destroys bacteria's ability to mutate, which is what causes bacteria to become drug resistant in the first place.

"This newly designed molecule inserts into the cell wall of bacteria and changes its curvature," said Tew in a statement. "Instead of forming stable membranes, cells treated with the new antibiotic have increased curvature which makes a hole form in the wall, killing the cell."

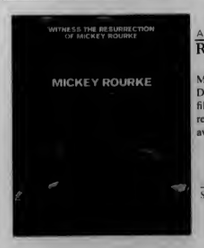
Finding new ways to kill bacteria is important as bacteria changes and develops resistances to previous antibiotics. Penicillin, for example, was once used to cure pneumonia, but now has little effect. New antibiotics are being used, but even those are becoming less effective.

"Understanding the details of how this antibiotic works is essential for expanding our tools for fighting infectious diseases," said Tew.

Karen Lienkamp, a post-doctoral researcher working with Tew, said the compound may find use in hospitals with instruments that have long-term contact with the body like catheters.

These instruments are prime places for drug-resistant bacteria to develop, particularly the deadly MRSA bacteria. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, MRSA causes nearly 19,000 deaths every year, with up to $20 billion spent yearly on treatment.

However, Lienkamp says it's difficult to get poly materials, like the one they have developed, approved by the Food and Drug Administration, so it may be a while before the compound comes into use.



The new compound is unique in its targeting of phosphoethanolamine (PE) molecules. These are fat molecules found in the cell membranes of bacteria. According to Tew, the compound has potential to work in the human body because, while bacteria membranes are rich in PE molecules, human cells are not.

Traditional antibiotics work by attacking other parts of the cell, like ribosomes, but have the traditional problem of bacteria developing resistances.

Finance blog leads to book

"If there is someone you aspire to be like career-wise, don't be afraid to e-mail them. You'd be surprised by how they respond," he said.

Finance has been an interest of Bissonnette's since childhood. He said playing the stock market game in sixth grade was what initially sparked his interest in the subject. At 16 years old, he started blogging about finance and business. The fact that he was still in high school did not stop him from expressing his opinion.

"I felt like I had something to say," he said.

It wasn't long before people started to take notice.

"Someone at AOL saw the blog and hired me to freelance for WalletPop.com in my senior year in high school, and then I became an editor," he said.

Managing Bissonnette's full schedule is a challenge. He is working to put himself through college and complete his regular homework along with writing his book and working as an editor and blogger.

"It's a major time commitment, doing that on top of a full course load," he said. "It's very time-consuming."

Bissonnette emphasized the importance of doing things beyond academic work in college.

"I think, and this is my opinion, that a lot of people get bogged down in a set system," Bissonnette said.

"Don't be afraid to do something off the path of just getting good grades. Be entrepreneurial," he advised.

Bissonnette's book is scheduled for publication August 2010.

Brown students, musicians use iTunes as marketing tool

By Lauren Pischel
Brown Daily Herald

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The iTunes Store greets viewers with the usual charts of top artists and songs. But closer inspection reveals Brown undergraduates have also found a niche on the popular downloading site.

"Having music on iTunes – it's an amazing way to market your music because everyone knows iTunes," said singer-songwriter Kayla Ringelheim '11, who has a full album and several additional tracks on iTunes. "For some reason it really resonates with people."

For musicians at Brown, iTunes is not an exclusive means for distributing their music or providing a major source of income, but it is one of several channels to spread their songs to a larger audience.

iTunes "just adds another layer of credibility," said Andy Suzuki '09, a pianist who is working to add his first album to the iTunes Store. One of the first questions people ask him, he said, is if his music is on the online music store.

"I think a lot of people get gift certificates, or they have parents' credit cards registered on there," said Rosalind Schonwald '12, a Herald contributing writer who has an album on iTunes called "Model Martian Moon Boy."

iTunes takes 30 cents for every 99-cent song purchased on its site, according to many of the student artists. There is about a two-month delay between the time of purchase and the time the musician receives a check.

"It's like a little surprise present in the mail," Ringelheim said.

Schonwald characterized her music as folk. She was highly influenced by Sarah McLachlan, to whom she listened in her childhood. Schonwald has also studied jazz for the past three years, which has affected her vocal style and chord structure, she said.

Ringelheim started taking piano lessons at the age of 10. Her singer-songwriter teacher inspired her to write her own music – songs inspired by Joni Mitchell and Norah Jones, who is "poppy or whatever, but she is good," Ringelheim said.

Besides selling her music on iTunes, Ringelheim also performs at a "tight network" of coffeehouses up and down the East Coast. "Once you kind of get in there, there are a bunch of places you can play," she said.

Ringelheim recently released two singles on iTunes in December: "Corner and Stone" and "Two Suns."

iTunes is not necessarily a large source of income for these artists.

"We don't really care about making money for shows," said Doug Berman '09, guitar player and singer for the band Saturday Morning Project, which is made up of six Brown students. "iTunes is just another way to have our stuff out there."

Boy pretends to be cop, twice

By Noreen S. Ahmed-Ullah
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — A 14-year-old boy charged with impersonating a Chicago police officer over the weekend had been caught twice before for donning a police uniform and pretending to be a cop.

Prosecutors said he is currently on probation due to a similar charge of impersonating an officer dating from December 2007. His pastor, the Rev. Roosevelt Watkins, said the boy had also been stopped by officers just last month at the Ford City shopping mall for wearing a police uniform.

On Saturday the Chicago boy signed out a police radio and ticket book at the Grand Crossing District station and went on traffic stops with an officer for about five hours before his escapade was discovered.

In the wake of the incident, top Chicago police commanders met Monday to talk about how such security breaches could be prevented, said Monique Bond, spokeswoman for the department. Police will look into how the boy obtained the police uniform but say the incident may have been prevented if other officers had earlier noticed he wasn't wearing a police star.

"We need to identify...what procedure was not followed," Bond said. "There are strict uniform guidelines and there are measures in place specifically designed to ensure supervisors check to make sure that uniforms (are in) compliance."

Most police districts are relatively open to the public, with few if any metal detectors at entrances and random checks of identification.

Fraternal Order of Police President Mark Donahue, while acknowledging the incident was embarrassing, called it a fluke and not indicative of a wider security problem.

On Monday, Watkins, pastor of Bethlehem Star Missionary Baptist Church in the Englewood neighborhood of Chicago, painted a picture of a boy whose obsession with becoming a cop and troubles at home led him astray.

The 8th grader at Gillespie Elementary School pleaded not guilty to the charges before Juvenile Court Judge Andrew Berman. Broad-shouldered and muscular, he stood before the judge with his hands cuffed behind him. Although only about 5 foot 3, he looked mature for his age. The judge ordered the boy held for a psychological evaluation until his next court appearance on Feb. 27.

For more than a year, the boy was a police explorer, shadowing cops and hanging out at the Englewood District, where he presumably picked up police lingo, Watkins said.

He was kicked out of the program after he was arrested in December 2007 when officers spotted him dressed in police clothes near the Englewood District station and grew suspicious because of his young appearance.

After a juvenile court judge assigned him the boy's temporary care, Watkins said the boy lived with him and his wife until recently and flourished under a more structured lifestyle.

Blagojevich defends himself on television

By Ray Long and Rick Pearson
McClatchy Newspapers

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — The lead prosecutor in Illinois' historic impeachment trial urged the state Senate on Monday to remove Gov. Rod Blagojevich from office for crimes against the public while the governor spent the day in New York, lashing out at his accusers on national television.

Blagojevich was a guest on national TV shows from morning until night, including sharing the couch with the women of ABC's "The View," to plead his case that lawmakers were unfairly throwing him out of office.

At the Statehouse, prosecutor David Ellis used his opening statement to directly challenge Blagojevich's televised complaints that the political trial was rigged, saying the covert recordings by federal investigators and evidence of the governor's repeated abuse of power were all they needed to convict and remove the governor.

"We will ask you to convict Gov. Blagojevich because of his own words, not those of anybody else," said Ellis, who was appointed by House lawmakers after they impeached Blagojevich. "We are holding him accountable for things that he said and he did."

While the Senate noted for the record that neither the governor nor his representatives were there, the talk show hosts he sought to woo even questioned why he wasn't in Springfield, Ill.

An exasperated Barbara Walters asked Blagojevich whether he was "wasting time" on TV by refusing to acknowledge the accuracy of secret recordings of him allegedly trying to sell the U.S. Senate seat vacated by President Barack Obama as part of an "expletive golden" opportunity.

"I can't confirm or deny anything when I haven't had a chance to hear all the tapes," Blagojevich said. "Under no circumstances was I trying to sell a U.S. Senate seat. Under no circumstances did I break any laws, and what I'm looking forward to is an opportunity to make my case."

Blagojevich used his TV time to say he had considered talk show host Oprah Winfrey to fill the Senate vacancy left by the election of Barack Obama as president, but feared naming her would look like a gimmick. Winfrey said on Sirius XM radio that she was "pretty amused" by the governor's comment but was "just not interested."

Embattled Illinois Governor Rob Blagojevich.

It was the covert recordings of Blagojevich, obtained by federal agents, that Ellis said would provide the crux of the case against the governor, whom he said "repeatedly and utterly abused the powers and privileges of his office."

Ellis said an affidavit of those recordings, filed with a federal criminal complaint that led to the governor's arrest on Dec. 9, would show senators, in Blagojevich's own words, that "the governor put up his office for sale."

Senators expect to hear Tuesday a select segment of four covert recordings of the governor that federal and House prosecutors have said will allegedly show Blagojevich trying to shake down campaign donations from a horse-racing industry official in exchange for signing a bill to divert casino gambling revenues to horse tracks.

Those recordings, totaling about six minutes, are expected to be accompanied by the testimony of Daniel Cain, the FBI special agent who wrote the affidavit. The playing of the recordings and limited testimony by Cain in the Senate impeachment trial were approved by U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald in an unusual move since federal prosecutors had asked lawmakers to stay away from the criminal case while their investigation against the governor continues.

Blagojevich, appearing on CNN's "Larry King Live" Monday night, said a Senate vote to remove him from office, likely only days away, was a "fait accompli." He and his lawyers have declined to mount a defense in what he alleges is a "witch hunt."

"But I'm a big boy, and I'll get over it," Blagojevich said.

GOP eyes Democratic senate seats

By Perry Bacon Jr.
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — The confusion and controversy surrounding the recent appointments of four Democratic senators has come with a potential twist – it could complicate the party's efforts to solidify its majority in the Senate.

New York's Kirsten Gillibrand, who was sworn in this week to fill the seat vacated by Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, became the third person named to the Senate in the past month who could face difficulty winning re-election next year.

Republicans are already eyeing strong challenges to Sens. Roland W. Burris, Ill., and Michael F. Bennet, Colo., both selected by their states' governors over others seen as stronger contenders for statewide office.

New York political consultant Dan Gerstein said the appointments were made for a variety of reasons, but political appeal "was not the central consideration with three of the four."

He said Gillibrand could be a strong candidate to retain the seat in 2010, but he was not sure if that was true of Burris or Bennet. Newly appointed Sen. Edward E. "Ted" Kaufman, named to fill Vice President Biden's Delaware seat, has said he will not run for the seat and is generally viewed as a placeholder until Biden's son Beau can run.

Although all four states went to Barack Obama in the presidential election, Brian Walsh, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, said "there is no question that these recent appointments have created unexpected opportunities in Illinois and New York, where Democratic chaos undoubtedly alienated independent voters."

The appointments followed the election of Obama and Biden and the departures of Clinton and Interior Secretary Ken Salazar in a series of decisions that drew various levels of criticism and prompted a backlash against laws giving governors sole power to fill Senate vacancies.

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., vowed to introduce a constitutional amendment this week requiring vacant Senate seats to be filled by special elections, as the House requires.

Feingold, who chairs the Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on the Constitution, said he will hold hearings on the issue.

"The vacancies in Illinois and New York have made for riveting political theater, but lost in the seemingly endless string of news conferences and surprise revelations is the basic fact that the citizens of these states have had no say in who should represent them in the Senate," Feingold wrote as he touted the proposal on the liberal blog Daily Kos. "The same is true of the recent selections in Delaware and Colorado."

Passage of a constitutional amendment requires the backing of two-thirds of the members of each house of Congress and three-fourths of the states, and it is unclear whether the measure would gain enough popular support. Only Massachusetts, Oregon and Wisconsin currently require elections after senators step down, according to Feingold's office.

Feingold wrote that his proposal "is not simply a response to these latest cases," but said they "have simply confirmed my longstanding view that Senate appointments by state governors are an unfortunate relic of the time when state legislatures elected U.S. senators."

Sen. Mark Begich, D-Alaska, joined Feingold's push for the bill, but a number of senators, including Burris and Bennet, said they were unsure if they would support it.

In making the appointments, the governors largely ignored the advice of Senate Democratic leaders, whose recommendations came with an eye toward who could win next year.

While Sen. Majority Leader Harry M. Reid, D-Nev., praised the selection of Gillibrand, he had previously raved about Caroline Kennedy, who withdrew her name from consideration for the post last week.

For Salazar's replacement, party leaders had floated the names of Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper and Rep. Ed Perlmutter, D-Colo., but Gov. Bill Ritter selected Denver schools chief Bennet. He was so unknown outside Denver that, immediately after his selection, he and Ritter began touring the state together so voters could become acquainted with him.

In Illinois, Burris has not yet said if he will stand for re-election in 2010. Party strategists think he could win the seat if he performs well in his first few months in office, but they note he has lost several statewide Democratic primaries for governor.

Many of New York's political figures, including Clinton, have expressed support for Gillibrand's selection. But the former congresswoman, with her roots in Upstate New York and opposition to some gun control measures, could face a serious primary challenge from New York City-based Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, a strong proponent of gun-control measures who has already said she is considering challenging Gillibrand in 2010.

Kaufman's seat is the safest for Democrats. When he steps down next year, it is widely expected that Beau Biden, who is currently Delaware's attorney general and is serving a National Guard tour, will run for the seat.

The governors have each defended their choices, saying they selected people they believed would be strong senators. Ritter described Bennett as a "next generation" thinker who would bring innovation to the office.

New York political observers noted that Gov. David A. Paterson made a wise political move for himself Gillibrand's Upstate appeal could help Paterson who was born in Brooklyn and represented Harlem in the state Senate – win re-election next year.

If Paterson "had done this before all of the drama, it would have been a very good choice," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic strategist.

Roland Burris is one of the appointed senators the GOP believes it can challenge strongly in the 2010 elections.

Lunar trip in question

By Robert Block
McClatchy Newspapers

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla — Kennedy Space Center on Monday unveiled a renovated building where the National Aeronautics and Space Administration hopes to assemble the space capsule that will return humans to the moon by 2020. There's just one catch: It isn't clear whether the Obama administration is going to continue the agency's moon program.

The uncertainty, however, did not stop dignitaries from Washington and Tallahassee from celebrating the opening of the new "operations and checkout facility," complete with a mock-up of the new Orion capsule.

"I am very thrilled to be here and honored to be part of this great celebration," said U.S. Rep. Suzanne Kosmas, D-New Smyrna Beach, who toured the facility along with fellow congresslonal freshman Bill Posey, R-Rockledge.

Both warned the crowd that extra money to accelerate NASA's moon program was not going to be easy to find. Kosmas also said she did not know what plans President Barack Obama has for the human spaceflight program.

The renovated building was built in 1964 to test and assemble the Apollo spacecraft and lunar modules.

After the Apollo program was canceled in the 1970s, the 70,000-square-foot building was used as a warehouse. Then, two years ago, the state put up $35 million to entice Lockheed Martin, the main contractor designing and building Orion, to agree to assemble the craft at KSC instead of at NASA facilities in Houston or Alabama.

Assembling Orion is expected to save as many as 400 jobs at KSC, which will lose at least 3,500 positions when the space shuttle is retired in 2010.

The building was gutted and rebuilt. The floors were designed so they can function as a giant air-hockey table; pallets carrying the capsule will be moved around effortlessly on a cushion of air.

The ribbon-cutting ceremony took place amid stepped-up efforts by NASA and its contractors to keep the moon program on track. The Constellation program, which includes both the Orion crew capsule and the Ares I rocket that will carry it into orbit, is supposed to return astronauts to the moon by 2020 and later go to Mars.

Concerns over budget, technical and schedule woes have prompted a review of the program, especially the Ares rocket, by the administration's transition team.

Faced with this uncertainty, NASA officials used Monday's event to stress that the Constellation program is not just an agency dream.

"This is a real program," KSC Director Bob Cabana said. "This isn't Power Points (computer models) we have real hardware here."

Cabana said the new building showed that "we are ready for Orion. We are ready to go back to the moon."

Agency officials also said some version of the Orion capsule would be needed even if NASA were ordered to use a different rocket, as some have urged.

Even in recession, fund the future

The United States economy is in the tank right now. There is no way around that fact. The financial situation is the worst it has been since the Great Depression and it doesn't look like it will greatly improve any time soon.

Every industry is hurting and jobs are being lost at alarming rates – on Jan. 26 alone, more than 71,400 jobs were cut from six companies in the manufacturing and service industries, according to CNN. In addition, the U.S. government says more than 1.9 million people were laid off in 2008.

This terrifying economic crisis is also affecting areas financed by public funding.

According to The Boston Globe, Gov. Deval Patrick announced Jan. 24 that he will cut local aid by $128 million, and propose increasing the cut to $375 million in the next fiscal year. Local officials have said the carving of the budget will obligate them to close public schools, reduce library hours and lay off teachers, police officers and firefighters.

We at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian fully understand the need for the tightening of purse strings in this sour economy, as we are suffering just like everybody else. We do have a problem, however, with the way the budget cuts are being implemented.

Taking away funding for all levels of public education is just a bad idea. Now more than ever, students and their families are finding it painstakingly difficult to finance a private education. As a result, more and more kids are attending public elementary, middle and high schools and colleges at the same time that these institutions' budgets are being slashed.

Voters decided on Election Day to not get rid of the state income tax, fearing a repeal would negatively affect public education. But now, despite the choice of Massachusetts residents to keep the tax, schools are still losing state funding. This seems hypocritical of the state government.

All their lives, kids are told to buckle down in school in order to have a better shot at higher education. Massachusetts students, many of whom are educated in the public school system, work hard to make the grade in order to reach the intersection of life – college. And now, when a whole generation of students is graduating from high school, the state cuts funding to public colleges.

The Collegian feels there is no point in investing so much time and money into public grade school education and telling children that getting into college is the most important thing they'll ever do if the state is going to reduce spending on public higher education when students reach that level.

Like all other public schools in the Commonwealth, the University of Massachusetts is expected to take a major hit.

In an exclusive interview with The Collegian's news editor, William McGuinness, Chancellor Robert C. Holub that this could result in larger class sizes and make it more difficult for students to get the specific classes they want or the specific times they want. He also said that some classes that are offered in both the fall and spring semesters may be held in just one or the other.

In an e-mail to all UMass students, Holub addressed the financial crisis, stating that the campus is projected to experience more than $45 million in budget cuts. And UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said the financial crisis has also resulted in a hiring freeze and a scaling back of travel.

But the tough economic times shouldn't mean that professors and other staff members can't be hired or that students can't take the classes they want or need. The state government has told students that a college education is crucial and, though hard times are definitely soon to come, it is the government's responsibility to ensure that public colleges and universities don't suffer in the future.

Because, whether you like it or not, the future is exactly what today's students are.

Belief doesn't make change

Matthew M. Robare

So It's been six days since Our Lord Jesus Christ the only begotten Son – excuse me – since president Barack Obama was inaugurated as the 44th president of the United States of America. Everybody knows that. I'm sure most of you reading this article voted for him last November.

Hell, I'm sure a majority could probably give a rather more in depth biography of Obama while failing to correctly name the current prime minister of the United Kingdom. Anyways, Bush is out and Obama is in; everybody loves America again; let a hundred flowers blossom and a hundred schools of thought contend, and so on.

Everyone knows that Obama was elected on a campaign of hope and change, but I'm here to tell you that he's not changing anything.

Now, I know you're all surely slamming down your coffee cups and saying "But, Matt, he's only been in office for six days – how can you possibly say that?!"

That, of course, is the entire point of this article. So keep on reading and enjoy.

According to my old friend Merriam-Webster, change can be defined as "to make different in some particular"; "to make radically different"; "to give a different position, course or direction," and so on and so forth.

You get the idea.

Now I suppose it could be said that just by putting the federal government back under the control of members of the Democratic Party, Obama has succeeded in change. But that leaves all of us unsatisfied. The breathless, messianic "change we can believe in" leads me to think that when he said change, Mr. Obama meant radical, sweeping change.

Accepting that definition, he has already failed utterly.

His cabinet appointments are proof enough for me: Hillary Clinton, the epitome of the Democratic establishment, is secretary of state Robert Gates – who was appointed to his post by ex-president George W. Bush for Obama's sake! – will remain secretary of defense. Eric H. Holder Jr., deputy attorney general for Bill Clinton, is now attorney general. Timothy Geithner, head of New York's Federal Reserve Bank and another member of Clinton's cabinet, is our new secretary of the Treasury. This is a cabinet of the establishment, by the establishment, and for the establishment.

If I didn't know better I'd have sworn Bush had won a third term by pulling a reverse Michael Jackson on us.

I don't know about you, but I don't see how keeping all the same people who have run the country before to run it now constitutes "change" of any sort. For Obama's sake, that's the essence of conservativism! Furthermore, his economic policies are exactly the same as Bush! We can expect more bailouts of failed businesses, more restrictions of our freedom to buy what we want, less jobs, higher gas prices. No change, just a continuation of the same failed policies. If I didn't know better I'd have sworn Bush had wnn a third term by pulling a reverse Michael Jackson on us.

But what does need to change in this country? I think everyone will agree that we do need a new direction. However, I know we will all disagree on what direction that should be. Personally, I think we need to start acting more like individual people and less like collective groups. While largely mythical, there was once a time when individual rights meant something to people. Today the respect for the individual has largely degenerated into pressure groups trying to obtain privledges for themselves from the government. The last thing this country needs are actual classes.

On a similar note, there could be a lot more space for natural law and natural rights in our way of thinking than there currently is. The modern idea seems to be that people derive their rights from the government, not from being human. Governments can only deny rights, they cannot create or destroy them. Sadly that fact is too often forgotten in today's world, with the upshot that spurious "rights" like the "right" to healthcare, or housing, or employment get floated around. Those are commodities, not rights. They can be bought and sold. Inalienable rights – natural rights – are not for sale and can't they ever be. It is only possible to deny them with force.

Regardless of who is president or which party controls Congress, it is important that as a nation we accept certain ideas as immutable and essential to a free society. The ideas, the American creed, if you will, should not be a mere party ideology. Red and blue states should not define America. To paraphrase G.K. Chesterton: let the New Yorker be ever more libertine and daring and the Texan more conservative and cautious. In short, let the absurdity called Texas cancel out the insanity called New York.

I sincerely hope I am wrong about the presidency of Mr. Obama. We are in desperate need of change. But I wouldn't bet on it.

Imagine: UMass without human life

With my third and final Dean's Book class approaching in the spring semester, I knew how I would spend my winter break: reading books that actually interested me. One of these books was "The World Without Us," by Alan Weisman, a speculative work that describes what would happen to Earth if humanity disappeared. Weisman's take on the decay of human-built structures piqued my interest because our way of life is dependent on the buildings in which we sleep, eat and work.

Chris Amorosi

I previously assumed I would enjoy our campus more if the rest of humanity disappeared, but Weisman inspired me to think out the practical details. I hope my readers will appreciate this thought experiment of mine.

The first locale drastically affected by the loss of humans would be the dining commons. Like four great Fort Knoxes – or is it Knoxen? – where the bullion is human foodstuffs, dining commons represent a veritable Xanadu for vermin and insects. If the buildings were to remain closed off, larger animals would not be invited to the feast unless doors and windows failed.

Birds would likely be the first gatecrashers due to their morbidly humorous inability to recognize solid glass. One of the campus hawks may attempt to dive at a mouse inside the dining commons, only to die so that others may enter through a now shattered window.

Birds would also accelerate the decay of the taller buildings on campus, like the Southwest towers, the Campus Center, the library and the Lederle tower. Decades after the DC's ran out of food, towers on campus would be missing several windows due to storms and bird impacts shattering or jarring windows loose. Trees would grow on the rooftops, their roots pushing into the roofs and punching more holes for water to pour through.

Decades after the DC's ran out of food, towers on campus would be missing several windows due to storms and bird impacts.

Water and plant life would be the two most destructive influences on campus buildings. Within twenty years, all the streets would resemble the roads torn up by construction equipment around work sites. Ice would crack the surface and roots would drag down the asphalt to pulverize it under a now grassy path. The so-called 'rape trail' would close forever with new growth, and the center of campus sexual indiscretions would be, once again, the ducks in heat.

The benign, smelly nature of the campus pond would hide its insidious part in the final destruction of campus. The pond's water level is maintained by a drain, but the drain would eventually be blocked by a dam created from plant debris, dead geese, and any garbage sucked along the pond floor to the portcullis-like gate at the northern end. With the drain blocked, the pond could only expand outwards. The soil and trees it eats from the shoreline would also contribute to clogging the pipes, accelerating the pond's growth.

The small green field between the pond and campus center is much lower than the pond. Apparently the bottom of the grass field is close to the water table, since heavy rains can result in water pooling at the bottom. Once the pond overflows its banks, water would rush into this depression and begin filling the Campus Center's basement.

The ebb and flow of water inside the basement would pull the building back and forth. The extra tons of weight in water resting on the foundations would pull the building down and weaken the structures supporting the hotel above. I am not certain how long the flooding and weakening process would take, but the inevitable result would be the collapse of the entire tower into its boggy basement.

Perhaps it might fall upon itself much like the result of a controlled demolition. I prefer to imagine it falling with its wider side down into the pond like a giant shoe smashing into a puddle. A similar fate awaits the other tall buildings. The towers in Southwest may tumble like Paul Bunyan's dominoes and the DuBois library might disintegrate like his Jenga tower.

I once took a long bicycle ride into the Pioneer Valley countryside. Partially out of interest and partially because I was very lost, I discovered many dilapidated farmhouses and barns on the cusp of utter ruin. Lacking only a few decades of attention, a time frame the Great Pyramids may shrug at, these buildings were almost gone forever. Human intervention in the environment is frequently destructive, but our neglect can be even worse. But it's not worth the disruption to drill and cut the Earth only to leave ruined heaps of brick and steel as our legacy.

Bay State higher ed: the prices we pay

Many people turn to the University of Massachusetts for their four years of undergraduate studies because it is the more affordable option. Though the school may cost less compared to many private schools in the state, UMass and the rest of Massachusetts' public institutions of higher learning do not measure up on a national or international level. Massachusetts residents are barred from the institutions created for them, graduates are faced with enormous amounts of debt and economic decline is sustained by the dismal state of funding for public higher education.

The UMass website lists the total cost for a full-time student in the 2008-2009 academic year in tuition and fees as $10,232. In addition, housing and meals come to about $8, 114, amounting to a grand total of $18,346. This number is prohibitively large for some low and middle-income students. With rising costs each year, more and more students are forced to either withdraw from school or accumulate thousands of dollars worth of debt in loans.

Education is a right that should be granted to all people. By setting the cost prohibitively high, institutions of higher learning prevent residents of this nation and of this state from obtaining an education. Thus they also prevent residents from obtaining a decent job with decent wages. An education is the single most important thing that can help people toward the path of success and financial stability.

Massachusetts...some of the best universities in the country, and yet these institutions are nowhere near affordable.

Massachusetts is seen as a great beacon of knowledge with some of the best universities in the country, yet these institutions are nowhere near affordable. The amount of state funding for public higher education is pitifully low, as is financial aid. According to College Board, UMass gives about 40 percent of aid in scholarships and grants, while the other 60 percent is comprised of loans and jobs. Being forced to leave college with $21, 090 worth of debt, the Massachusetts average in 2007 according to The Project on Student Debt, should not be tolerated. How can we foster a good economy without educating our people?

Though we face hard times, affordable education is within reach. A number of countries around the globe including Brazil and Cuba provide free higher education for all of their citizens. We could do this as well, but instead the state spent $1.14 billion on correction facilities in 2007, and $500,000 on new signs for the campus.

Meanwhile, for every dollar the state spends on education, eight dollars are generated in the economy. Also, the majority of Massachusetts graduates remain in Massachusetts. With these facts in mind, it is irresponsible for the Commonwealth to underfund and neglect higher education the way it has been. Not only is education a right that our low-income residents are denied, it is also a smart investment that will both enable the people of Massachusetts to earn a living wage and produce eight times the amount of economic stimulus.

We can provide high-quality, affordable education. This is one problem that has a solution. It is simply a matter of making education a priority. The United Nations' International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights states that education is a right and, in order to ensure this right, higher education should be made accessible to all, specifically by the progressive introduction of free higher education.

Therefore, it is the state's duty to provide affordable, if not free, education for all. But thus far, we have fallen exceedingly behind. By providing more state funding and more grants and scholarships as opposed to loans, the school system in Massachusetts could improve immensely. Doing this would be advantageous to all. However, if Massachusetts doesn't support education, the economy of the Commonwealth will continue to suffer.

Is Chancellor Holub on the right track?

Holub's the man for the job

Nicholas O'Malley

What more do you people want Former Chancellor John Lombardi and Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano are gone, there's no need to march around in a circle and bang on an empty water jug outside of Whitmore.

But already there are grumblings over the early actions taken by Chancellor Robert C. Holub since he's started his tenure here at the University of Massachusetts.

Even though it's preposterous to assume that the administration could hire someone that is universally liked (although Chancellor Obama would go over pretty well), Chancellor Holub has so far seemed to be, at the very least, a positive choice.

However, with the chancellor's heralding of the impending fee increases and budget cuts, some seets of the student body have already started to turn on the rookie.

It's probably out of the question to assume that Holub ever had any type of grace period. The seat he stepped into was one that was under harsh scrutiny from the student body for years and came with the expectation of dramatic changes were going to be made yesterday.

Even if there hasn't been an overhaul of an administration that provoked students to produce burning effigies the former vice chancellor, there have been a number of tweaks in the system. Unfortunately for current UMass students, those changes have been of little help of them.

This should not be a surprise.

Holub was introduced as a candidate for chancellor on the platform of improving the University's status on a national level. This meant that if any changes were going to be made, they were going to be for the benefit of the university, not the students.

Obviously, this isn't a popular course of action for a lot of students, especially those that have trouble affording to go to school here.

Unfortunately for them, they never mentioned that to the administration when they had the chance. And that chance was there like no other time in recent memory.

During the prior administration, there was a general consensus that the administration never took the student perspective into consideration. And with the arrival of the chancellor search, there was hope that there would be a greater opportunity for the input of the students to be heard.

Fortunately, the forum for students to add that input was opened during the chancellor search. Unfortunately, no one showed up.

It's strange to see that students clamored for their voice to be heard, organizing a strike and forming rallies only to fail to show up when the time came for them to do so. Maybe it's the fact that it's far simpler to complain about the issues than to provide a sound solution. That and it's more fun to make large crowds and yell things.

After the selection of Holub of the new chancellor, the window for students to add their input to what the administration was trying to accomplish did not shut.

When it became apparent that there would be a budget crisis, Holub and the rest of the administration did not lock the doors to Whitmore and scheme of how they were going to increase student fees. Rather, there were e-mails coming straight from the chancellor's office that updated the student body of every decision that was being made and a website that chronicled the same.

After the selection of Holub ... the window for students to add their input to what the administration was trying to accomplish did not shut.

Once again, the student body did nothing.

It is a bit much to assume that students would be able to come up with viable solutions to the school's economic woes, but they should have at least seen this coming. The administration has been drifting in this direction for some time.

Holub recently said that, if given the choice between getting a group of faculty or a million dollars in budget, he would take the faculty.

This is great news for the university, which, with a larger faculty and staff, can improve itself. However, this is bad news for students who are struggling to foot the $18,000 bill to go to UMass.

This isn't an issue of whether or not the administration is taking the school in the right direction – the path has already been chosen. It is, however, an issue of why the students didn't formally resist this sooner.

Why wasn't there a mob of students at the introduction of candidates for chancellor to show that they would rather pay less for school than add faculty?

Even if it is a good choice for the school to retain faculty, there are still students who would prefer the latter. They simply have a tendency to avoid the formal occasions where their opinions can be expressed.

The doors of Whitmore aren't locked, just as long as you're not trying to bring in pitchforks and torches.

Earn our trust, then inspire

James Mathews

In an inaugural year, New Year's Day rolls around. Americans make resolutions. Only a few weeks later, the new president stands up in front of the country and makes his own resolutions. They go along the lines of "I will stay true to that document there in the National Archives," "I have a basic facility with the English language," and "I will try to make this place a little better."

This January is a good time for comparisons. In some sense, it might be our duty as Americans to change our own lives in ways we 'can believe in,' whether or not we support the president's particular geopolitical and economic decisions.

It's also a good time for UMass students to give our still-'new' chancellor a thorough grilling by holding him to the president's standard, both as an administrator and as a leader occupying an inevitably public position.

I'm worried about the latter. I'm afraid that Chancellor Robert C. Holub will, like almost all chancellors in memory, hide away in Whitmore under the delusion that he is a mere administrator.

I don't remember voting for a candidate supported by my tax dollars, and I am fairly sure that no one else in the state has

As I see it, there is no such thing. Any position of administrative leadership – from the chancellor's office at UMass to the principal's desk at your high school to the whitest house in Washington – comes with both the stain and the responsibilities of humankind's first institution of leadership: monarchy.

I kid you not.

The responsibilities of a public leader go beyond the mere tasks on the proverbial desk, and extend into the realm of the weird and unknown. In college campuses and nation-states alike, leadership is – in one important sense – a great big game of 'Simon Says.'

The citizens or students or faculty members can't be any more hopeful or resourceful or articulate in their public speech than the person in the leader's chair. The executive, from where I see it, sets the upper limits.

Here's where I worry about Robert Holub.

Articulate, insightful and bent on unity as his frequent emails may be, the chancellor works in Whitmore. That particular piece of architecture built with the same sense of welcome as a high-security prison, and it's not a meaningless observation to say so.

If Holub is out to unify the university, he needs to have a sense of the raw material he's working with. If he's out to inspire students and faculty to play along in our collective game of 'Simon Says,' willfully jumping onto the H.M.S. 'A Better UMass,' he needs to – first and foremost – earn our trust by showing that he understands us.

This, of course, is a tall order. Hardly any university is as demographically, socio-economically, politically and intellectually various as ours. UMass is a school with a sense of self-definition that is nebulous at best, and some of us pride ourselves on this fact.

We earn our educations by dragging ourselves around by our own bootstraps, cutting through red tape with scissors that we made by our own design on our time, and we come through the process knowing that it was all for the better.

For all of its ivory-tower shortcomings, UMass Amherst is – in the end – much less distant from the world outside than most universities. It reeks of the bureaucratic climate of the state of Massachusetts, it's constantly under construction, the humanities are banished to rooms with broken windows while the business school flourishes, and none of the buildings look good by themselves, yet alone together.

It's not at all your run-of-the-mill, well-kempt, fairytale campus. As the legend goes, it's Scooby-Doo. It's a Zoo. It's a wasteland of rules and regulations.

For those of us who learn this early, and teach ourselves to deal directly with the realities of UMass, there's a benefit to this kind of education. You learn to keep your feet on the ground.

There's also an apprehension that a leader like Holub, no matter how good his intentions, will carry out his work of positive change, completely unaware of all that will be lost in the process.

Of course, I don't mean to say that a much-improved UMass would not be an asset to the state, the faculty, the future students, and the town of Amherst. I'm simply presenting the argument that, as it stands, what UMass does best is allow its students the opportunity to pursue a completely self-directed education.

It's something you can't institutionalize. There's no guidebook to the kind of education that many UMass students get. Call it the "guerilla Bachelor's."

If Holub can't understand this experience, he won't be able to earn the trust of those who have earned their educations the hard way. At UMass, there's quite a few of us.

When you're playing 'Simon Says,' the leader doesn't just shout out commands. As I recall, Simon always waved his arms up and down if that's what he wanted the rest of us to do.

So, if the chancellor wants his student body to play along, he'd better step outside of Whitmore – literally and figuratively – and wave his ridiculous arms up and down where all of us can see them.

Then we'll follow the leader.

Forming a Palestinian Haaretz

Greg Collins

Yes, Israel has done wrong. And no, is not anti-Semitic to say so.

It has not disciplined violent Jewish settlers in the West Bank to the extent that it should have in the past.

Its targeting and bombing of the American International School in Gaza during the most recent war destroyed one of the few positive glimmers of Western influence in the area. And it continues to provide material incentives to Jews living abroad to settle in Israel and the surrounding territories without giving equal assistance to Palestinians.

The list goes on and on. These criticisms are generated not just from anti-Israel groups in the Palestinian territories, surrounding Arab countries, and the United Nations, but are frequently expressed within Israel itself.

I remember visiting Jerusalem and reading the Haaretz, a leftist Israeli newspaper very critical of the government's policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and an ardent opponent of settlement expansion in the West Bank. Various human rights groups in Israel regularly condemn the country for its treatment of Palestinian citizens.

Put simply, there is vigorous debate within Israeli society about how to treat Palestinians, whether to expand settlements and where to draw the line between negotiating with Hamas or Fatah.

The question, then, is where is the Haaretz of the West Bank and Gaza Strip? Where is the vigorous debate within Palestinian society about these issues?

While living in Egypt and traveling throughout the West Bank and Jordan during my study abroad experience last spring, the biggest problem I observed was the lack of a diversity of viewpoints, particularly about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. When I would ask Arabs to list three criticisms of Israel, they would be quick to respond, but would struggle to utter one or two criticisms about Palestinian leadership when asked.

This failure of a free, vibrant flow of information stifles critical thinking and inhibits any progress toward exploring different ways to solve political issues.

The stereotype in the West is that all Arabs and Palestinians think alike: anti-American government and anti-Israel. At the surface, this is undoubtedly true. If you look deeper, however, Egyptians and Palestinians do voice deep, if not popularly accepted, concerns about the conflict.

Many Egyptians are very skeptical of Hamas. They feel that the terrorist group is at least partly to blame for the escalation in violence during the past couple of years. A couple of Palestinians I have talked to have expressed deep reservations about Hamas's commitment to peace. Go on BBC.com and you will easily find articles about Palestinians in Gaza, explaining that he or she feels Hamas is at least partly at fault for the bloodshed, but are unafraid to speak up because of the large influence Hamas wields over the area.

This failure of a free, vibrant flow of information stifles critical thinking and inhibits any progress toward exploring different ways to solve political issues. Just like the free marketplace of goods and services in which those with the best utility for the people are used most effectively, the free marketplace of ideas allow the most substantive and effective thinking to be explored and seriously considered.

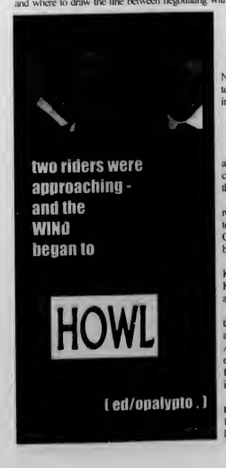
And what happens when these ideas are stifled? What happens when people either don't have the courage to confront alternative viewpoints or when they are intimidated from doing so?

Political violence surpasses critical thinking as the most effective way to get your message across. In this case, innocent Palestinians get hurt by extremist Palestinians.

Take the words of Palestinian journalist Ashraf Ajrami, who analyzed an attack on the American International School in Gaza:

"The fight that used to be directed against the occupation has instead turned into destructive fighting that ended the relative peace and quiet," he wrote. "Internal violence has increased, including killings, theft, attacks on property, terrorizing people for political and ideological reasons and violent confrontations between Hamas and Fatah."

Ajrami himself was injured by Hamas members in a violent dispute with his family.



But it goes beyond Hamas. Other Muslim extremist groups strike fear into the hearts of innocent Palestinians and further undermine the free flow of information, as well as tarnish their own religion. For instance, the Swords of Islamic Righteousness, an al-Qaeda-sponsored group, has targeted and carried out attacks on Internet cafes, movie theaters and music stores in Gaza.

A Palestinian Authority member described the network as "a dangerous group of thugs who are using Islam as a pretext to carry out their crimes. These people are distorting the image of Islam."

Such sentiments bubble below the surface of Palestinian society. I have witnessed firsthand the incredible commitment and passion innocent Palestinians have for their people and their cause.

Now it's time to use that passion publicly to form the Palestinian Haaretz.

A deadly conflict, fueled by American funds

Jan. 7, an American-made jet bombs a United Nations school while hundreds are seeking shelter inside from an unbearable war. Some 50 innocent civilians are killed; their limbs splattering across the streets of Palestine.

Zamil Akhtar

Jan. 4, an American-made bomb falls on a mosque while 200 worshippers pray inside, causing 16 deaths and wounding 60, many of them children.

Jan. 16, American-purchased white phosphorous shells, a banned chemical weapon according to the Geneva Conventions, incinerate part of Al Quds Hospital, where hundreds of injured are being treated.

This is Israel's war on Gaza, which United Kingdom parliament member Sir Gerald Kaufman described as akin to the Nazi atrocity against the Jews of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Israel's wars are America's wars because they're armed with $5 billion worth of annual aid from the pockets of American taxpayers. The Arms Export Control Act, which regulates the export of US weapons, permits them to be used for "legitimate self-defense" but forbids their use in an "escalation of conflict."

But who escalated the conflict in Gaza, which turned into a three-week massacre by Israeli forces, whose bombs claimed 1,300 Palestinian lives and injured over 5,000?

CNN anchor Rick Sanchez investigated the matter, and in a Jan. 5 report confirmed that it was Israel who broke the Gaza ceasefire by killing six members of Hamas in a raid on Nov. 4, 2008. Hamas responded by launching rockets at Israeli towns. No lives were claimed until Dec. 27, when Israel, having broken the ceasefire initially, escalated the war further by launching a full-scale invasion of Gaza, claiming it "self-defense" against the rocket attacks.

But a look at the roots of this conflict flips this claim on its head. After the creation of Israel in 1948, Zionist settlers ethnically cleansed south

Israel calls itself a democracy ... [this] is not democracy, it is apartheid.

Israel of Palestinians, expelling or killing them, turning those who survived into refugees. Where did these refugees go? Most escaped to the Gaza Strip.

Suffocated from all sides, Gaza is one of the most densely populated places in the world, a ghetto where 1.5 million people are barely surviving under a cruel embargo. How ironic that when Gazans fire rockets at south Israel, they are targeting the very land that was stolen from them. If Israel is "defending itself," they are doing so against people they have unjustly expelled from their homes, herded into an "open air prison" and blockaded from all sides.

"Apartheid" is what former President Jimmy Carter called it. Israel has denied Palestinian refugees their right to return home, which is guaranteed by UN General Assembly Resolutions 194 and 3236, because of their race. Israel calls itself a democracy – but when you deny justice to a people based on race, and that race happens to be the majority, that is not democracy. It is apartheid.

There are 10 million Palestinians, 4.25 million of which are refugees, most of whom live in destitute refugee camps. Compared to 5.5 million Jews in Israel, Palestinians constitute the clear majority, yet they are treated worse than black Africans were in apartheid South Africa. The apartheid government of South Africa never bombed their African population with F-16s.

"Gaza is ablaze. It has been turned into a burning hell," said Miguel Brockmann, president of the UN General Assembly. "[This is] a war against a helpless, defenseless and imprisoned people...the violations of international law inherent in the Gaza assault have been well documented: collective punishment, disproportionate military force, attacks on civilian targets, including homes, mosques, universities, schools," Brockmann continued.

Amnesty International has charged Israel with war crimes over its use of white phosphorous, a chemical weapon that sticks to the skin and burns flesh to the bone. Donatella Rovera, a researcher with Amnesty, stated, "Such extensive use of this weapon in Gaza's densely populated residential neighborhoods is inherently indiscriminate."

They are joined by Human Rights Watch, the International Red Cross and the UN, organizations that have accused Israel of various war crimes, from blocking access to injured people to unprompted attacks on civilian infrastructure. Mission accomplished Israel? Yes, if your mission was to heap suffering upon innocent civilians.

What do we Americans have to gain by supporting this atrocity? While you are losing your job, while your house is being foreclosed, billions of your dollars are going to Israel's war machine, which has satisfied itself in the killing of 400 children in 22 days of bombing. This was not America's war, yet we paid for it.

The US Congress confirmed that we are a partner in this crime by producing a resolution, 390-5, in favor of what Israel has done in Gaza. If you don't want to be part of the weapon in Gaza's densely populated residential neighborhoods, then be part of the cure. Refuse to be liable for this oppression by standing up against it. We the American people, who respect human rights, democracy and equality in our homeland, must advance these causes for all humanity instead of hypocritically supporting the opposite of these virtues in the Middle East.

Golden Globes revived

Kevin Koczwara

Unlike last year, the 2009 Golden Globes were a spectacle. Last year, the celebration was a non-celebration, a reading of the list of winners, all due to the fact that the writers were on strike (with good reason).

This year, with an actors' strike looming in the clouds, the Globes had its red-carpet parade, flashy dresses, not so-flashy dresses, and grateful millionaires. Moreover, it redeemed and restored careers. Plenty of tears were shed and more than a few awkward moments occurred.

What makes the Golden Globes more than just another award ceremony is that it brings television and Hollywood together to celebrate their accomplishments. The foreign press gets to tell the entertainment business what they have done right all year, and what far-away people have enjoyed.

The highlights of the night were not the surprise winners – the exception being "Slumdog Millionaire" – but were the speeches.

Everyone predicted Mickey Rourke to win best actor for "The Wrestler," but no one anticipated that he would look as disheveled as he did. He was expected to look somewhat rumpled, but when he put his hand in his pants while receiving the award he went even beyond presumptions. I am pretty sure he was drunk by the time he was awarded his little statue.

He tripped on his way up the stairs because he was wearing sunglasses indoors and the stairs probably looked like they were moving. Rourke continued on his drunken way with his speech. He thanked his dogs, those here and those who have passed, Axl Rose, Bruce Springsteen and his agents, who took him when he was losing all those boxing matches.

What may not be realized by many is that at one point in his career, Rourke had alienated himself so much from his friends and the business that the only friends he had were his dogs. They didn't know they were hanging out with a star.

Then he thanked Darren Aronofsky for carrying him along on the project and giving him a chance. In turn, Aronofsky gave Rourke the old bird on live television. This is what makes live television so great: the little glitches that occur that no one can stop.

Colin Farrell sounded a little nervous up on stage when it was his turn. He stuttered and stumbled through his not-so-prepared speech. Farrell apparently loves everyone he has ever met. Apparently he shows great affection for everyone and I feel bad for his future wife, for she will be on the same playing field as someone he's met just once.

He won best actor in a comedy or musical for his turn in "In Bruges" as a hit man who cannot stand having to spend time in Bruges. His comedic portrayal is one of his best performances and his Irish accent is something that studios should use more often. His native tongue suits him well, while the American accent he tries to sport usually takes all focus out of his role.

Then there was Kate Winslet, winner of not only one award for her acting but two. She took home best supporting actress for "The Reader" and best actress in a drama for "Revolutionary Road." Her second speech felt forced at the start. Maybe she just didn't have any tears left after making "Revolutionary Road." She should be fresh out of emotion for years to come after her stunning performance, but she got rolling and really gave a pretty perfect speech.

Mickey Rourke continues his comeback as a washed-up muscle man in Darren Aronofsky's "The Wrestler." Rourke stars as the wrestler Randy "The Ram" Robinson, a fitting role after his own stint as a professional boxer.

Rourke wows in 'Wrestler'

Aronofsky's latest scores with down-and-out character study

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

With his latest film, "The Wrestler," director Darren Aronofsky takes us to an unseen corner of the wrestling world, to a place where few filmmakers have ventured before.

Here, in high school gyms and rundown V.F.W. halls, another form of wrestling exists, this one grittier and more brutal than the one seen weekly on World Wrestling Entertainment (WWE) programming. Here is a place where former wrestling stars go to fade away, and it is here where Randy "The Ram" Robinson dwells.

Two decades ago, "The Ram" (expertly played by Mickey Rourke) was a big deal – a bronze-skinned Hercules with flowing, golden locks and an ample fan base. Two decades ago, he was headlining the main event at Madison Square Garden. His fame was so great they even made a video game about him.

Nowadays, life treats Randy a little differently. Living in a trailer he can barely afford the rent on, he spends his weekdays unloading boxes at a local supermarket and his weekends tossing guys half his age into turnbuckles.

What the hell happened? The script, written by Robert D. Siegel, never quite tells.

At first glance, "The Wrestler" seems to have simple intentions. The film is more straightforward than Darren Aronofsky's previous films, "Pi" (1998) and "Requiem for a Dream" (2000). Although it works best as a character study, those familiar with the world of pro-wrestling will recognize that "The Wrestler" has strengths elsewhere.

With great attention to detail, the film explores the battered side of a sport long-labeled fake by the masses. Relying occasionally on a hand-held camera, Aronofsky brings the film's New Jersey setting to screen in a grainy, realistic style.

Better than the 1999 documentary "Beyond the Mat," the film exposes the secrets that help hold the illusion of wrestling together.

Backstage, the men are seen joking and mapping out their matches. Once inside the ring, it's anything goes – barbed wire, window panes and even staples are all familiar props to the trade. Friendships between the men stay strong despite all the gruesome damage they inflict within the ring.

While the matches may be phony, that doesn't make the wounds any less genuine. Randy's bronze skin covers over many battle scars, the most vulnerable one concealed by a Ram-shaped medallion as the film reaches its climax. His wounded relationship with his daughter (Evan Rachel Wood) is another scar to bear.

As the anniversary of his legendary Madison Square Garden match approaches, Randy finds himself at a crossroads. On one path, an offer to recreate the match and potentially launch himself again onto a national stage is mentioned, but hardly explored. His second chance comes at a steep cost.

Speaking of comebacks, "The Wrestler" gives its leading man the chance to make one of his own. After striking it big in such films as "Diner" (1982) and "9 ½ Weeks" (1986), Rourke saw his career go belly-up in the 1990's as a result of a few bad career moves, including a stint as a professional boxer.

In the ring is where Rourke acquired the cuts and scrapes which would ultimately be his undoing: to a series of facial surgeries meant to correct the damage his hard-hitting life had wrought.

By the time 2005's "Sin City" hit theaters, Rourke's once-chiseled face had become barely recognizable – the stuff of plastic surgery cautionary tales. Yet somehow, his mangled visage seems perfectly suited for "The Wrestler." Rourke, who recently won a Golden Globe for his role here, is nothing short of sensational.

Of equal note in the film is Marisa Tomei ("My Cousin Vinny"). Tomei co-stars as Cassidy, a stripper who provides Randy with one of his few emotional connections in the outside world.

Many actresses have played strippers in the past, with varying success. Some go too far, as Elizabeth Berkley did in "Showgirls" (1995). Others prefer the Lindsay Lohan approach, which is to work the pole while remaining fully clothed.

Tomei's approach is of a gutsier variety. She bares her body, and a bit of her soul along the way. Like Randy, her character deals in the illusion business. Both have used their bodies for gain, but unlike Randy, she knows where the performance ends and the real world begins.

UPC takes over the Union

"Junk rockers" Recycled Percussion get extreme at the Fine Arts Center Thursday.

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

The University Programming Council (UPC) will present its first events of the spring semester tonight with "Can't Stop the Beat" and Friday with its "Student Union Shutdown."

"Can't Stop the Beat," which will run from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center, is billed as a free evening of live rock music featuring headlining musical act Recycled Percussion.

The New Hampshire based "junk-rock" band consists of two drummers, an electric guitarist and one DJ. The group gets its name and unusual genre title by implementing a variety of buckets, barrels and even sheet metal during their aggressively acrobatic stage performance. The band routinely accents their music with pyrotechnics and eccentric stage movements.

Originally conceived as a concept for a talent show, the band has quickly transformed into a touring force with a sizeable national fan base. The band has particularly developed a strong following amongst college-aged listeners and has performed at numerous campuses across the country. Their 2006 DVD release, "Live at Allegheny," is a testament to this collegiate following, documenting one of the band's packed live performances at Allegheny College in Meadville, Penn.

The band has also toured with established rock artists such as Godsmack and performed a variety of professional sporting events half time shows.

Performances by UMass' student-based Hip Hop Dance Team and the UMass Step Team will also be featured during the two hour event.

UPC will host its third semi-annual "Student Union Shutdown" at 8 p.m. on Friday, Jan. 30. In contrast to the junk-rock and percussion heavy "Can't Stop the Beat" the shutdown will offer students a chance to relieve their youth with a variety of '90s themed activities.

Planned activities include a double feature airing of "Billy Madison" and "Clueless," trivia, karaoke and a selection of video games. Union Billiards will be open for free games of pool while the craft center will also be hosting activities. Free food and refreshments will be available for all in attendance.

UPC's "Can't Stop the Beat" will run from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. tonight in the Fine Arts Center. Admission for the event is free. The "Student Union Shutdown" will run from 8 p.m. to 12 a.m. Friday, Jan. 30 in the Student Union Center. Admission is also free.

'Paul Blart: Mall Cop' baffles the box office

By John Horn
Los Angeles Times

Audience tracking surveys are hardly perfect, but rarely are they as far off the mark as when "Paul Blart: Mall Cop" arrived in theaters three weeks ago. Having studied the various appraisals of moviegoer interest, executives at Sony Pictures concluded that at worst "Mall Cop" would gross $20 million in its first four days, with a high end of perhaps $25 million in domestic theaters.

The actual Martin Luther King Day weekend returns: $39.2 million.

Since its Jan. 16 release, "Mall Cop" has been a box-office sensation, winning not only that opening weekend by a wide margin but also remaining the nation's No. 1 film last weekend, when it slipped just 32 percent (most movies fall about 50 percent in their second week of release) to gross $21.6 million, sneaking past Sony's new Screen Gems genre film, "Underworld 3: Rise of the Lycans."

With more than $67 million in ticket sales so far, "Mall Cop" is well-poised to go beyond $100 million in domestic theaters. It's a highly unexpected outcome for what was once a lowly regarded comedy with an untested lead actor ("King of Queens" TV star Kevin James) in the titular role.

The film's success says less about the fallibility of tracking surveys than it does about audience demand for feel-good stories and Hollywood's growing appetite for low-budget comedies with obvious marketing hooks. Whereas 2008 movie admissions were off about 5 percent from the previous year, this year's box-office sales figures – thanks largely to "Mall Cop," "Slumdog Millionaire" and "Gran Torino" – are running almost 15 percent ahead of last year's pace.

"You've got a country that is willing to put their economic worries behind them and go to the movies," says Doug Belgrad, the Sony production executive who developed the movie with James based on the actor's own idea.

"And people see themselves in this guy," Belgrad says of James' ne'er-do-well shopping-mall security guard, who foils a band of thieves who invade the mall he patrols on his Segway. "They love it when a guy who isn't given credit for being good at anything succeeds."

James pitched actor-producer Adam Sandler, his co-star in "I Now Pronounce You Chuck and Larry," and Sony his idea for the movie in Between her and Sally Hawkins, winner of best actress in a musical or comedy for "Happy-Go-Lucky," the crying thing was a little old. Neither of them could hold it together.

How skinny is Sally Hawkins? She looked as though she hadn't eaten anything in a decade. And she really is as happy as her character is in the movie, which is weird and a little unsettling.

The big winner of the night was "Slumdog Millionaire," outside of Winslet, the one-woman award machine. "Slumdog" looks like the little picture that could. Hopefully it can get a few Oscars, including best picture and best director for Danny Boyle, after the two Globes it won. It also won best screenplay, which came out of left field. Eric Roth was looking like the favorite for "Benjamin Button," but Simon Beaufoy of "Slumdog" somehow showed up one of Hollywood's most respected and hyped screenwriters.

The film also beat out the likes of Hans Zimmer and Clint Eastwood for best score. Eastwood lost both musical categories, the other to Springsteen's "The Wrestler," which won Best Song. Not too bad for a film that looked as if it was going to go straight to DVD.

The big winner for television was the almighty "30 Rock," which took home awards for Tina Fey and Alec Baldwin, as well as best television series in a comedy or musical.

Tina Fey had a remarkable idea for a speech: taking on all of her online naysayers and speaking about how wrong they were, shoving their remarks back in their faces. If only more people had speeches like this prepared.

Tracy Morgan didn't have a speech prepared but he delivered on behalf of "30 Rock." His speech was a slurred mess that consisted of his personal ramblings and feelings. He should be hired to give all award speeches because he speaks his mind, most of it being nonsense. If only he had said something about Maggie Gyllenhaal's dress, then it would have been perfect.

Ricky Gervais was another highlight of the show with his short monologue. His dry-humor was something needed in the middle of the epic three-plus hour award show. He put a little wit back into something that gets very dry and monotonous. He also broke the string of young up-and-coming actors giving out awards (The Jonas Brothers gave out an award, what is that?). Everyone that watched the Globes should thank Gervais with a letter for breaking up the monotony.

Then, of course there was the somber best supporting actor award that went to the late Heath Ledger. The montage for his performance was short and Christian Bale accepted the award on his behalf. Everyone knew it was a lock for Ledger after all of the press and such a marvelous performance, if only the ceremony gave some more time to his performance with a longer montage.

With Ledger's and Rourke's wins it was a year of one star flaming out and another rekindling.

'Mall Cop' no flop

summer 2007. The idea wasn't fully formed, but the movie could easily be parsed into comprehensible Hollywood shorthand: "Die Hard" meets "Home Alone" with an overweight security guard.

Sony and Sandler's Happy Madison Productions – which has made six movies for the studio that have grossed more than $100 million – loved the idea, but they had several concerns. First, a looming strike from the Writers Guild of America meant that James and screenwriter Nick Bakay had little time to work up a screenplay (they finished a draft in about a month), and second, Sony had to beat another mall-cop comedy – Warner Bros.' much less family-friendly "Observe and Report," from writer-director Jody Hill, due April 10 into theaters.

Equally important, "Mall Cop" couldn't be expensive.

Once the industry's low-budget alternative to expensive action films, comedies have grown progressively more pricey. Paramount and DreamWorks spent so much production money ($100 million) and gave away so much gross profit (about 25 percent) on "Tropic Thunder" that last year's Ben Stiller comedy, with a domestic gross in excess of $110 million, will barely make a profit. But the potential rewards for low-budget comedies – including Universal's $30 million "Role Models" and Sony's $28 million "Pineapple Express" – are far more attractive.

So Sony budgeted "Mall Cop" at $26 million, deciding that in place of expensive action scenes it would focus on family-friendly gags. "The studio, and specifically Adam, felt that the movie would have its greatest potential as a PG movie," Belgrad says.

In addition to placing a "Mall Cop" trailer on almost every print of Sandler's Christmas comedy "Bedtime Stories," Sony also bought television spots that reached adults, especially sports broadcasts such as NBA games and the NFL playoffs. Sony's promotions team flooded shopping malls across the country the day after Thanksgiving, dressing up as mall cops and helping shoppers carry bags to their cars.

The result was not only that a large number of parents bought "Mall Cop" tickets with their kids (rather than simply dropping off), but also that the film played surprisingly well outside major cities. "The other secret weapon was that it did proportionally even better in the middle of America than it did in Los Angeles and New York," Blake says. "There's an audience that maybe isn't all involved in the Oscar movies."

Belgrad and his Sony production chief partner, Matt Tolmach, have a number of modestly budgeted comedies in the works, including Katherine Heigl and Gerard Butler in "The Ugly Truth;" "Bad Teacher," from two top writers from "The Office"; the demolition-derby story "The Precious View," and "Winter's Discontent," touted as "Superbad" in a retirement home.

What's less clear is when Paul Blart might save the day again. James has been developing the comedy "Zookeeper" at MGM and might soon co-star in a new Sandler comedy for Sony.

"Happy Madison historically has been very reluctant to do sequels," says Belgrad. "But we believe there is an opportunity to make another Paul Blart movie."

Paul Blart, played by Kevin James, helped to claim the top spot at national theaters the past two weeks, earning nearly $40 million in its Martin Luther King Day weekend debut.

Marcou, Kublin and Irwin fly under the radar for UMass

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Everyone knows the names Martin Nolet and Justin Braun, but the strength of the lesser known defenders that make up the third line of the Massachusetts hockey team are equally important to the success of the team.

The third defensive pairing is typically shared between Mike Marcou, Doug Kublin and Matt Irwin.

The strength of UMass' defense from the top line in Nolet and Braun to the third-line trio will continue to benefit the Minutemen as they enter these crucial moments of the season.

UMass Hockey

Kublin has an advantage over Marcou and Irwin, who are half way through their freshman campaign, because of the experience he gained in the 20 games he played last season (one assist, even in plus/minus).

He is getting more ice time compared to his counterparts because he is prepared for this part of the season, or the "men's league," as UMass coach Don Cahoon calls it. Kublin has played in 17 games this season tallying a goal and an assist.

"Mike [Marcou] has had a great freshman year and has done everything we could have asked him to do considering the fact that he wasn't going to come here until next year," Cahoon said.

Marcou was going to use this season as his development year before joining the Minutemen for the 2009-10 season. This season Marcou has played in 16 games tallying one assist.

"[Marcou] will continue to be a piece of the puzzle," Cahoon said.

Irwin (16 games played, two goals and five assists) is an offensive defenseman that Cahoon thought would be part of the power play mix. He had an injury at the beginning of the season and wasn't completely healed until the end of December.

Once he was capable and confident he earned more playing time.

"He's put himself in a very solid position as a game in game out player for us," Cahoon said. "He's going to be a real central player over the next few years."

Moving on up

UMass (10-11-3, 5-7-3 Hockey East) has the chance to take four points this weekend with two wins (No. 3 Northeastern on Friday at home and at Maine on Sunday).

Earning four points could make UMass move up drastically in Hockey East standings.

Currently the Minutemen sit at seventh place (13 points) in the Hockey East standings, just one point above Maine (eighth place).

Currently there are only five points separating the fourth (New Hampshire) and eighth place teams.

In the crease

Paul Dainton and Dan Meyers have been splitting time in goal and the way they play determines the outcome of the game, most of the time.

"They have been pretty solid and given us some good games," Cahoon said. "When they give us a real good outing we're definitely in the hunt to win any game anywhere."

Both goaltenders know that if they give a good performance by battling and competing, making most of the saves they should make and steeling a few then the Minutemen will be successful, but if they struggle then so will the team.

"I'm confident that both of those guys are eager to compete and eager to take those responsibilities," Cahoon said.

Matt Gedman, the third goaltender for the Minutemen for the last season and a half, has always been more of a baseball player than a hockey player and this year he has gotten the opportunity to make varsity and possibly get serious playing time.

Cahoon and the other coaches encouraged him to take the opportunity and found a replacement in Kevin Moore.

Moore, a New Jersey native, played the beginning of the 2008-09 season with the Phoenix Polar Bears (WSHL). In 22 games he had a 1.98 GAA, a .941 save percentage and went 16-4-0.

"He's a long way from being able to handle a start, but he's been a great asset to the team," Cahoon said. "He practices hard, he's a good guy and he's good to have as a third guy."

Injury update

David Boehm received a lower leg injury after the second game of the season and is still taking it day-to-day.

He recently was cleared to join the team in practice, but still is far from being able to participate in competitive situations.

"There are no decisions being made right now, but in the immediate future he's not part of it," Cahoon said.

Game notes

Luke Curadi, who has committed to UMass, is listed on the top 200 draft aspects for next year. Curadi is said to be one of the best skaters going into draft for defensemen.

Cory Quirk needs seven more points to reach 100 in his career. He has 39 goals and 54 assists for 93 points which is currently 13th on the all time list. Quirk is 16th on the all-time assist list.

Minutemen need to continue mentality

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

College hockey fans on either side of Commonwealth Avenue don't worry too much when it's late November and a team like Northeastern occupies the top spot in the Hockey East standings.

Every year, one of the typical underdogs puts together a few nice wins and cracks the top 10 in the national polls; and every year, it seems, that team finishes fifth and sixth before a prompt exit in the first round of the conference tournament.

It happened again this year. People chuckled when Northeastern, led by junior goaltender Brad Thiessen, won eight of its first 12 Hockey East games.

The annual drop-off was scheduled for sometime around the beginning of February.

Well, February starts in three days, and the Huskies enter the stretch run four points clear of second-place Boston University and six ahead of third-place Vermont.

The Huskies travel to Amherst for a Friday night meeting with Massachusetts before The Beanpot begins Monday night; they take on Boston College in the first round of the annual event.

Although Monday's game doesn't count in the conference standings, a win will provide the Huskies with a decided psychological advantage when the teams meet again to end the Hockey East portion of their schedules.

NU coach Greg Cronin relies mostly on Thiessen and his defensemen. The offense is more about the timeliness of its goals rather than the raw number of them.

Hockey East

Only strengthening their bid for a Hockey East championship is the play of its penalty kill. The unit kills off a conference-leading 89.9 percent of its penalties. Lately, NU's power play has enjoyed similar success, scoring on seven of its 34 opportunities – a 20.5 percent success rate.

"The first half of the year, our power play was hurting," Northeastern senior Ryan Ginand said to The Boston Globe following the Huskies 6-3 win over Providence Saturday night. "During the Christmas break, we had team building and we said, 'We have to amp up our power play if we want to be a national contender.' The special teams separate the games. We've been working on it a lot, and things are starting to click."

Still, a regular season conference championship means very little.

It may guarantee a bid to the 16-team NCAA tournament, but a Hockey East championship is the current goal of the Huskies.

Rare midseason addition

The same people who planned for Northeastern's eventual demise assumed Providence was destined for a last-place finish when the first half of the season ended.

PC coach Tim Army decided midway through the first semester to find another goaltender in hopes of salvaging the third three months.

Army and his staff settled on Alex Beaudry, who was in his second year at the University of Ottawa. Since Beaudry is a Canadian citizen, Army had more to worry about than enrolling him at the College.

"It took some time," Army told USCHO's Jim Connelly. "I felt that we had to find somebody for the second term. We had a number of goalies we were evaluating.

"Verbally we had things done [quickly], but you have to go through the paperwork," Army continued. "Being a Canadian citizen, there's immigration to go through and so forth – it took time.

With the holiday, it was hard to get everything done."

Army finished the process of enrolling Beaudry at Providence on Friday, Jan. 9.

Beaudry practiced with the team that day and was the starting goaltender the next night against UMass-Lowell.

Since Beaudry became Army's first-choice goaltender, the Friars have climbed into the race for the eighth and final spot in the Hockey East tournament.

Slumping Maine made it easier for the Friars with four losses in its last five games. The Black Bears, however, hold a four-point lead over PC; both teams have 12 regular-season conference games remaining but do not meet again this season.

PairWise Predictions

The latest PairWise Rankings have Boston University as the No. 1 overall team in the nation.

The PWR is a system designed by the college hockey media to mimic the formula used by the NCAA when finalizing the field of the 16-team NCAA tournament.

Although the NCAA does not endorse the method, it has correctly predicted the last eight NCAA tournament fields.

The champions of college hockey's six postseason tournaments earn automatic bids to the NCAA tournament.

The remaining 10 slots go to the teams with the highest PWRs that did not win conference championships.

As of now, Boston University, Northeastern, Vermont, Boston College and New Hampshire would qualify for the tournament – assuming one of those teams wins the Hockey East tournament.

The conference tournaments do offer surprises on occasion, so any team that qualifies for the conference championship could potentially earn an automatic bid.

If one of those five teams were to win the Hockey East tournament, the other five would qualify.

Should another team win the tournament – UMass, for example – Hockey East could have as many as six of the 16 teams in the tournament.

February, and the Minutemen can't count on anything from their man advantage – even when the opposition affords them seven mulligans.

The troubling part is that this is the most gifted offensive edition of the Mass Attack since Cahoon came to Amherst from Princeton in 2000. Pick an offensive archetype UMass has it. Quirk plays the role of poised pivot while Wellman and James Marcou keep defenders on their heels with displays of excellent vision and puck skills. They have the weary blue line presence in Justin Braun, and powerful triggermen Alex Berry and Matt Irwin. Even players who may not have a classical definition or role on the unit, like Chris Davis, have the ability to put pucks in the net.

And still: 13.5 percent, it just doesn't add up.

The issue does rest with the players. It's just not on ice level. Look about 6 feet above that to find your problem. Goaltender Dan Meyers was right when he suggested that the game might just be more mental than physical after UMass' 5-4 loss to Providence on Jan. 16.

"It's all about execution. Sometimes guys get into a place where they're too deliberate and try to walk through each play instead of just letting it flow," Cahoon said. "As long as we're not too deliberate and do the little things they're trained to do, we'll be successful."

At even strength, the Minutemen are as good as it gets. Their plus-13 rating as a team may be a little deceiving; but play 5-on-5 for 60 minutes, and the "W" is likely to fall to the Minutemen. But that's where a weak power play is especially damning. It's gotten to the point where opponents aren't scared to put the Minutemen on the power play. There exists such a thing as a "good penalty." Against UMass, they all are. A two-minute tripping minor or a hook to halt an odd-man rush isn't so bad when all will be right two minutes later.

"I don't think so," Cahoon said when asked if he's noticed teams more willing to take penalties against the Minutemen. "Saturday, we had to kill a penalty in overtime, but I'm sure [Vermont] would not have wanted to take a penalty."

Given the numbers entering Friday's game at the Mullins Center, the Minutemen need an effective showing from their power play more than ever.

Not only does Northeastern boast the league's best goaltender in junior Brad Thiessen, the Huskies also lead Hockey East in penalty kill efficiency (89.9 percent) and short-handed goals (six). One false step and it's 1-0 Northeastern. Expect to see the UMass man advantage a lot, too – the Huskies average 18.8 penalty minutes a game.

Twelve games remain on the schedule, and the Minutemen need as many points as they can get; they currently sit in seventh place, three points behind sixth-place UMass Lowell and four points away from home ice. The two points at stake every game mean the difference between fourth place and fifth place and eighth place and ninth place. And that one power-play goal usually means the difference between two points and none.

James Marcou leads the Minutemen in points (27) as well as assists (19). Much of UMass' offense depends on the play of the sophomore.

Narus continues to rewrite record books and lead team

Senior impressive at Boston University Invitational

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

There are noises in sports that every spectator dreads. No well-intentioned fan or athlete enjoys hearing the crunch of a fractured wrist, the pop of a dislocated shoulder or the nervous silence after a teammate goes down. For Massachusetts swimming captain Christa Narus, however, it was one of these moments that helped transform a nine-year old gymnast into one of the elite varsity swimmers in UMass history.

Call it a Cinderella cliché, or a blessing in disguise.

True to the blue-collar grit of her sport, Narus sticks to basics in naming the gymnastics fluke – the beginning of her swimming career.

"I started swimming and I got into it, stayed with it," recalled the Smithtown, N.Y. native. "I was doing a routine on the uneven bars and I fell and shattered my elbow."

The rest of the 2-time All-Conference flyer's fated path to UMass was forged by a collaborative effort between head coach Bob Newcomb and Tim Kenney, the associate athletic director.

Much like this year's recruiting process of high school All-American diver Jason Cook, Narus' arrival in Amherst was a tight-knit ordeal.

Cook is said to have signed on thanks to longtime mentor and current diving coach Mandy Hixon. Likewise, Kenney was an early coach of Narus, who calls the athletics administrator, "a family friend."

"[Kenney] just said 'You've gotta look at this kid,'" Newcomb remembers. "I said 'Great, good [butter]flyer.' We were looking for a flyer, she came in, and I've just been more impressed with her every year and every opportunity. I thank Tim for starting up that recruiting process."

According to Narus, however, it was also Newcomb's competitive yet approachable demeanor that sealed the deal.

"Bob had the intensity and the good heart that I was looking for in a coach," she says. "He's very open to suggestions and open to listening to you. As long as you listen to him and he listens to you … I felt like it was going to work."

As an All-American and four-time All-New York flyer at Ward Melville High School, Narus likely had her choice of schools to swim for. Five years later, after being named the Minutewomen's Rookie of the Year at the conclusion of the 2005-2006 season, she currently holds three school records and the amount keeps going up.

"I'm really excited to see where she finishes up her career and just how fast she's going to be able to go," Newcomb said.

The final showcase the 25-year coaching veteran may be alluding to is this year's Atlantic 10 finals in Buffalo, N.Y.

In the past, Narus has thrived at the annual Flickinger Aquatics Center competition, capturing second-place in the 200 fly and helping the 800 freestyle medley team to a top ten finish during last year's events.

In essence, Narus' list of career accomplishments thus far is so dense and consistent, it's tough to read from beginning to end.

Her favorite UMass swimming moment? The 5-foot-6 swimmer had to pause and reflect for a moment.

"That's a tough one," she said.

At the beginning of this season, Narus seemed to have settled comfortably into the No. 1 position in the UMass record books for both the 100 fly (1:51.95) and 200 fly (2:03.14). This past November, however, she broke two school records in one day at the Boston University Invitational. The catch was one of those records was her own.

Improving her previous 100 fly time from 1:51.95 to 1:51.77 and ousting former captain Liz Lovejoy's 200 fly finish Nov. 23 at BU's Competition Pool, Narus has etched herself into UMass swimming lore.

"She's just been getting better every year," said Newcomb. "She leads by example in the water, she leads by example through words, she leads through actions in races. Watching her as she's developed over the four years has just been amazing."

In one of the most physically demanding, high attrition sports out there, the climb to the top from scrawny freshman to respected captain may be best described as an enjoyable grind.

"You know, it's a roller coaster," Narus admits. "You have your days when it's just like, 'I don't want to get in the pool.' But you know that when you have to get in, the team follows you. I like it."

Newcomb agrees.

"The team has that certain respect for an individual," he said. "When she says, 'Hey girls it's time to go, let's start pushing,' trying to get the team up that way. The team looks at it and they say 'Hey, there's a leader that's getting us going and hey, I'm tired too but we've got to get up and go.' That's the kind of thing that a good leader will do."

For arguably the best flyer in recent UMass history, all it took was a shattered elbow and solid character.

Xavier tops again

2. Xavier's kid brothers

Just as you would do with a younger brother, Xavier picks on the second-tier of the Atlantic 10: Temple, Saint Joseph's and Dayton.

These programs are consistently strong and typically make the NCAA Tournament, but Xavier always shows these teams who's boss come March.

When they beat a ranked team, it's not such an upset. You expect them to be in the mix for an at-large bid, but you come to expect them to be one-and-done in the NCAA Tournament.

Every once in a while one of these three teams will make a Sweet 16, but it's far too infrequent for them to be in the same echelon as Xavier.

3. Hello, mediocrity!

That title is not meant to slight Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Charlotte or Richmond. Those are four solid programs that are always competitive.

It's just that, well … they are as inconsistent as Britney Spears' parenting practices. One day they're beating ranked teams and looking like a talented contender, and the next they're dropping home games to whom they have no business losing.

Take UMass for example. They've been real strong the past two seasons during the regular season, earning a first-round bye in the A-10 Tournament both times. And how did they follow that up? They got bounced out as quickly as possible – not even an 18-point lead against Charlotte held up last year – and missed out on the NCAA tournament because of it.

These are the type of teams that fans get the most frustrated with. They see the talent, they see the good coach and they see it all come together in a big win. So they expect more. But it rarely comes.

Every now and again, one of these teams would sneak up to a level of Tier 2, but again, it doesn't last. That's why these teams are in a group below. And while these teams raise your blood pressure, it's all the more rewarding when they make the NCAA Tournament because it doesn't happen often these days (UMass hasn't made one in over a decade).

4. Thanks for playing

There are six remaining teams in the conference – Saint Louis, Duquesne, La Salle, St. Bonaventure, George Washington and Fordham – which I'll place here.

I'll admit, it's a bit offensive to the former four to be lumped together right now with the latter two programs. But let me explain.

I'm not saying a Duquesne-Fordham matchup is going to be an even game. The Dukes (13-6) would trounce the 2-15 Rams. So would the Billikens (11-8), and so would the Explorers (11-7).

But these six teams are clearly a notch below the third group. These are the six teams that have been at the bottom of the conference standings the past few years – and you can expect to see it happen over the next few as well. You'll see Saint Louis or Duquesne in the middle sometimes, but they're not about to make March Madness. Maybe next year they'll win 20 games, but you can pretty much lock all these teams into the bottom half of the league.

Conclusion

Xavier will make the NCAA Tournament.

Out of Dayton, Temple and Saint Joseph's – one or two of them will make it.

Out of group three, a few of them will get their fan base's hopes up – and none of them will make it.

And for teams like George Washington and Fordham? They'll be rooting for the Cardinals in the Super Bowl, and they'll go to bed afterwards dreaming it could happen to them on the hardwood.

It won't. That reality is reserved for Xavier only.

History evident between teams

Past means nothing Saturday

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts men's basketball team faces Xavier and one of the teams is ranked, it usually makes for a memorable game.

It wasn't until 1996 when UMass was the No. 1 in the country that the Minutemen and Xavier faced one another with at least one team being ranked. Since that first game, the two schools have faced off four other times with one team being ranked – and three of the five matchups have gone to overtime.

Xavier holds a 3-2 advantage in those five games, but when UMass travels to Cincinnati this Saturday to face the No. 10 Musketeers, it hopes to even the score at three.

Here is a look at the other five matchups:

No. 1 UMass 78 at Xavier 74 (Overtime)

Feb. 4, 1996: The first-ever meeting between the two schools with at least one of the two teams being ranked. The Minutemen came into the game as the top team in the nation and, under coach John Calipari, 20-0. Xavier, on the other hand, was a .500 squad at 9-9, but looking for the upset.

At half, the upset seemed possible, as the Musketeers led the Minutemen 32-31, and even with just two-and-a-half minutes remaining, when Xavier was on top 67-62. But UMass closed the game out on a 6-1 run, capped off by a 3-pointer by Edgar Padilla with 15 seconds remaining to send the game to overtime with a score of 68-68.

Neither team pulled far away from the other in overtime until the final 10 seconds. With UMass up by two after Marcus Camby hit 1-of-2 free throws, Padilla knocked the ball away from Xavier's Lenny Brown. Charlton Clarke picked up the loose ball and layed it in as the buzzer sounded to give UMass a four-point victory, its biggest lead of the game. Xavier led by as many as 11 in the first half.

Tyrone Weeks led the Minutemen with a career-high 13 rebounds and Camby poured in 26 points to lead all scorers.

No. 20 Xavier 87 at UMass 84 (Overtime)

Feb. 1, 1997: For the second year in a row, the Minutemen and the Musketeers couldn't settle things in just 40 minutes.

UMass wasn't the same team it was a year before; It wasn't ranked, had no more Marcus Camby (drafted No. 2 overall by the Toronto Raptors in the 1996 draft) and James "Bruiser" Flint had replaced John Calipari, who left to coach the New Jersey Nets.

This time around, UMass was in control, holding the lead for almost the entire first half and leading by as many as seven. The second half saw the lead go back and forth but eventually end up equal at the end of regulation.

Carmelo Travieso, who broke the 1,000-point marker in his career that night, led the Minutemen with 29 points and tied a school-record with eight 3-pointers in the game.

One of Travieso's 3-pointers came with 13 seconds remaining in overtime that brought UMass within one.

Xavier answered back with two made free throws, and with 1.5 seconds remaining, Travieso took a 3-point shot from the baseline in hopes of forcing a second overtime.

But Xavier's James Posey, the James Posey who helped the Celtics win an NBA title in 2008, got a hand up and blocked the shot, sealing the victory for the Musketeers.

No. 23 UMass 73 at No. 21 Xavier 62

Feb. 8, 1998: For the third year in a row the Minutemen and Musketeers faced off with at least one team being ranked; but unlike in the first two meetings, both schools were ranked this time.

Despite the two teams being ranked closer than in the previous two meetings, this game was nowhere near as close. Overtime was needed to decide the previous two games but this one was over by halftime. The Minutemen had built an 18-point lead while shooting 63 percent from the field in the first half and held the Musketeers to just 29 percent. They also finished the half on a 27-9 run to make it 43-25 going into the locker room.

UMass suffocated Xavier with its inside game, and held Posey – who was often regarded as the best sixth man in the country – to four points. The Minutemen were led by Weeks once again, who fell two rebounds short of a double-double, with his 10 points and eight rebounds.

No. 24 Xavier 65 vs. UMass 59 (Overtime)

March 7, 2002: For the first time UMass and Xavier faced off in the A-10 tournament with one team being ranked, but despite the Minutemen dominating every aspect of the game, they still lost in overtime.

UMass shot 48.9 percent from the floor compared to Xavier's 29.8, hit 23 shots compared to the Musketeers 14 and even outrebounded them 33-28. But none of it was enough as Xavier was awarded 32 more foul shots than UMass, hitting 33-of-44 from the line.

The Minutemen led for most of the second half. UMass went on a 10-1 run after Xavier took a 35-33 lead with 15:27 remaining in the game, and held the lead until 2:42 left. With the score knotted at 48, Xavier's David West hit a shot as the shot-clock buzzer sounded to give Xavier the lead. The shot, however, was shrouded in controversy. While the basket was awarded to the Musketeers, a second look at a replay showed that West did not get the shot off in time.

Despite controlling much of the game, UMass still needed a prayer 3-point shot from Eric Williams with under a second left to send it to overtime. But the Minutemen's dominance ended once overtime began.

Xavier started the extra time with an 8-0 run, going up 60-52 with 1:52 remaining. UMass did make a final push, cutting the deficit to 61-57, but it came too late.

No. 23 Xavier 77 at UMass 65

Jan. 27, 2008: The most recent matchup between UMass and Xavier may have been the least thrilling of them all.

Xavier took its first lead of the game at 8-7, just four minutes into the game, and never gave it up.

The Musketeers built an 18-point lead at one point during the second half, 49-31, all after a poor shooting performance in the first half. The Musketeers went 10-of-27 from the floor in the first half and 15-of-30 in the second half.

UMass did put together a late run, bringing the game to within five at 68-63 with under two minutes to go but it ended there. Xavier scored on three straight possessions and finished the game on a 9-2 run.

Etienne Brower who scored 22 points off the bench led the Minutemen, but it wasn't enough as three of UMass' five starters combined for just 10 points (Ricky Harris, Tony Gaffney and Dante Milligan).

Even Gary Forbes, who averaged over 20 points per game, struggled scoring just 16 points (5-of-15 from the floor) and missed half of his 10 free throws.

Information from personal interviews, newspaper articles and sports releases was used in this report.

Luke Bonner protects the ball from La Salle defenders earlier this season. Bonner averages 20.3 minutes per game.

Anthony Gurley is tied second on the team averaging 11.5 points per game and averages 3.8 rebounds per game.

Shaky Minutemen face test

Anytime UMass can play the elite programs in the country – especially on national television – it's extremely beneficial for the program, in terms of exposure, recruiting and level of competition.

And that effect only magnifies when the Minutemen pull of the upset, as they did with the defending champion Jayhawks on Dec. 13.

UMass hung around early with then-No. 13 Memphis, but were ultimately outmatched in an 80-58 loss.

The Minutemen didn't fade against then-No. 25 Kansas, holding on at the last second for a 61-60 win.

Time will tell, but neither of those teams appears as good as Xavier.

As for the Minutemen, they are running out of games (11 left) to turn around their season.

An at-large bid into the NCAA Tournament is an extremely unlikely proposition, and UMass would need to win eight of its last 12 games (one would have to be in the A-10 Tournament) just to reach a .500 record and be eligible for its third straight trip to the NIT.

After losses in-conference to Charlotte (6-12, 1-4 A-10), Saint Louis (11-8, 2-3 A-10) and La Salle (11-7, 2-2 A-10), the Minutemen have a chance to make a statement to Xavier – and the rest of the conference – with their biggest win of the season.

Ricky Harris averages 18.9 points per game, leading the Minutemen. UMass faces Xavier on Saturday.

Tony Gaffney looks to post up in a game against La Salle earlier this season. Gaffney leads the Minutemen, averaging 35.2 minutes per game and a field goal percentage of 55 percent.

Another tough road test for Minutemen

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

During the press conference after the Massachusetts men's basketball team's loss to La Salle on Jan. 24, Tony Gaffney talked about how the Explorers simply wanted it more than they did.

From one game to the next, Gaffney is rarely sure which Minuteman team will show up, but he's confident UMass' best effort will be on display Saturday against No. 10 Xavier, in what will likely be its toughest test this season.

"You know us; we're a tough team to read. But Xavier on national television speaks for itself," he said before Wednesday's practice. "That's a Top 10 team and they have an 18-game home conference winning streak. I have no doubt we're going to show up for that game – it's the games in between that worry me."

Point guard Chris Lowe knows they better be, or they'll be in for a tough afternoon in Cincinnati, Ohio, otherwise.

"There's no not wanting it against Xavier unless you want to get embarrassed," he said.

The Musketeers (18-2, 6-0 Atlantic 10) have been doing that to a lot of teams this season.

Xavier currently has the nation's fourth-best RPI and seventh-hardest strength of schedule in the country, with marquee wins over Memphis, Virginia Tech, LSU and Cincinnati.

Its only two losses this season were to No. 1 Duke and Butler, who are 17-1.

Xavier, which made the Elite 8 last season, doesn't do it with flash. They play the game with the ultimate team-first mentality, specializing in stifling defense and selflessness on the floor.

"They just play together, nobody cares who scores," Lowe said. "They have a different leading scorer every game; it's not just one person that dominates.

"Xavier doesn't really produce many NBA players, but they keep producing great college players and they have a great tradition," he added. "It feels like they just keep bringing great players in."

Xavier coach Sean Miller utilizes all of them, as his rotation of nine players all play at least 10 minutes per game and contribute all over the floor.

The Musketeers dominate teams defensively (outscoring their opponents 73.6-62.5), hit their 3-pointers when they take them (38.7 percent on 120 made 3's) and get to the line significantly more often their counterparts (29 attempts to 19 per game).

Xavier has eight players averaging at least five points per game, with three in double figures and nobody averaging more than 14.2 per game. The same goes with rebounding (six average between 4.1 and 6.4 per game). No matter the position, each Musketeer can do a little bit of everything on the court – and that makes them balanced, consistent and tough to beat.

The Minutemen are quite familiar with the Musketeers and what they're up against, and are ready for the challenge – especially having already played two nationally televised road games (at Memphis and at Kansas) in tough atmospheres this season.

"We know what the environment is going to be like, we've played in plenty of hostile environments this year and a lot of guys on our team ride off of that – I know I definitely do," Gaffney said.

Xavier and everyone else

Eli Rosenswaike

Surely you picked the Arizona Cardinals to make the Super Bowl before the season started. You probably also picked the Tampa Bay (Devil) Rays to somehow make the World Series after a decade of futility.

The Rockies in 2007? You saw that coming. The Dolphins making the playoffs after a 1-15 season? Check.

Your nose is longer than Pacman Jones' rap sheet if you claim you legitimately thought any of that was going to happen. Truth is, you can't. You know these things do happen, you just don't know which team will do it or when.

That's called competitive balance, parity. From one year to the next, any team could come out of nowhere and compete for a championship.

So any time now, pencil in the Fordham men's basketball team for an Atlantic 10 Championship.

Not exactly.

College basketball is different. Each year there seems to be a team that makes a surprise run – Davidson in 2008 and George Mason in 2006 – but you don't see these teams winning championships. That's reserved for the big-time programs: North Carolina, Duke, Kentucky, UCLA, Kansas, etc.

The same applies to the Atlantic 10. There's Xavier, and then there's everybody else. But if you examine it closer, you can break the A-10 into four separate and distinct categories.

Based on the past two seasons and what is likely to happen over the next few years.

1. Xavier is better than you

This program just gets it.

They are supremely talented, especially compared to the rest of the conference. They are coached exceptionally well under Sean Miller. They recruit well. They play the right way, with stifling defense and team-oriented basketball.

And they basically kick the rest of the A-10s collective butt on a yearly basis because of it. At 17-2 (5-0 A-10), the No. 10 Musketeers are in line for their third-straight regular season conference title and seventh in the last 13 years.

They're in the NCAA tournament every year and the only team in the conference that can legitimately state they can compete for a national title. They made a run to the Elite 8 last season and will likely do the same in March.

NU travels to Mullins Center with tough, stingy defense

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

The month of January has been somewhat of a troublesome spot for the Massachusetts hockey team in the last year or two. The Minutemen are battling each game to find some sort of rhythm and consistency on both sides of the ice. There are games when UMass plays great on the offensive side of the puck – generating scoring chances with ease and entering the opposition's zone as if Minutemen forwards were barely contested. Then there are games in which UMass plays down to their opponents level and put forth a disappointing effort.

Unfortunately for the Minutemen, their next opponent doesn't get any easier.

"This weekend isn't like any of the other weekends ... It's an unbelievable league, there is no relief anywhere," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I think January went pretty well for us – not wins and loss wise, but in terms of the whole development process."

The Minutemen (10-11-3, 5-7-3 Hockey East) will host No. 3 Northeastern this Friday at the Mullins Center in front of what could be a very energetic crowd. The past few home games for UMass have been anything but loud. With the winter break now finished the Minutemen expect to have a much bigger and enthusiastic crowd waiting for them when the clock hits seven on Friday.

"It will be exciting to get the student body back out there and get the energy in the building," Cahoon said.

UMass hasn't played at home since Jan. 16, a 5-4 loss to Providence.

The Huskies travel to Amherst with a 17-5-2 record and are 13-3-1 in Hockey East play. NU leads the conference with 27 points, four ahead of second place Boston University. The Huskies are 3-4 in their last four games with two wins coming against Providence and one against then-No. 7 Vermont.

NU forward Ryan Ginand was recently named Hockey East Player of the Week for his performance against the Friars last weekend. The senior tallied five points last weekend including a hat trick last Saturday. Ginand leads a Northeastern team that has outscored their opponents 75-49 so far this season.

Besides Ginand, Wade MacLeod, Tyler McNeely, Alex Tuckerman and Joe Vitale lead the Huskies in scoring. MacLeod has 22 points while the others follow with a respective 16 points.

But the real story for NU is its defense. The Huskies' blueliners have all played solid giving their team a chance to win every night. Unlike past years, one of NU's strengths is its goaltending.

Brad Thiessen, the Huskies net minder, has played outstanding hockey. The junior from British Colombia has started every game for NU posting a 1.90 goals against average, .939 save percentage and has two shutouts to his name.

"That's probably been the difference for them," Cahoon said of Thiessen. "He's been that good; he and [Ben Scrivens] from Cornell are the two best goaltenders in the east for sure."

If the Minutemen plan to play with the Huskies they will look to James Marcou and Casey Wellman, both centers to UMass' first and second line, to step up and put forth good efforts.

"Generally speaking I think those two guys have been really good for us offensively," Cahoon said. "They make their lines go."

The Minutemen also play Maine on Sunday at 4 p.m.

Freshman center Casey Wellman is second on the team with 22 points and 16 assists. Wellman centers UMass' second line.

Power play issue on determined UM

Joe Meloni

This is getting a little ridiculous.

Don't let Casey Wellman's desperation strike against No. 5 Vermont Saturday night fool you, there's something seriously wrong with the Massachusetts hockey team's power play. It may have earned a tie on Saturday, but the unit's latest exercise in futility cost it two points against the Catamounts Friday night.

Claiming anything is easy at Gutterson Fieldhouse these days might be a little naïve. But take a peak at the game's outcome, 0-of-8 on the man advantage; they call it that for a reason, you're supposed to gain an advantage when the opposition loses a skater. Fifteen-of-111 is hardly an advantage, and it's been down right ugly since late November.

Despite UVM's tight, defensive style, it entered the weekend with the conference's worst penalty kill at 72.1 percent – a visit from the Minutemen is just the remedy for an ailing penalty kill.

"We were pretty happy with Saturday night's power play. We had 12 chances, and we got the one goal when we needed it," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It comes down to finishing plays off. We're doing a lot of things in our drills that are all about the power play. We're working diligently, so that we can explode by the end of the season. We're getting a few more looks than we have been."

The common sense scapegoat is Cahoon. Since last January though, it's become clear that when UMass struggles, it's a lack of execution, not preparation that does it in. Not that Cahoon denies any guilt in the problems, but there's only so much a coach can do.

He says it regularly, "Coaches win practices. Players win games."

The players know it, too.

Game after game, captain Cory Quirk comments that something needs tb be done about the troublesome unit. And, still, it's nearly

Holub on changes:

Cuts force new look at structure

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

JAMES WELIVER/COLLEGIAN

Chancellor Holub addresses the faculty last night in the Campus Center Auditorium. The dialogue centered on a plan to restructure the University's schools and colleges.

As the University of Massachusetts braces for a $46 million deficit next fiscal year, Chancellor Robert Holub addressed the Faculty Senate Thursday afternoon in response to growing concern over the budget and proposed administrative restructuring.

Holub offered a detailed overview of the impending shortfall, and introduced a plan to restructure the University's colleges during his presentation in the Campus Center auditorium. He framed the reorganization as a way to help close the deficit without affecting money earmarked for students or faculty and characterized it as "the best alternative among a bunch of other alternatives I don't like."

Holub portrayed the restructuring as definitive, but declined to offer a detailed proposal during his presentation.

He told the faculty that a potential plan could "eliminate three colleges." The chancellor acknowledged that he wanted to consolidate the life sciences, but would not touch the professional schools in effort to avoid accreditation complications.

However, he failed to address a long-rumored merger between the College of Humanities and Fine Arts and the College of Arts and Sciences.

"Not right now, but soon there will have to be," Holub said when asked if he had a detailed merger plan in mind. "I have some thoughts, but my thoughts have changed over the time I've met with faculty and staff. I assume that after tomorrow I will have to formulate something."

Regardless of any possible plan's details, it would fail to be a panacea for the University's budget crisis, as Holub estimated that it would net the University a savings of between $1-2 million per year. Additional one-time costs would also accompany a merger.

Holub characterized the plan as way to streamline operations, while avoiding a duplication of functions.

"This is all a hard pill to swallow. But given the range of possibilities, maybe this isn't the worst way to go," Communications professor Donal Carbaugh said. "There's a lot to be decided or a lot to be made public, depending on how you look at it."

Holub characterized the general faculty reaction during the extensive question-and-answer session as similar to what he's experienced during recent meetings with faculty and staff.

"I don't think there was anything astounding or new here, but it was important to hear it in this venue," Holub told The Collegian immediately after addressing the faculty.

The chancellor remarked that he would continue to hold meetings with faculty and offer the nature of a restructuring proposal in the near future.

Holub patiently answered questions for over an hour, as a long queue of concerned faculty members waited to pose an inquiry.

"I think the meeting went as expected," he said. "There are people who are upset about things and I can understand that and I'm upset about them too."

At one point during the question period, a flustered Holub bluntly asked the audience if it wanted details of a possible restructuring plan. The faculty responded with a resounding "yes," but the chancellor only offered a promise to provide more information at a later date.

During his presentation, the chancellor leveraged his experience as a German professor at the University of California-Berkeley as a way to empathize with the reaction of the faculty. In addition, Holub admitted that he would prefer to cut from the administration than divert funds from faculty hiring.

The chancellor admitted that the concept of restructuring precipitated from a conversation with a distinguished faculty member and that the idea took shape in November. He then gradually solicited input from faculty members and staff over the past several months.

Furthermore, Holub told the faculty that the University's Board of Trustees was expecting a detailed proposal soon, but emphasized that he was not pressured into making this decision.

The chancellor stressed that the reorganization would not affect the day-to-day activity of the faculty. Yet, he was clear to acknowledge that the plan could only succeed with full faculty support.

"It's evident that the chancellor's been thinking about reorganization for some time," said Steven Brewer, assistant professor of biology. "But so far there have only been rumors and not much in the way of details. It doesn't sound like it's a fait accompli at this point and that it has the potential to be adjusted or changed."

Holub opened the meeting with a general overview of the University's current budget situation, offering detailed financial information on the impending decrease in funding and increase in expenses.

The Faculty Senate meeting was organized through a request by the chancellor and petition by at least 10 percent of the faculty. An additional senate meeting will take place Feb. 9 at 4 p.m. to continue the restructuring dialogue.

Fighting for YCMP

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

The People's Market has advocated for the ability to allow customers to use YCMP swipes, but auxillery services said the move would be an irresponsible one for them to take.

People's pushes for swipe payment

By Emily Reynolds
Collegian Staff

While the Your Campus Meal Plan (YCMP) has been a mainstay for University of Massachusetts students looking for an alternative to the dining commons, the People's Market has struggled to get a piece of the action.

"For about two and a half years, we have been struggling to get YCMP, but Auxiliary Services has been adamant about not allowing us," said Michael Kebede, an employee at the People's Market.

The People's Market has been at odds with Auxiliary Services and the administration since last fall, when a question included on the Student Goverment Association's (SGA) election ballots asked if YCMP should apply to the student-run business.

The proposition passed by a large margin.

Since then, the business has created a YCMP task force purposed with dealing with the administration to try and make YCMP available there.

"We are just trying to find which people in the administration we need to talk to, to obtain YCMP and what we have to do, but we're finding it hard to get through the Auxiliary Services," said Amato Zinno, a member of the task force. "This is not a new battle. In the past, there have been other efforts."

In addition to the ballot initiative, People's Market staff members said the store has taken surveys of students who have overwhelmingly said that they would like to use their swipes at the store. But according to Kebede, the SGA is in favor of the People's Market getting YCMP but cannot yet get past the process that actually decides.

"The People's Market has come to us several times in the past to get YCMP, but we always say no for two reasons," said Ken Toong, the Executive Director of Dining Services. "We consider it more like a convenience store, and we are trying to protect the financial integrity for the meal plan."

According to Toong, YCMP is not available to convenience stores because of the cost structure and financial differences between convenience stores and dining places. It's the reason stores at the dining halls do not have YCMP either. Toong said that it isn't financially responsible.

"We support student-run businesses, but we have to make sure that we can cover our own overhead," said Toong.

The employees at the People's Market have a difference of opinion when it comes to Toong's definition of "convenience store."

"The administration says we should not have it because we are a convenience store, but we sell things that could make a meal, like bagels, coffee, and sandwiches," said Zinno. "We have a lot more to offer than the Procrastination Station, which has YCMP, but we offer a wider selection of food."

Kebede agreed, citing that most revenue for the business came from coffee and bagels, which also tops the sales at other outlets that do offer YCMP.

YCMP has become an important issue for People's Market recently because of the financial situation that they are in.

"Last year we needed the YCMP," said Kebede. "We have been losing money every year. We were sure YCMP would have helped pull us out of a mess."

The People's Market is sure that if they offered YCMP, more students would go there to eat because it would just be part of the meal plan instead of an out-of-pocket expense.

"The People's Market has been struggling for the past few semesters, but we have been able to bounce back a bit recently," said Zinno. "YCMP would help us out because we could open to a new market of people. It would make our business more sustainable and more profitable."

Money is the issue for both. Unfortunately for People's Market, what would help them financially may hurt Dining Services, something that the University is not willing to risk with the current economy.

With little local investment, anticipate 'subdued' bowl

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

On Sunday, the AFC Champion Pittsburgh Steelers will take on the NFC Champion Arizona Cardinals in sunny Tampa Bay, Fla., for Super Bowl XLIII.

Students in all of the University of Massachusetts' residence halls have expressed a degree of disinterest in the game between the two franchises. Several residence halls show no indication of planned activity to bring students together to watch the game.

With the absence of the hometown New England Patriots and little regional investment in the contest, the campus is subdued compared to last year's hotly debated game between the Patriots and the New York Giants. Then, the game inspired the gathering of a mixed crowd that featured celebrating New York area transplants and a stunned native population. The celebration turned sour and resulted in the arrest of several students on the Southwest Mall.

But the campus is less involved this year and is stumbling toward the game in myopic indifference.

Josh Mark, a junior resident of Patterson Hall in Southwest said, "I don't think my dorm is doing anything. I didn't see anything around."

Chris DiMilla, a sophomore resident of John Quincy Adams Tower in Southwest was unsure as well: "No idea. There are no flyers in my lobby or floor either. This is weird."

Students are accustomed to minor get-togethers and watch parties run by Resident Assistants, and in some cases, food and beverages are provided as a dry substitute to private gatherings.

Freshman Jared Gardner, resident of Emerson Hall in Southwest was not given any indication from his dorm either.

Other students are thinking of their own ideas to watch the big game. Freshman Robert Allen, resident of Moore Hall in Southwest said he plans to have his own party. Erika Poole, a freshman living in Van Meter in Central, is prepared for the game as well.

"My room is having a huge party with pizza and food," she said.

Neither residential halls nor students are making much of a to-do over the Super Bowl. No Pats, but there should be wings and beverages aplenty.

The Paper City Brewery

Holyoke brewery attracts crowds for Friday night deal on brews

By Peter Shipman
Collegian Correspondent

It's 6 p.m. on a Friday at Paper City Brewery on 108 Cabot St. in downtown Holyoke, Mass., and the joint is rocking. The brewery is jam-packed; people line the stairs eagerly waiting to get inside.

The stairs are wooden and worn. The brick wall is a bright maple leaf red on the bottom and off-white on the top. When you finally get into the brewery you will be greeted by Martha, a middle-aged woman with blonde hair. She will ask you for your ID and $6, then you receive an eight-ounce tasting cup and she says, "Enjoy!"

Once people receive a tasting cup they stampede to the bar, not noticing the historical motorcycles or the neat knick-knacks in the glass case. Once you get to the bar, you will be greeted by either Tom or Trish.

Now comes the difficult part, which beer to choose first. Your best bet is to start with the Ireland Parish Golden Ale, as it is a nice beginner beer.

Paper City has been in business for thirteen years and each year they continue to grow tremendously. Part of their success is they set up an offer you can't refuse, $6 for all you can drink for two hours, and when you leave they give you a four pack of beer for the road.

"It's a perfect place to pre-game on a Friday night and you can't get this bargain anywhere else," said Jamie Murphy, a beer enthusiast and Paper City patron.

Over the years Paper City has expanded its style of brewing to create their own original beers, such as the Blonde Hop Monster, a strong beer with an intense amount of hops. The Riley's Irish Stout is a dark beer reminiscent of Guinness. The Goats Peak Bock is a malty beer in a copper hue and the Denogginator is a golden lager.

Most every Friday nights, Paper City Brewery is packed full of people enjoying quality beer while listening to whatever live band is playing that night. Their business is flourishing in the downtown sector of Holyoke. Many people come to the brewery for fun and entertainment to start off their night.

"Most of the people who come to the brewery are not from Holyoke and it shows that coming to downtown Holyoke doesn't bother them," said Jay Herbert, owner of Paper City Brewery.

Holyoke is a town that was once vibrant but is now fighting to make a comeback, having moved from a manufacturing economy to a service sector economy, which has left many vacant run-down mills, like the one Paper City used to be.

In 1995, Jay Herbert, who grew up in Holyoke, started Paper City Brewery in an old mill building on Cabot Street and the beer has been flowing ever since. In November of 1996, Paper City unveiled their first beer, the Dam Ale at the Yankee Pedlar Inn, which received a lot of praise from the local media.

By1997 Paper City began to gain some notoriety when their Cabot Street Wheat and their Winter Palace Wee Heavy won first place at the New England Beer Festival.

Herbert still lives in Holyoke, on Pearl Street.

NOTABLE BREWS OF PAPER CITY

HOLYOKE DAM ALE
Their Holyoke Dam Ale is a mildly hopped ale with a refreshingly smooth and malty taste, brewed in the English style using the finest quality Canadian English malts.

IRELAND PARISH GOLDEN ALE
The Ireland Parish Golden Ale is a medium bodied, lightly hopped, blonde ale.

BLONDE HOP MONSTER
The Blonde Hop Monster (the Tribal brew), is an Imperial IPA with an immense amount of Hops.

INDIA'N PALE ALE IPA
The brewery's India'n Pale Ale IPA, made in both the British and American traditions, was named for Herbert's passion for Indian Motorcycles. Indian Motorcycles were fabricated in Springfield and at one time rivaled Harley Davidson. Herbert's collection of antique bikes can be seen at the brewery. Nearly two pounds of British East Kent Goldings and American Yakima Goldings hops are used per barrel in this IPA.

RILEY'S STOUT
Paper City's Riley's Stout is a rich, chocolate colored Irish style stout with a frothy tan head.

HERITAGE RED
This French Farmhouse Ale was made to celebrate the one-hundred and twenty-fifth Anniversary of Holyoke.

BANCHEE EXTRA PALE ALE
This is their unfiltered, extra pale ale. Banchee Extra has a smooth and mild taste, comparable to many national brand beers but made with local pride.

COURTESY PAPER CITY BREWERY

A tall glass of ice cold Paper City Brewery's Holyoke Dam Ale sits atop the bar. Holyoke Dam Ale is a mildly hoppy ale, brewed in the English style using Canadian English malts.

THE FRUITY ONES

RED HAT RAZZBERRY
This beer is sort of self explanatory, it's a raspberry flavored lager.

1 EARED MONKEY
This beer has a delicious peach taste, created by adding peach extract to their Golden Lager.

P.C. BLUE
The P.C. Blue is a beer with blueberry undertones.

DID YOU KNOW?

"Hefe" means with yeast and "weizen" means wheat beer.

Tours of the brewery are available Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. until 5 p.m. or by appointment.

All beers are made from malt. Malt is grain that has been malted.

To malt a grain, it must be sprayed with water and then reach a certain moisture content to spread out and germinate. Then it is dried in a kiln to create a particular malt for a specific style of beer.

Hops are a cone like flower that grow on vines fifteen to twenty feet tall. Hops add bitterness and aroma to the beer, they also act as preserving agents.

Primary fermentation takes from five to six days.

There are only two types of beer: ale and lager.
Ale is a top fermented beer. Lager is a bottom fermented, lightly hopped beer.

Lager beer is the dominant beer type in the brewing world of today.

When Herbert was 18, he would go into a package store and find the most exotic beers in the store. Herbert recalled some of the beers that he had tried back then such as Ballantine XXX, Heineken Dark, Dinkleacker which came in a big .5 liter keg can and Elephant beer from Australia, which came in an oil can shaped can.

When Herbert was 18, there weren't too many imported beers around. The selection was relatively small compared to many modern liquor stores' stock. Herbert was doing some experimenting making his own beers.

The first floor of the Paper City Brewery used to be the Winter Palace Theater, which had a stage, a roller rink and was a very popular attraction for many people around the turn of the century.

Paper City respects and remembers their building and city's heritage. You may notice that Paper City's winter seasonal is named Winter Palace Wee Heavy. You may also notice that many of Paper City beers are named after historical names or places in Holyoke such as the Dam Ale, Ireland Parish, Cabot Street Wheat and the Summit House Oktoberfest.

It's now 7 p.m. and people are settling into the brewery. Most people stand while others are lucky enough to have grabbed one of the few seats. The people at tables are playing cards, drinking beer and listening to the band –, The Whiskey Junction –, rock out.

"Paper City is just one of those places that is chill. Everyone that comes just has a good time and they serve excellent beer," said Sean Young, a Paper City customer.

At this point many people are already catching a good buzz and are enjoying the live musical entertainment. Long lines are quickly forming near the brewery's bathroom.

Most of the time the fine for the bathroom wraps around the corner stretching all the way down to Jay's office. The reason for the long lines is there is only one toilet, however, it is a very clean toilet.

Once people come out of the bathroom, they rush right back to the bar to capitalize on the great deal. Some patrons slur their orders; the beer is getting to them by now. On either side of the bar, three tiered bookcases are filled with a nice collection of old beer bottles, and a very distinct black Paper City Brewery T-shirt is displayed. The bookcase on the right has an Irish flag hanging to represent Holyoke's heritage.

Once 8 pm rolls around and the band plays their final number, the people start to form a line to receive their four pack of beer.

Once you make your way to the front of the line to receive your beer you will throw out your tasting up in a barrel lined with a burlap sack on your left and Mike Adams will point to the white board that shows which beers they will be handing out. "This is the busiest but best part of the night, I enjoy seeing peoples faces light up when I give them their four pack of beer," said Mike Adams, a volunteer at Paper City.

Paper City is one of those breweries that is always experimenting, currently they are working on a coffee stout to add to their brew collection. Paper City's beer is available at retail locations in addition to the brewery. In the Amherst vicinity you can find Paper City beer at the Hangar, the Harp, Stonies Pub, R&P Liquors, Spirit Haus and Liquors 44.

"We take pride in distributing our beer throughout Massachusetts, to help Paper City get out in the public eye," said Jim Marcyoniak manager at La Resistance, distributor for Paper City Brewery.

THE SEASONALS

SUMMIT HOUSE OKTOBERFEST
Summit House Oktoberfest is Paper City's Fall Vienna style lager, named after the late Mt. Tom Summit House which used to overlook the Pioneer Valley. This beer is a full-bodied, copper-hued lager with a delicate flavor balance, created with the highest quality domestic and German malts as well as imported hops. Two months of lagering provides the exceptional smoothness of this beer.

WINTER PALACE WEE HEAVY
Wee Heavy style ales are Scottish Ales. Paper City's recipe is true to the traditional Wee Heavy style using pale and roasted malts to give a rich, full maltiness and a deep, dark amber color.

GOATS PEAK BOCK
The Spring lager at Paper City is named after the peak of Mt. Tom in Holyoke. This beer is malty and has a deep copper color with a full flavor. Goat's Peak Bock is fermented colder and lagered for two months, giving it a clean smooth yet complex taste.

CABOT STREET SUMMER WHEAT
The Cabot Street Summer Wheat is a light and fresh summer hefeweizen beer, made in the traditional German style. Keeping with authentic German wheat beers, Paper City uses 50 percent German wheat and a traditional strain of German yeast. This combination lends a banana-like aroma with a subtle citrus taste.

COURTESY PAPER CITY BREWERY

Paper City's Master Brewer, Dan Anhalt, and brewer Jason Todd hard at work crafting their special brews. After adding the malt and hops, the brewers mill the grains, then mash them, boil them and finally they add yeast to ferment the beer. After that, beers must mature for at least fifteen days after which the beer is soemtimes filtered and then carbonated.

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Matthew Robare

One day during winter session, I took a look at my checkbook and realized I hadn't had a paycheck since October when I was a student caller at the Newman Center.

I needed a job, preferably on campus, so I could get there and back easily. That's when I discovered that the Textbook Annex was hiring for the first week of school. Sure it was only for the week, but it was better than nothing. Plus, I've always wanted to work in a bookstore.

When they hired me, it was win-win all around, right?

No, unfortunately. The people who run the bookstore/Textbook Annex are weasels. They "hired" me, but failed to give me any hours. I asked for my schedule on Sunday (it was supposed to be sent earlier in the week) and it is now Wednesday and I have not gotten a single e-mail from them.

This is only the latest in a long string of absurdities and abuses that continue to make life difficult, exhausting and expensive for all of us students.

It is time for things to change: time to start a student-run bookstore. Follett has a monopoly here on campus – a monopoly that has gone unchallenged for too long.

During the winter, I had to buy paper for my class – 150 sheets of college-ruled notebook paper cost over two dollars. At Target it's 90 cents and at Wal-Mart it's about 80. Books that would be discounted at Amherst Books or Food For Thought are sold at cover price at Follett. And everybody knows that the Textbook Annex won't buy back most books for more than a fraction of the cost you paid – if they buy it back at all – and jack up the price next semester.

One of the books I had to buy was $93 new and $70.50 used. I got it used on Amazon for $8. Steve and Barry's (God I loved that place) was able to sell t-shirts and sweaters for $8 when the bookstore sells them for $60.

The campus bookstore does not try to compete in anything. It is the same evil that people claim Wal-Mart is. How many other campuses are held in thrall to monopoly? How many other students start of the semester impoverished because their bookstore won't do everything it can to get them the best price?

> It's time for us students to take our destiny into our own hands and in this bad economy – what could be better than a student-run bookstore, providing jobs and savings for all of us?

How many students are cheated at the end of the semester out of the market-clearing value of their books? I am not one to casually subscribe to popular ideas about economics, but the bookstore really does stink of price-gouging – especially with such a large disparity between its prices and alternatives.

It's time for us students to take our destiny into our own hands and in this bad economy, what could be better than a student-run bookstore, providing jobs and savings for all of us?

We might fail, of course, but I think there's a better chance to make a profitable enterprise. Yeah, we'd have to be nonprofit, but we could just invest it back into the store. No one ever accomplished anything who didn't at least start trying.

Just writing this article I am bursting with cost-cutting ideas, but I won't mention any of them because I do want this to go forward. I want a student-run bookstore to be operational at the end of the semester, I want to be selling cheap textbooks, cheap books, cheap supplies and cheap UMass apparel when everyone comes back in the fall.

It will be a group effort – I don't have the skills to do everything myself, but I'm sure that there are students here who do. A bookstore needs people who are good with computers, with management skills, with advertising skills, with people skills. So many skills, so much knowledge, so many jobs.

To start a student-run business takes a bit of politicking – support from the Student Government Association and the administration, capital, space and a business plan. No wonder most of them are food oriented –food is always a good bet to succeed.

A bookstore that can compete with others in the area, though, would be just as good a bet as any snack bar. The best spot for it would be in the Student Union because of the central location, although there might not be enough space there and a different spot would have to be found.

Opportunity is knocking. There is a chance to do some good and make money doing it. That's very rare. Anyone who wants to help get the ball rolling, contact me.

Rachel Dougherty

On Oct. 26, 2008, an 8-year-old boy named Christopher Bizilj lost control of a 9-millimeter micro submachine gun and shot himself in the head during the Westfield Machine Gun Shoot and Firearms Expo.

His death has lead Hampden County District Attorney William Bennett to the indictment Pelham Police Chief Edward Fleury on charges of involuntary manslaughter and furnishing a weapon to a minor. If convicted, Fleury, whose organization COP Firearms and Training sponsored the event, could face up to thirty years in prison.

There's a word for the act of putting a submachine gun originally intended for Israeli military police in the hands of an 8-year-old kid: stupid. That much about the case has been clear from the start.

The question is whether it is right to hold one man responsible for the boy's death – especially considering that Bizilj died while participating in a legal sporting event with an instructor at his side and his father standing just feet behind him.

One of the major arguments for indicting Chief Fleury has been that the event violated Massachusetts gun control law. But upon closer inspection, the Westfield Machine Gun Shoot and Firearms Expo is proving surprisingly legal.

Massachusetts state law prohibits citizens from owning or buying submachine guns in the state, but it does allow their use in gun shoots and exhibitions such as the one hosted in Westfield, provided that the club has a license and that participants are guided by licensed instructors (Chapter 140 Section 131). Minors may participate in the event with parental permission.

The Westfield Machine Gun Shoot and Firearms Expo had a license to use the submachine guns. They promised licensed instructors and required parents – including Bizilj's father, to sign waivers before allowing their children to participate.

"Of the instructors I saw, the youngest was older than me," said Mr. B, a 38-year-old sportsman who was at the shoot the morning Bizilj died. "And the youngest kids shooting were teenagers." Mr. B. left the shoot at midday. It is not clear how just hours later Bizilj wound up shooting an Uzi beside an unlicensed, 15-year-old instructor.

> There's a word for the act of putting a submachine gun originally intended for Israeli military police in the hands of an eight-year-old kid: stupid.

Chris Bizilj's death happened because of a series of poor judgment calls on the part of the adults that day. Had the club set an age limit for use of the machine guns; had the instructor been a licensed adult; had the boy even been using one of the larger, more stable guns that was available that day; had one person stepped up and said that maybe giving an eight-year-old a Uzi wasn't such a great idea – this might never had happened.

The fact is, more than one person was responsible for what happened that day.

Over the past few months, the story of the 8-year-old and the Uzi has been dragged onto the national stage by every news organization from The New York Times to CNN, reigniting old arguments on gun control and firearm safety. Since Bizilj's death, people across the nation have been calling for justice, for retribution.

They want someone to blame, a way to make sense of a truly senseless tragedy. Chief Fleury is simply the best target.

Putting the blame on the sponsors of the event allows everyone else involved to ignore their own responsibility and guilt for what happened to Chris Bizilj. The truth is that this event and others like it have been widely publicized across the state for more than a decade.

If the parameters of the shoot were so glaringly illegal, why hasn't District Attorney Bennett or any other DA spoken out against them before? For Bennett to come in now calling himself Atticus Finch and crying out for justice after ten years of silence on the part of the DA's office is not right.

If the DA's office is willing to look the other way for Bizilj's father and the 15-year-old instructor, while targeting the event sponsors, they cannot say they are pursuing justice.

With the spotlight on Western Massachusetts, Bizilj's death has become little more than fodder for the national media. It is important to remember that his death and Chief Fleury's indictment are more than a story to be tossed around by an impartial public.

An 8-year-old boy is dead and a man may lose the next thirty years off his life. The DA's office has a chance to be the hero. They could achieve this not by providing the nation with a villain, but by recognizing that there was more to Bizilj's death than the poor judgment of the sponsors.

There's no one culprit for the economy crisis

Nick Milano

So, Bernie Madoff has become public enemy number one, the perfect example of a money-grubbing monster.

The press descending on Madoff like mad dogs is no surprise. With the economy as it is, he is an easy target on which the public can hoist their anger.

It's unfortunate, not only for Madoff, who has probably been seeing much more of himself in the news than he would like, but also for the rest of us.

With all the attention on Madoff, it appears that one of the major players in creating the economic mess in the first place, along with the major player in being unable to do anything of substance to fix it, are getting away unscathed. They deserve as much attention and obsession as Madoff.

Remember Phil Gramm? He was the silly McCain economic advisor who called the United States a nation of whiners. While I bet he's the one now whining that Barack Obama is president, his wrongdoing was working ardently for the sake of investment bankers while he served in the Senate.

> Hope's cavalier statement says it all. Why should the banks put the public sector before themselves just because they were asked?

Gramm was not just a lobbyist who pushed for deregulation of the investment banking community; rather, he was the chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. This granted him unimaginable power over the United States' attitude toward shady investment methods. For example, by attaching a 262-page amendment to a spending bill, Gramm opened the door for the widespread use of financial tactics that have taken much of the blame for the economic downturn.

Senator Gramm's long-winded amendment to an omnibus spending bill, which was, in reality, a huge bill longer than anything a senator could actually read and understand before voting on it, deregulated a variety of financial instruments, most notably the Credit Default Swap (CDS).

The CDS is basically a craps game in which the players gamble on whether a person faults on a home or business. It became a $62 trillion craps game – greater than the gross domestic product of the entire world. And when the dice went cold, kaboom.

So, after opening the floodgates for years of an incredibly risky investment system as a senator, can you guess what company Gramm moved into after leaving the Senate? He became a vice chairman for UBS, a Swiss investment bank. By August, it had lost some $43 billion related to the sub-prime crises. Do they appreciate his work now?

If Phil Gramm's amendment single-handedly created a torrent of foolhardy investment tools, then former Treasury Secretary Paulson's bailout might be responsible for prolonging the financial crisis.

A recent report in The New York Times found that many banks are simply refusing to hand out more loans as Paulsen had hoped would happen if he infused the banks with millions, if not billions of dollars.

The Times article quoted John C. Hope III, the chairman of a New Orleans bank that received $300 million from the federal government.

"Make more loans?" Hope said to the Times in an interview. "We're not going to change our business model or our credit policies to accommodate the needs of the public sector as they see it to have us make more loans."

This sentiment sums up all that is wrong with Paulson's poorly designed and even more poorly implemented bailout. The government did not actually force the banks to do anything.

The United Kingdom, however, can thank the leadership of Prime Minister Gordon Brown, who forced banks to give up seats on their boards, stop making dividend payments to shareholders and stop executive bonuses, among other concessions. Most importantly, though, the government and banks made a legal agreement that they lend money to homeowners and small businesses.

In the United States, the opposite happened. Shareholders will still get dividend payments, executives will still get their bonuses and the government has no voting interests in any banks nor does it have seats on any boards.

Hope's cavalier statement says it all. Why should the banks put the public sector before themselves just because they were asked?

Secretary Paulson was unable, or as a former CEO of Goldman Sachs, unwilling, to force anything from the banks. Without a requirement to actually increase lending, who would refuse billions of dollars to pocket, as the Times' article found to be the case? He should not disappear into the fog as a departing Bush official. He may be responsible for incredible damage to the United States and the connected global economy.

For Phil Gramm, it cannot be argued that he is not to blame, at least partly, for the growth of risky and stupid investment tools, games that hurt.

Bernie Madoff will get what he deserves when his jury comes back with a guilty verdict. There are many others who need to be held responsible by the new administration for the damage they did to the American economy. Gramm and Paulsen are only a start.

Israel's continued victimization

Eli Gottlieb

As an immediate disclaimer to the invective I am sure to receive after this column, let me officially state that I do not hate Arabs, Palestinian Arabs or Muslims.

I actually rather like most individuals I meet from these groups and deeply regret the historical coincidences that have made their people clash with mine. I do not support the invasion or occupation of any Middle-Eastern country – especially my own.

Over winter break the Israeli Defense Force deployed into the Gaza Strip to injure – if not cripple or destroy – the popularly-elected terrorist organization, Hamas. When I learned of this, I thought for a moment that I was in a bizarre parallel universe, because until I did some digging I didn't actually see a report of Israel going to war.

Instead, I found out about the war from reading various accusations of war crimes and genocide levied against Israel.

Now, I don't know how others think, but in my book an attempted genocide actually puts a dent in the demographic figures of the civilian population.

This war's casualties were only 50 percent civilian from a total of 1300 dead – a better rate than any war ever fought by, say, the United States.

Civilian collateral casualties do not engender a war crime where leaders have declared their pride in "having created a human shield of women, children, and the elderly" and that "for the Palestinian people, death became an industry at which women excel and so do all people on this land[.]" (Fathi Hamad gave this speech on Feb. 29, 2008).

> Why do people continue to support these terrorists against the Israelis, who not only are the only Jewish state in the world – unlike the twenty-two Arab states – but have built a thriving First-World society despite constant attacks upon them?

Admittedly, using white phosphorous weapons is a war crime and the people responsible should serve life sentences to prison. But my point is made: There is neither genocide nor ethnic cleansing occurring in the Israel-Palestine area. Israel defended itself against Hamas' years of rocket attacks after the ceasefire which Hamas violated endlessly – expired.

After this war I have seen and heard an endless number of demands that Israel quickly make peace with the Palestinian Arabs. However, I feel that at this point, one should not ask how Israel can make peace but with whom they could possibly make it.

A question needs asking: Why do people continue to support these terrorists against the Israelis, who not only are the only Jewish state in the world – unlike the twenty-two Arab states – but have built a thriving First-World society despite constant attacks upon them?

The answer is a decades-long propaganda effort by Arab and Muslim states in favor of the Palestinian Arab claims.

The basic idea has been the same as the efforts that gave Americans the Bush Administration: slowly dragging the mainstream in a single direction until people consider normal ideas once found on the lunatic fringe.

In 1948 or 1967 nobody would have acted as though the Palestinian Arabs had any right to destroy Israel for their own national aspirations. However, the Palestinian Arabs' (and their leaders') continued use of combat tactics that deliberately create civilian deaths and obstinacy to even the most reasonable peace proposals (peace proposals that Egypt and Jordan have had the good sense to accept) have created a facade of victimhood.

Yet it is utterly false: Yasser Arafat rejected a peace offer at Camp David that would have given the Palestinian Arabs a state of their own consisting of 91 percent of the West Bank, all of the Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem as a capital – without making any counterproposal – because the proposal would not give Palestinian Arabs a "right of return" into Israel.

Obviously, this would have forced Israel to make a sadistic choice between its Jewish character or its democracy; Israel could not have accepted any such deal. Still, the Palestinian Arabs could have had peace and a state of their own in the year 2000, but they rejected it in favor of the Second Intifada because they would only have obtained one Palestinian state instead of making Israel into a second one.

Unfortunately, most of the world lacks the wisdom to respond in any way but with agreement when presented with the "victimhood" portrayed by Palestinian media (some of which is fabricated).

The sheer, near-comedic incompetence of the Arab and Muslim terrorists only seems to add to their pretense as righteous victims of Israeli aggression. Again, Israel finds itself compelled to create "peace" with a party rejecting every reasonable effort at peace and aiming, however ineffectively, for nothing less than the destruction of Israel and the extermination of Jews everywhere (as stated in Hamas's charter).

Ergo, the world should cease asking Israel what they will do for the Arabs, and instead ask why Israel should trust the Arabs enough to make even another ceasefire. I can't say I know what the solution will or must be, but for those interested in the issue, I will be posting more thorough and comprehensive opinion pieces on this issue on the Daily Collegian's Ed/Op Blog, and anyone wishing to debate the issue with me or begin ad hoc peace negotiations can email me to start arranging an appearance on UMass Yak-Back.

Nason set to debut exhibit

By Caroline Scannell
Collegian Correspondent

Kristin Nason, University of Massachusetts alumnus and Massachusetts native, will be opening her show "16/28: Years/Places" in the Hampden Gallery on Feb. 1. The exhibit comprises 16 black and white photographic self-portraits overlaid with satellite maps of the 16 places the artist has lived in her 28 years.

"The intent of this project," she writes on her webpage, "was to consider the effects of environment on who we become, while also emphasizing how much actually remains constant as time passes."

Though the individual portraits vary slightly in terms of facial expression, hairstyle and closeness, the continuity between frames overwhelms the dissimilarity imposed by the satellite maps on the portraits. In this way, the project seemingly articulates the fact that people remain the same at the core throughout their lives. Nason explains that, "as I began to work I realized it was more accurately about a lack of change. Place and experience shape me, but I move forward with the majority of my innate tendencies and sensibilities intact."

The piece deliberately accentuates the similarity throughout "16/28:Years/Places" to articulate a fundamental lack of change as a result of time and place. "This series attempts to address the rift

Gough brings 'everyday' art

By Heather Waxman
Collegian Staff

Timothy Gough was not your typical middle schooler. Instead of tackling his homework, he sat at his desk and fiddled around with anything he could get his hands on.

He removed the silver handles from a couple of binder clips, linked them together, and unveiled his very first sculpture. He didn't know it at the time, but this moment would later serve as an awakening.

"I remembered this discovery during my time as an undergrad [at the University of Massachusetts] and decided to explore it," Gough said.

The outcome of his pursuit has surfaced in his debut solo exhibition entitled "The Resulting Effect," which will debut at UMass' Hampden Gallery this Sunday.

Despite his knack for sculpting, Gough only developed the art bug a few years ago in 2005, when he transferred into UMass' art program.

"In hindsight, it could have been a disastrous move," said Gough. "I took a ceramics course my second semester as an art major and the professor, Nancy LaPointe, convinced me to focus on sculpture."

The age of the cyber-bully

By Melissa Healy
Los Angeles Times

Since emerging from the primordial ooze, parents have wrung their evolving appendages over ways to shield their offspring from hungry predators, lurking maniacs and strangers from without.

Again and again, they've learned, the threat to their children lies uncomfortably closer to home: Lion fathers would sooner eat their unprotected young than hunt wilier quarry; children pictured on milk cartons were more likely to have been snatched from home by a parent than by a stranger; day-care providers were less intent on molesting a child in their care than was, say, a live-in partner, an uncle or a trusted family friend.

It was a lesson brought home again in a recent report, when parents learned that the roughly six in 10 adolescents who socialize on the Internet have relatively little to fear from the faceless pervert lurking in the anonymity of cyberspace.

A Harvard University-led task force on Internet safety, ordered by the nation's attorneys general and meant to expose the full extent of the danger, found instead that kids trading gossip, photos and plans on social networking sites such as MySpace are relatively safe from adults cruising online for sex with minors.

The report, released Jan. 13, counters political calls to protective action with a generally upbeat look at the effectiveness of measures developed by Internet companies to protect kids from predatory strangers. And it douses parental fretting with research showing that few kids have been subject to such unwanted advances when socializing on sites aimed at the youth market.

Those findings come on the heels of several studies showing that online social networking appears to be a perfectly benign practice for the vast majority of kids, even for those most consumed by the pastime. After a steady diet of warnings that their children's growing Internet use is a likely cause of academic failure, attention disorders and obesity, a parent could be forgiven for welcoming the news with an audible sigh of relief.

Those parents might want to read to the report's end, however. The perpetrators of psychological wounds and the stalkers who would steal their kids' innocence are probably not strangers, the study reported; more likely, they are the spiteful, sulking or silly friends the kids hang out with. And parents' own offspring might play a significant role in the misbehavior, too.

Bullying and harassment, most often by peers, "are the most frequent threats that minors face," the report says. And although kids concede that minors routinely proposition other minors for sex on these sites, such incidents "are understudied, underreported to law enforcement, and are not part of most conversations about online safety," it adds.

"It's an important message for parents," says Katherine C. Cowan, communications director for the National Association of School Psychologists and, with four kids ages 17 to 24, a "grizzled veteran" of parenting teens. "Sure, there are crazy sexual predators out there. But the most common problem is kids being mean to each other, and 13-year-old girls posting naked pictures of themselves."

The highly publicized suicide of a Missouri teenager after a campaign of cyber-bullying has helped solidify parents' perceptions that malicious adults, not their own children, are the Internet's main threat.

The message that kids might be their own worst enemies on the Internet resonates with Anthony F. Wolf, a practicing clinical psychologist in Massachusetts and author of "Get Out of My Life, But First Could You Drive Cheryl and Me to the Mall?"

"What are the big problems in cyberspace?" he asks. "One definitely is the stuff that kids do to and with each other. Yes, there's cyber-bullying, but a pretty surprisingly high percentage of kids on the Internet are talking about drugs, sex and drinking in ways that are semi-innocent and not so innocent at all."

A survey conducted by the Center for the Digital Future at the University of Southern California's Annenberg School found that in 2006, 63 percent of parents surveyed believed there were "quite a few" sexual predators on MySpace.

More than perhaps any backyard conversations, "Dateline NBC's" widely seen series "To Catch a Predator" has done much to stoke parents' concerns. In it, a female decoy, by all appearances a young teen, responds to advances from adult men in a chat room. With astonishing brazenness, these men send lewd photographs of themselves, propose sex and, when encouraged by the decoy, show up at her door ready for an encounter with a girl they believe to be a minor.

During the confrontation the alleged predators have with "Dateline's" reporter and then with police squads standing by to arrest them, it remains unclear how many men who made chat room advances never showed up or might have melted away if the decoy had told them to get lost. While "Dateline" has won broad accolades for the popular show, it also has come in for criticism from civil rights advocates and journalistic watchdogs.

The new attorneys general task force report, 'Enhancing Child Safety & Online Technologies," found that most reports of online sexual predation predate the rise of social networking sites such as MySpace, Facebook and Friendster. And it found that most sexual fishing expeditions take place outside these networking sites, in chat rooms and online forums intended for adults.

MySpace is one of several websites that has led to an increase in online harrassment of young users.

Gough at Hamden

the field, Gough did not allow himself to feel belittled.

He viewed his inexperience as a unique asset – a way to stretch his audience across a broad spectrum.

"I feel that I can relate to the average person on the street who hasn't been formally trained to appreciate art," he said. "One of my highest priorities is to create work that is accessible to this particular audience ... I have to be able to please both crowds."

COURTESY TIMOTHY GOUGH

"The Resulting Effect" will open this Sunday and run through February 26.

Gough has put his best foot forward in order to accomplish this with "The Resulting Effect."

Over the past 18 months he has managed to create an array of sculptures that are made out of large quantities of everyday objects, such as nails and thumb tacks.

"Most folks don't know what 43,000 nails look like or what 36,000 thumb tacks look like," said Gough. "A large quantity of an object also lends itself to repetition and pattern, two characteristics that I find particularly appealing."

The artwork for this exhibit comes as a continuation of a series Gough completed for his 2007 thesis entitled "Alchemy," which consisted of four pieces on display at the Student Union Gallery.

"For the Hampden exhibit, I tried to create pieces that would be familiar to the folks who saw my first show as definitely Tim's work, while at the same time, retaining the shock of seeing something familiar in a new and exciting format," he said.

Timothy Gough's "The Resulting Effect" will be on display this Sunday at the Fine Arts Center's Hampden Art Gallery. The event is free and open to the public. The exhibit will run through February 26.

'Super' ads still pour it on

Popular spots feel pressure

By Rick Kushman
McClatchy Newspapers

There is good news and bad news about being a Super Bowl advertiser. The good part: People actually watch your ad. And the bad? People watch the ad.

If you think there's pressure on the Pittsburgh Steelers or the Arizona Cardinals in Sunday's Super Bowl, well, actually there is. But there's pressure on the advertisers, too. They pay $3 million for 30 seconds (ads on Puppy Bowl V cost considerably less; more on that later) and they face demanding viewer expectations.

Super Bowl XLIII officially starts at 6:18 p.m. EST (on NBC), but first it has to get through all the schmaltzy stuff – songs, flyover, coin toss, ritual sacrifice of a referee – so expect it closer to 6:30 p.m. And right after the kickoff, we get the first ad.

Is there any other time when a room of people – some of them tipsy already (I'm not condoning it, just being a realist) – will stop and hush to watch a TV commercial? TV ads are for using the restroom, unless you just TiVo them into the abyss.

But on Super Bowl Sunday, people watch closely, like they're feature films or O.J.'s first trial. So they'd better be good, and they'd better be funny. Or at least solid. What you really, really don't want is to be lame, because the entire country will make fun of your company for weeks.

COURTESY ANIMAL PLANET

Puppy Bowl V will be shown on a two-hour loop on Animal Planet opposite the Super Bowl between 3 p.m. and 5 a.m. this Sunday.

A few regular advertisers, like General Motors and FedEx, are not buying in for the game this year because of the economy, though GM is sponsoring some postgame activities. NBC is said to have had some trouble selling all its ad time, but the $3 million-for-30-seconds is a record, up from 2008's $2.7 million, so don't cry for NBC. (When you watch its prime time programming, that's a different story.)

Nonetheless, expect the usual abundance of beer, car and movie ads, led by Anheuser-Busch, which has bought the most commercial time for the past eight Super Bowls. This year, you know the entire country is holding its communal breath to see if Hank the Clydesdale is still on the team.

By most accounts, the TV ads are worth the cost. According to a report from the Nielsen Co., 2008 Super Bowl advertisers saw their Web traffic increase an average of 24 percent the day after the game, and general brand opinion of the advertisers went up 16 percent.

Performing at the game seems to be worth the effort, too. Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, the 2008 halftime show, saw sales of the band's "Greatest Hits" album increase by 196 percent in the week after the game, Nielsen said. This year's halftime act is Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band – and here's a coincidence, they have a new album out.

Nielsen also said – I kid you not – that people who call themselves avid NFL fans outspend the average American on skin care by 74 percent. I don't know why that's in the report. Don't know what it means. Just putting it out there.

Speaking of irrelevant, NBC's pregame shows start at noon. Somewhere in that vast stretch, Matt Lauer will interview President Barack Obama. It will be Obama's first TV interview since his inauguration. NBC just hopes it will get someone, anyone, to watch the pregame.

For people going to Super Bowl parties but who aren't crazed NFL fans – and thus use fewer skin-care products – here are some basics on the game, just to help you fit in.

The Pittsburgh Steelers are trying to be the first team to win six Super Bowls. The Arizona Cardinals have won more playoff games this season (three) than the franchise has won in nearly 60 years.

The Steelers are an iconic franchise, known for toughness and defense (they're the NFL's best defensive team this season). The Cardinals have bright-red uniforms.

The Steelers are the favorites by about a 'ouchdown, but most fans hope the game will stay close, at least until the fourth quarter, when the beer, wine and food – and mostly the beer and wine – kind of make it not matter anymore.

(By the way, that's why few new ads run in the fourth quarter. Not even for beer.)

The game will be played at the Raymond James Stadium in Tampa, Fla. No one knows who Raymond James is. Apparently, it's a financial planning firm, and according to its Web site, its business is people.

Last year's Super Bowl drew a record 97.5 million viewers, and about two-thirds of the TVs in use in America were tuned to the game. As for the other one-third? A couple million were on Animal Planet's adorable and fuzzy bit of counter programming, the Puppy Bowl.

I am, as you may know, a fan of the Puppy Bowl, and I'm a particular fan of the water-bowl cam, which gives close-ups of puppy noses. What other sport gets you that kind of cuteness?

If you've never seen it, Animal Planet puts this thing on a two-hour loop (starting at 3 p.m., ending at 5 a.m.) and there isn't much more to it than puppies romping and chewing and doing puppy things.

Animal Planet also supplies plenty of pet-adoption information, which is a nice addition. The NFL does not give any details if, say, you wanted to adopt a player.

And as always, I've done some pregame scouting to see who'll show up ready to play on Sunday. I'm picking Buster, Alex and Griffey, but do not count out Gypsy or, of course, Moose.

between one's experience of place, and the detached objectivity of documents that describe only its physical characteristics." Further, she writes that "the use of only black and white film for the self-portraits, as well as the absence of significant variation of facial expression, suggests limited personal change, while the overlaid color satellite maps point to the place where physical location meets personal experience."

Curator Anne LaPrade Seuthe explains that what drew her to Nason's work were the "visually gripping" qualities of her work that invite the viewer to further explore the "underlying conceptual concerns of the artist." Interestingly, the clean lines and understated sharpness of the images seem to contradict the obscurity and fluidity of the ideas she seeks to examine. Like many of her other works, including "Obsolete Communication (Sending a Telegram)," where an electrical telegraph is arranged on a table, she deals with abstract themes but in visually plain terms.

Nason's other piece, "Cold Storage," which will be shown in conjunction with "16/28" and Tim Gough's exhibit "The Resulting Effect" at the Hampden Gallery, similarly deals with occasional divergent themes of physical and emotional experience. "This installation," Nason writes, "deals with memories and their gradual transition from 'cold storage' to present experience."

It is striking that two exhibits showing at the same time in the same place and by the same artist can deal with such paradoxical aspects of human nature. While on one hand "16/28" suggests that very little changes with time, "Cold Storage" emphasizes the creeping nature of personal development and the consciousness, or acceptance of memory. "These building blocks of our person" she writes, "surprise us, like chunks of foundation suddenly exposed."

One wonders whether the significance of the 16 places in Nason's 28 years will ultimately thaw into full flavor, or whether they will remain in their neat trays in the freezer of the artist's consciousness.

Kristin Nason's "16/28: Years/Places"and "Cold Storage" will both be on display this Sunday at the Fine Arts Center's Hampden Art Gallery. The event is free and open to the public. The exhibit will tentatively run through Feb. 28.

Spring season opens for Dixon, UMass

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

While most will be preparing for the festivities on "Superbowl Sunday", the Massachusetts women's tennis team will look to begin its 2009 spring campaign with a strong start.

One thing is for sure, the Minutewomen will be tested right away in their spring opener against Long Island – especially without freshman Magdalena Ploch and senior Stephanie Gimenez who will both be unable to play.

Ploch will be sitting out the match due to a minor NCAA violation, while Gimenez is recovering from a broken elbow from a bicycle accident. UMass coach Judy Dixon spoke to the significance of losing Ploch and Gimenez for the upcoming match.

"Truthfully, I'm not sure what to expect. The first match will be a real test of where we are and where we need to go next," Dixon said. "We are playing this match without one of our top players [Ploch]. That means the rest of the team has to step up for sure. We have to go deeper in our lineup, there's no wiggle room in this match because we don't have everyone healthy."

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

The Minutewomen will be without both Magdalena Ploch, pictured, and Stephanie Gimenez this weekend for their spring season opener against Long Island.

After a 2008 season filled with streaks, the Minutewomen finished the year in disappointing fashion, losing to Xavier in the semifinal round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. Gone from last season are seniors Masha Pozar, Sarah Jackson and Kristin DiPiero. Sophomores Candynce Boney, Kaitlyn Carpenter and Tanisha Hodgson will have increased roles and responsibility this year as they look to improve from their rookie seasons.

"We are better than last year's team for the reason that we had three freshmen in the starting six. Those freshmen are now a year older, they are more match tough and are more focused in their intention," Dixon said. "I think their improvement will be reflective of how we play."

Seniors Gimenez, Lauren MacKay and Laura Danai will be relied on heavily to lead, especially while the team is not at full strength.

"We are stronger because our senior leaders are very competitive and they lead by example. I got a taste of this when we played Connecticut in the fall, also without [Ploch], when we beat a very good team," Dixon said.

In its only dual match of the fall season, UMass won its fifth consecutive match over rival UConn by a 5-2 final. The Minutewomen took four of six singles matches and swept doubles for the win.

Long Island looks to avenge its 6-1 weekend series loss last March. The Minutewomen won all but one of their singles matches and took two of three doubles games to earn the victory.

However, UMass can't take LIU lightly, especially this early in the season.

"They are a tough team in that they fight hard and their results are good," Dixon said. "I believe we are favored so the pressure is on us but because it's the first match of the year, anything can happen."

Track teams head to Boston

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Correspondent

After qualifying seven athletes for the IC4A Championships last week at the Terrier Invitational, the Massachusetts track and field teams are looking to make their presence felt once again at Friday's Boston Games.

The men's team will travel to the Reggie Lewis Center on the campus of Roxbury Community College to compete against athletes from all across the globe. The Minutemen have high expectations for this year's competition following an Atlantic-10 Championship in cross-country and a third place finish (out of 11 teams) in last year's games.

Junior Tyler Cotto, who qualified for the IC4A Championships with a time of 7.74 seconds in the 55 meter hurdles, is looking for a repeat of his second-place finish in last years Boston Games. At last year's games, Cotto finished with a time of 7.73 seconds. Junior Jonathan Pierce is also hoping to make another strong impact after taking first place at last years games with a time of 15 minutes, 9.66 seconds in the 5,000 meters.

The women's team hopes to build off its own strong showing at the Great Dane Classic as they also travel to Roxbury for the Reebok Games.

After starting the season off with a disappointing last place finish at Boston University, the Minutewomen rebounded with an impressive fifth place finish (out of 30 teams) last week in New York City. Redshirt sophomore distance runner Shiyi Zan paced the Minutewomen with 10 of the team's 55 points.

Led by graduate Danielle Bolt, the Minutewomen finished fifth in a field of 13 teams at last year's Reebok Games. Looking to fill the void left by Bolt are Zan and senior Kristen Bakanowski. Zan finished 11th last year in the one-mile run, but looks much improved and confident after last week's performance. Bakanowski took fifth in the pole vault at last year's meet and was also part of a distance medley team which placed third with a time of 12:29:49.

The Reebok Boston Indoor Games have been home to some of the most recognized athletes and achievements in the history of indoor track and field.

The women's field is touting the return of Ethiopian sensation Tirunesh Dibaba. Dibaba, 23, is coming off two gold medal performances at the 2008 Beijing Olympics (5,000 and 10,000 meters). American Jenn Stuczynski, the other female Olympian at the competition, was a silver medalist in the pole vault at the 2008 Games after clearing 15 feet 9 inches.

The men's division is headlined by 2008 Olympians Steve Hooker of Australia and Nick Willis of New Zealand. Hooker won a gold medal in the pole vault, while Willis took home the silver in the 1,500 meters. Hooker is recognized by some as the greatest pole vaulter in Australian history after setting the Olympic record of 5.96 meters in 2008. Willis is known for winning a gold medal in the 2006 Commonwealth Games.

A Letter From UMass Hockey Coach Don "Toot" Cahoon

Dear UMass Hockey Fans:

On behalf of the hockey team we would like to thank all of our fans, particularly the student body, for your fantastic support this year. The attendance, spirit and enthusiasm have been outstanding and we appreciate your support. With your continued loyalty we have an opportunity to have a tremendous season in Hockey East, the premier hockey conference in the country. The environment you create at the Mullins Center can be one of the best in our league, if not the country, and we thank you for that.

At times, however, some of our cheers have not reflected the sportsmanship, class and originality that we know you have. Using vulgar and offensive chants is not what we should be about. Remember, families with kids love to attend the games too. Let's keep it fun for everyone. Try to imagine that your younger brother, sister, niece, nephew or next door neighbor's child was sitting beside you at the game. Let's not set a bad example for them.

We are YOUR hockey team and we will play with heart, drive and intensity to represent you with class. Please do the same. We love your support, so let's do it the right way. Be loud, be original, be there in the thousands and be good fans! Remember, we have the biggest facility in the league. We don't need to swear to make it the toughest place to play in Hockey East.

Thanks again for your support. See you at the game!

Don "Toot" Cahoon

Fordham next on board vs. UMass

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

As the season comes closer to its end, the Massachusetts swimming and diving teams will head to New York this weekend to face Fordham. It will be the last dual meet for the Minutemen, and second-to-last meet before the annual Atlantic 10 Championship.

UMass tends to meet this conference rival late in each season. The men's team is 3-0 in the past three years against the Rams, winning each by at least a 70- point margin. However, the women's team has struggled in the past few years: The Minutewomen have lost two of the last three meetings.

The UMass men's swimmers are confident heading into the meet against Fordham. The Minutemen, 5-1 in dual meets this year, began the season with an already impressive swimming roster, and has only grown stronger as the freshman class has become more experienced.

Freshman standout Joey Sbordon was honored once again this past week with an A-10 Rookie of the Week Award, this time for his performance in the UMass victories against Boston College and Colgate last weekend.

The diving team also has high hopes for this weekend. In 3-meter diving, the UMass men's diving team has four out of the top seven scores in the A-10 this season. Fordham has one.

The women's diving team, led by senior Karen Upperco, has performed well this season. Upperco has been tough to beat, posting the A-10s best score in the 3-meter event. UMass has also won both diving events in each of the past four meets.

But if the women's team is looking to win this weekend, the swimmers will likely need to clinch a few winning spots. In last year's meeting, UMass could only account for two wins in the swimming events. Senior Kathryne Chalikis and junior Elizabeth Walsh, the only winners last year, will look to be the team's top competitors once again this time around.

Although every win is important, the Minutewomen (4-3) won't let a loss to Fordham deflate their spirits. In the past two seasons, the Rams won both dual meets, but UMass finished higher in the A-10 Championship.

UMass and Fordham had only two mutual opponents this season: Boston College and Stony Brook. The Minutemen won all four contests, while the Fordham men's team dropped a meet only to Boston College.

Fordham will look to be the underdog in the men's meet this weekend, but will be the favorite in the women's. The Rams have their fair share of competitive swimmers, sweeping the A-10 swimming awards during the first week of December. Sophomore Billy Colton and Caitlin Napoli were named A-10 Top Performers, while freshman Sean McManus and Courtney Collyer were nominated as A-10 Rookie of the Week.

UMass hosts Lisch, SLU in A–10 tilt

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

In the midst of a season-high four-game losing streak, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will host Saint Louis Saturday as the team looks to move out of the basement of the Atlantic 10 standings.

UMass (8-12, 1-4 A-10) has struggled since entering conference play and is currently going through its roughest stretch of the season, thanks to a combination of poor shooting performances and strong competition in Boston College and A-10 front runner Xavier.

"I think that it's about us being able to rebound the ball and not give up [offensive rebounds] and take care of the ball," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "And I think that's been our focus all year, though we haven't been able to put 35 minutes of basketball together yet."

P.J. STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Point guard Kim Benton and the Minutewomen sit in a three-way tie for 10th place in the Atlantic 10. UMass hosts Saint Louis Saturday for the chance to move up in the standings.

Meanwhile, the A-10 has been much more welcoming to the Billikens (9-11, 3-2 A-10) who are 5-2 in their last seven games, including a 75-72 win over Saint Joseph's and a 77-73 overtime win at La Salle.

Saint Louis' recent success has hinged greatly upon the outstanding play of junior guard Theresa Lisch. Lisch, the leading scorer in the A-10 with 20.8 points per game, will be the focal point defensively for the Minutewomen.

"We really have to design some defenses to contain Lisch and make everybody else score and kind of limit her touches. So we're going to have to use multiple bodies, Sakera Young, Diatiema [Hill] and Alesia Howard."

The Billikens not only have the advantage over the Minutewomen in terms of size, but also boast considerable depth inside in addition to junior standout Amanda Kemezys. The 6-foot-4 center is averaging 12.2 points and 6.6 rebounds per game.

However, Dacko trusts that her team can employ their speed to matchup against the larger SLU squad. But, she also knows that UMass' post players, specifically sophomore Teya Wright, will play an enormous role in the game.

"I think we have quickness on them, we've got speed on them and I think we've got to defend the post," she said. "So I think that the biggest thing is that we've got to keep our bigs in the game by playing aggressive defense. They may have size, but we have to play them early."

UMass' post play is almost entirely hinged upon the play of Wright, who is by far the best option inside for the Minutewomen. Although Wright remains the team's third-leading scorer and most prolific rebounder, she has struggled as of late, often as a result of foul trouble.

"For me, individually, I have to work on staying in the game," Wright said, referring to her penchant to get into foul trouble. "I have to work on defense in the post, because that's where I get most of my fouls."

Wright, who is seventh in the A-10 in rebounds per game (7.7) and second in offensive rebounds per game (3.4), has been limited to an average of four rebounds, 17.7 minutes and 2.7 points over the last three games.

"I've been in the gym, working on cardio, working on shooting, working on not fouling and staying in games," she said. "My coach is constantly helping me, telling me what to do, the good things, always encouraging me."

Saturday's matchup will mark the first game for the Minutewomen since the start of the spring semester at UMass. Over the break, Dacko kept her players busy by doing community service and maintaining regular practices.

Unlike other coaches, though, Dacko prefers the team to be in the class environment. She feels that, during break, the players simply had too much time on their hands and would perform better once they returned to their normal schedule.

"They're better in a structured environment and they did very well academically," Dacko said. "It gives them a reason to break for practice and they're hungrier for practice, so we've got to get back into this routine."

Ski teams set for N.H.

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Correspondent

With two meets in the same weekend for the first time this season, Massachusetts men's and women's ski team coach Skip Fox will try to use this weekend as a test of where they are with just three weeks remaining until ECSC Regionals.

Ranking third and fifth place respectively, the Minutemen and Minutewomen hope to position themselves well with just two more weekends of competitions left before the fast approaching ECSC Regionals which take place at the last two weekends of February.

Saturday, both teams will participate in the Giant Slalom in Lincoln, N.H., which will be hosted by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The University of Massachusetts ski teams both hope to better position themselves for the regionals with a solid showing this weekend. Although the men's team is far from being in danger of falling out of the top five of the conference, Fox has his eyes on the rest of the competitions.

"We're very close to both Plymouth State and Colby-Sawyer in the standings, so this is a good opportunity," he said.

With the same number of victories as the two teams in front, the Minutemen hope they can get some separation from their conference foes. Last weekend was a good step in that direction, as they earned a first-place finish at the MIT Carnival.

Co-captain Andrew Hawes will look to pick up where he left off last weekend, where he finished first in the Slalom race on Saturday. His time of 1:26:07 led the Minutemen, and his fourth-place finish on Sunday was just one of many strong contributions which led to a first-place victory for the Minutemen.

Junior Matthew Small has also been a key factor in the Minutemen's recent success. He's had top-five finishes in three of his last four races.

"I want the team to go out and fight hard and get another victory," he said.

The Minutewomen are in what Fox described as a "precarious" position as they head into the weekend. After a fourth-place finish in the Giant Slalom last weekend, the Minutewomen hope to cement their position as they head towards the regionals.

The Minutewomen will be without one of their leaders, junior co-captain Ashley Hawes, who suffered a severe ACL injury last weekend. She will miss the rest of the season. Junior Emily Shilletto and sophomore Jamie Taloumis had strong showings last weekend, as the team collectively will have to step up in Hawes's absence. Sitting right below the Minutewomen in the standings is local rival Smith College in sixth place.

Science building opens doors

UMass students began using the $92 million state-of-the-art facility earlier this semester

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Another step in the wave of building projects on campus has been completed, as the $92 million Integrated Sciences Building opened for classes this semester.

The building, located between the Worcester Dining Hall and the Morill Science Center, is a state-of-the-art facility in nearly every respect, from the use of Green technology to the auditorium projection system to the laboratory design. The building will be the new home for undergraduate chemistry, biology and animal science classes, as well as some research labs.

The building is the end product of years of collaboration and input from science professors across campus. When creating the space, designers paid attention to streamlining according to the needs of professors and students.

For example: "In Morill you used to have to push a cart down hall, down elevator, then down another hall," said Biology Lab Coordinator Kate Dorfman. "Now there are prep rooms next to every lab." "The building is pretty much what we asked for," said senior chemistry lecturer Thom Whalen, "now it's up to us to use it."

The four-story tall building encompasses 155,000 square feet. While it looks relatively plain from the side facing North Pleasant Street, the modern style of the building is evident from when you first step inside the door, and the back side of the building faces a landscaped courtyard. There are windows and natural lighting everywhere, which gives the building a very open feeling.

"There are a lot of green elements in the building," said Jim Hunt, communications manager for Facilities and Campus Planning, like "reusing rain water, in cooling systems instead of running it off. Heat exchanges and ventilation systems are super efficient and state-of-the-art."

Hunt also noted the use of passive solar in the building, which has a south-facing solarium and the extensive use of materials like bamboo, which have great longevity and are eco-friendly.

The centerpiece of the building is its technologically advanced 300-seat auditorium. It was designed to seem much smaller than it actually is. Instead of the tight, cramped spaces in some large lecture halls on campus, each seat has plenty of arm and leg room. Each seat also has its own power outlet and internet hook-up. The room features dual projectors, which can be split into four screens if necessary, in addition to more traditional chalkboards. There is a close-up camera at the instructors table that can project an experiment going on at the front of the room, or a close up of instructors notes.

There is another classroom that seats 85 and incorporates a number of the same spacing and technological elements.

Whalen obviously takes a lot of pride in the new building.

"What large research university has a building just for students?" he said. "This is not a building that was built for something else and then renovated for students."

"Before, if you were giving a friend a tour of the chemistry department, there may have been parts you tried to gloss over, but not now," said Whalen.

The high-tech equipment is good news for students, who will be learning to use instruments currently used in research laboratories in professional settings.

Dorfman said where she used to have one set-up in one room to teach "sterile technique" to biology students, she now has four in a single room. There are also advanced imagine laboratories and other specialized microscopes.

The lab spaces also feature a number of updates designed to make the best use of the space. The labs contain the same basic element as those in Goessman and the Lederle Graduate Research Tower, but have been redesigned to make the space seem much smaller than it actually is.

But integrated does not just mean chemistry and biology in one building, the professors are just as excited about collaboration across departments.

"I hope the fact we're across the hall creates collaboration that was completely impossible before," said Dorfman. "Before if you had an idea and needed to talk to someone in the chemistry department you could call them up, but now you can just walk across the hall."

Whalen was equally excited about the prospect of integration.

In addition to advanced laboratory spaces, there are a number of places around the building

DEA denies marijuana plan

By Jessica Sacco
Collegian Staff

Unknown to most students, some of their professors have been advocating the growing of marijuana on campus since 2001.

This movement took a blow earlier this month when the Drug Enforcement Administration rejected University of Massachusetts professor Lyle Craker's request to become a marijuana manufacturer on Jan. 12.

Craker, a horticulturist in the Department of Plant, Soil and Insect sciences submitted his application in 2001 to receive a license to grow large amounts of marijuana in a controlled environment to further study its effects for medical use.

At the time, he stated that the marijuana currently available for such research was inadequate, and that more uniform and better quality material would be needed.

If approved, findings from clinical studies, which would use the product created by Craker, could then be presented to the Food and Drug Administration. The FDA has the power to recommend medical marijuana as a legal drug.

Craker has received support from a number of people in his department. He has also found support among government workers, including a federal administrative law judge in 2007 and Massachusetts Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry, as well as other members of Congress.

With lawyers still studying the ruling, it is unclear as to whether or not the issue will be taken outside the DEA and into other courts, where he can continue work on receiving a license.

"We have a battle in this world over science and politics," said Craker. "I want science to prevail. I want to test this material."

Today, marijuana is legally grown at a number of tightly controlled labs including at the University of Mississippi; however, during his initial application in 2001, Craker claimed that the drug produced there was insufficient for clinical studies.

Since then, Mississippi has improved their material. "They've had seven or eight years to do it," said Craker.

Lyle Craker of the Department of Plant, Soil and Insect sciences.

UMass sophomores Chris Fleming and Kyle Lafata both believe that allowing marijuana to be used for research in the medical field would be taking a step in the right direction.

"If doctors feel it [marijuana] is more potent in keeping people comfortable, then an alternative route like this might be more realistic," said Lafata. "You can never know what can happen until the research is done though."

Marijuana is being used today to help glaucoma patients, cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy, aids therapy, and even to reduce blood pressure. But without approval from the Food and Drug Administration, marijuana will continue to remain illegal in federal law.

Fleming believes that those who are opposed to allowing research to be done on marijuana are naïve in believing they can prevent it from happening forever.

"I don't think people should oppose it just because they don't agree with it," he said. "It has no effect on them or their life. Some people like to drink, some people don't. Everyone likes things different ways."

Craker said he hears from many people asking why marijuana can't be prescribed as a drug. "They ask 'why do I have to go to the back alley to get it.'

"All we want to do is investigate it [marijuana], isn't that what we do in America?" he added. "I'm not in favor of it recreationally, but I think it deserves to be tested for medical purposes."

Curves could benefit health

Researchers claim that having a bigger behind may be healthy.

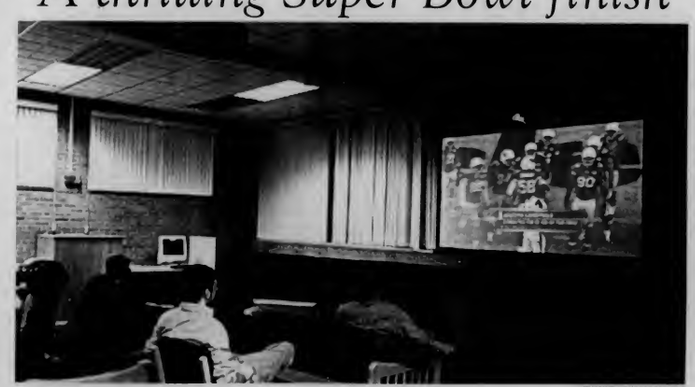
Collegian Staff



A common complaint concerning American society, at least among college students, is it's apparent obsession with an unreal conception of the human anatomy.In the interest of greater populous health, however, this obsession with the infirm may be on the outs. Curves may be coming back.

A recent study Harvard study by professor C. Ronald Kahn has uncovered groundbreaking new information concerning the subcutaneous fat stored in the thighs and buttocks.

Kahn found that mice, injected in high diabetes risk regions, mainly abdomen fatty deposits, with butt fat, showed "lower insulin levels, and had better insulin sensitivity," said Kahn according to a Harvard Crimson interview. "Moving fat under the skin and hips … actually improved metabolism."The relationship is not with couches and rugs where students can take a break and relax. There will even be a cafeteria space in the central area of the building that will serve coffee and some food.

"We're hoping that if you did have a class here you might come here anyway," said Whalen.

The building still has six to eight weeks before the contractors have completely cleared out, and departments will be moving in to the building throughout the semester, said Hunt.

The new biology lab has adjustable height tables, which Dorfman says will be useful since anticipating the needs of the future is not always possible. The lab also has new microscopes and 24-inch iMac computers. The new setup will allow biology students to create online portfolios of their work.

The prospect for the future uses of the building are still forming, but Whalen was eager to explain what you can do at the Integrated Sciences Building that could not be done before at the UMass

"Dream it," he said.

Mormon church reveals deeper involvement in Calif.'s Prop 8

BY SHANE GOLDMACHER
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — The Mormon church has revealed in a campaign filing that the church spent nearly $190,000 to help pass Proposition 8, the November ballot measure that banned gay marriage in California.

The disclosure comes amid an investigation by the state's campaign watchdog agency into whether the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints violated state laws by not fully disclosing its involvement during the campaign.

While many church members had donated directly to the Yes on 8 campaign, some estimates of Mormon giving range as high as $20 million, the church itself had previously reported little direct campaign activity.

But in the filing made Friday, the Mormon church reported thousands in travel expenses, such as airline tickets, hotel rooms and car rentals for the campaign. The church also reported $96,849.31 worth of "compensated staff time," hours that church employees spent working to pass the same-sex marriage ban.

"As I read this report, it seems to raise more questions than it answers," said Fred Karger, who filed the initial complaint against the church with the Fair Political Practices Commission in November.

Karger, the founder of Californians Against Hate, a group that opposed the measure, said he believes the church was involved financially long before the first expenditure it listed in September.

"I think there is still a lot of missing parts of the report because we know they've been active since June," Karger said.

Mormon church officials could not be reached Saturday for comment.

Roman Porter, executive director of the FPPC, confirmed that the agency was investigating the complaint against the church but declined comment on specifics.

The Yes on 8 campaign filed its own expenditure reports over the weekend revealing that the main arm of the campaign spent more than $39.2 million. Total spending among the various proponents topped $41 million.

Opponents of the measure had not filed their disclosure statement as of Saturday. The deadline for year-end statements is midnight Monday.

The Mormon church's involvement in Proposition 8 touched off controversy both during and after the campaign.

Many gay marriage advocates saw the church and its membership's efforts as crucial to the passage of Proposition 8. The measure won with 52 percent of the vote, a margin of 600,000 votes.

Following the election, church leaders in the Sacramento region hired extra security to guard a Mormon temple in Folsom. Ten local church buildings were vandalized in the two weeks following the Nov. 4 vote.

Some individual Mormons were targeted for their support of Proposition 8, as well. Scott Eckern, an LDS member, resigned as artistic director of the California Musical Theatre in Sacramento in November after a $1,000 donation he made to the Yes on 8 campaign was made public. There were similar cases elsewhere in the state.

The Yes on 8 campaign petitioned a federal court to withhold disclosure of late donors, citing such harassment. But the judge ruled last week the donors must be disclosed.

"The court finds the state is not facilitating retaliation by compelling disclosure," U.S. District Judge Morrison England Jr. said in his decision Thursday.

Jeff Flint, a strategist for the Yes on 8 campaign, downplayed the latest financial filing that details the Mormon church's efforts to ban gay marriage.

"I don't think anybody beyond rabid opponents of Proposition 8 will consider it newsworthy to find out that leaders of the Mormon church spent time on the campaign," Flint said.

He noted that the church was both public and vocal about its support for the same-sex marriage ban.

Flint said the Mormon church's reported direct spending amounted to "half of 1 percent of all campaign expenditures."

All told, Proposition 8 was the most expensive ballot fight last November. It is considered the most expensive campaign over a social issue in history. And it could all be repeated as early as next year, as some gay marriage advocates are pressing efforts to legalize same-sex marriage in a 2010 ballot campaign if court efforts to overturn Proposition 8 are unsuccessful.

Skydiver dies in mid-air

BY MATT GARFIELD AND CLEVE R. WOOTSON JR.
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

CHESTER, S.C. — A first-time skydiver was able to steer safely to the ground Saturday afternoon after his 49-year-old instructor died of an apparent midair heart attack.

The first-timer, described as an active U.S. military member, took over and made a safe landing after the instructor lost consciousness, authorities said.

The pair were attached to the same parachute in a form of skydiving known as a tandem jump, in which instructors are strapped to the backs of their students.

The instructor, George C. "Chip" Steele of Sumter, S.C., became unresponsive in the final moments of a six-minute jump, well after he had pulled the rip cord, authorities said.

Steele's mother, Betty Steele, said the Chester County coroner's office gave this account from the surviving jumper: "A few minutes out of the jump, he said something to Chip, and he didn't answer. And he said something again and he didn't answer. He noticed when he looked at it that his head was slumped.

"He landed safely ... and applied CPR, but it was too late. Chip was already gone."

Too much time had likely elapsed for CPR to do any good, said Chester County Deputy Coroner Keith Hudson.

Authorities did not immediately release the student's name. But Hudson credited the first-timer for keeping composure. He said the man is in his 30s.

"He kept control," Hudson said. "His military experience helped him out a lot as far as making it to the ground safely."

Steele worked for Skydive Carolina, a business located at the Chester County Airport since 1986. He had made thousands of jumps over a lengthy career, said general manager James LaBarrie.

"There was no equipment malfunction whatsoever," LaBarrie said of Saturday's incident. "From what we understand, the instructor evidently had something go wrong medically."

Steele, who grew up on his family's farm in Sumter, had been skydiving since before his mother could remember. He was exposed to skydiving in the military decades ago, and the extreme sport became his passion.

"He absolutely loved it," Betty Steele said late Saturday.

Until about three months ago, Chip Steele worked at Strong Enterprises in Orlando, Fla., helping to build and test parachutes for private and military use, Betty Steele said. She remembered her son calling her excitedly one day, saying he'd driven a Jeep attached to a parachute off the back of a plane.

But the company cut back in the tough economy, she said, and her son was laid off. He returned to the farm in Sumter and took the job with Skydive Carolina, helping inexperienced jumpers.

"He loved people," Betty Steele said. "He had a passion for flying."

This was Skydive Carolina's second death in its 23-year history, LaBarrie said. The other occurred in 1989, when a 42-year-old man died after he apparently failed to open either his main or reserve chute. Investigators said that incident did not involve faulty equipment.

Instructors at Skydive Carolina are required to have regular medical checkups, LaBarrie said.

Tandem jumping is the company's most popular program for beginners, according to its Web site. Divers take a 45-minute safety course before boarding an aircraft.

Once at an altitude of 13,500 feet, divers jump in two-person harnesses with their instructors.

"You will accelerate to over 120 miles per hour for up to 60 seconds," the Web site says. Participants then pull a rip cord and are in flight for about five minutes.

In these jumps, divers can reach up to a pair of controls known as toggles to turn the rectangular canopies and slow down as they near the ground. But it's also possible to land without using the toggles, LaBarrie said.

It was unclear how much maneuvering the first-timer did in this case, he said.

Students react to 'butt study'

yet fully understood, but so far the data seems to show that this lower body fat could be good for you.

Kahn is now trying "to show if transplanting fat would actually protect you against diabetes or bad effects of obesity even if you're on a high-fat diet," he said.

He thinks that having a "pear-shaped" body might benefit health. Yet, even with this newfound health information, students at the University of Massachusetts are reluctant to sacrifice their looks in the interest of their health.

When asked whether she would gain lower body weight for her health, sophomore English major Amy Rafferty replied that though "curves are good, I ... wouldn't purposefully make my butt fat, I feel like there has to be other ways."

Other students had similar reactions. Rebecca Reddish, a sophomore anthropology major, said it would be "so much easier" if curves came back, but if asked to gain weight, would probably "only go halfsies."

Pre-dental major Ashley Walter, a sophomore who said she likes that her "boyfriend has a big [butt]," would only gain the weight if "it looked healthy, like athletic."

Though none of the girls questioned were at high risk for diabetes, Reddish pointed out how her her reaction is probably different than, say, a person with diabetes.

Sophomore Dante DeMaio, a Isenberg School of Management major, said he has had diabetes since March, 2005. He said he has expressed interest in taking part in high risk experiments that might cure his diabetes, even if death is a risk.

But when asked whether or not he would assume noticeable curves for the sake of a cure, DeMaio replied "Honestly, no ... maybe if I was retired and an old grandpa, and it looked like there would never be another cure, then I would do it, but not right now."

He and some other diabetics have set their eyes on stem cell research's horizon.

"With [President Barack] Obama's promotion of stem cell research, I wouldn't want big [buttocks]," he said. "They're so close."

Though it may be a health benefit, it seems many at UMass are resistant to pear-shaped bodies. "It's very hard for people to control their fat distribution," Phillip Gorden, the once director of the National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases, said. "What they can control is the quantity of fat."

Japanese seek strong satellites

THE YOMIURI SHIMBUN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

TOKYO — Aiming to drastically beef up the performance of the nation's intelligence satellites, the government of Japan will embark on a research and development program in fiscal year 2009 to develop an optical information-gathering satellite that will have one of the world's highest resolutions.

The envisioned satellite will be able to identify objects on the ground with far greater precision than the most advanced commercial satellites, officials said Saturday.

The best among currently available commercial surveillance satellites is said to be able to identify objects with a diameter of as little as 40 centimeters.

The government program is aimed at surpassing the 40-centimeter resolution capability.

Although detailed capabilities of military satellites of foreign countries are secret, only U.S. satellites are believed to have a sub-40-centimeter resolution.

Under the R&D program for the ultra-high-resolution satellite, a demonstration satellite is scheduled to be launched in fiscal year 2012 to ascertain its performance in space, they said.

A full-fledged optical information-collecting satellite with the envisaged cutting-edge optical capability will be put into orbit in fiscal year 2014, officials said on condition of anonymity.

The program is designed to greatly boost the capability of Japan's intelligence satellite on the strength of the enactment in May of the Basic Law on Space, which empowered the government to utilize space for defense purposes.

Before the enactment of the law, information-gathering satellites were limited to nonmilitary uses because of a resolution in 1969 that restricted the utilization of space to peaceful purposes. Because of this restriction, development of a satellite utilizing a higher level of technology than that used for making ordinary commercial ones was forbidden.

The satellite, called Optical No. 5, is planned to be launched in fiscal year 2014.

The Cabinet Satellite Intelligence Center, in charge of operating information-gathering satellites and analyzing their imagery, has incorporated 6.8 billion yen into its budgetary demand for fiscal year 2009 for funding research into the development of Optical No. 5. The research will focus on ways of enhancing the satellite's resolution and improving the brightness of images. In addition, 3.3 billion yen will separately be allocated for the development of the demonstration satellite, according to the officials.

Japan currently has four information-gathering satellites: two optical satellites, which take photos of ground objects by means of visible light using high-tech digital cameras; and two radar satellites, which use radio waves to collect data on objects, enabling them to "see" through cloud or in darkness. The optical satellites currently in operation have a resolution of about one meter.

After the constraints on space development were lifted with the enactment of the Basic Law on Space, the Defense Ministry announced a "basic outline for a space development strategy" on Jan. 16.

"By bolstering the performance of the nation's intelligence satellites," the outline said, "this country should further enhance the quality and quantity of image information that can be acquired by the satellites."

No more free coffee for Harvard students

BY SHAN WANG
HARVARD CRIMSON

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Sleepy students looking for their weekly Friday dose of free coffee from Harvard's Barker Center Café will instead now be greeted by a sign that reads: "We regret that the current financial climate does not allow us to continue to fund the free coffee program."

The passing of the program, formerly sponsored by the office of the dean of arts and humanities, has drawn questions from Barker regulars, according to café supervisor Dorothy "Dottie" A. Melin, though most appeared to take the cut in stride.

"A majority of the people who come here are very nice and very understanding," Melin said. "Although a couple of people, and I'd say three so far, have had some hot feelings," she said.

According to Melin, many café-goers have inquired over the disappearance but were still willing to pay for their coffees. "But in this scary time you just can't buy things every day, and that includes coffee," Melin said.

Sociology graduate students Ethan A. Fosse and Nathan E. Fosse said they were unnerved by the language of the sign. "Harvard's endowment is still huge, even though it is shrinking," Ethan Fosse said. "It would be great if they were more transparent about where the money they cut was going."

Nathan Fosse said he was "very surprised" by the elimination of free morning coffee.

"Mentioning the 'current financial climate' just adds to this culture of austerity," Nathan Fosse said. "I can still pay two dollars for the coffee, but this still sends a strong message, and it concerns me."

The coffee cut joins a long list of cost-reduction measures implemented at Harvard's schools as they struggle to reduce budgets in the wake of an unprecedented drop in the endowment.

The Barker Center Café initially served free coffee from Starbucks Monday through Friday once at 9 a.m. and again at 3 p.m. But two years ago, the cafe restricted free coffee to 9 a.m. and later to only Fridays.

"Harvard's the richest place around here," Melin said. "If they can't even afford the coffee, it makes us wonder, you know."

Diabetes cure explored

BY JOSEPHINE MARCOTTY
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

MINNEAPOLIS — The descendents of Abraham are ready.

They were born inside a cinderblock bubble in an anonymous building surrounded by fields in western Wisconsin.

Raised on sterilized food and filtered air, they have never seen the sun, felt the rain, or been exposed to the germs known to make swine or people sick.

This dynasty of pigs, which began with a boar named Abraham, has the same little eyes and floppy ears as those that become bacon and pork chops. But these are destined for a different service to humanity, to provide insulin-producing cells for people who have diabetes.

All they need are the humans.

After decades of research and debate about the ethics and safety of putting living animal tissue into people, the first of such clinical research trials are within sight.

Researchers at the Mayo Clinic and at the University of Minnesota have been studying the problem for a decade or more, and say now they will be among the first to propose transplanting living pig tissue into humans.

Minnesota, as a result, has become the global epicenter for a unique type of medical-grade pig, animals raised in bioscure environments that insulate them from the infectious agents that have thwarted such transplants in the past.

"We have a lot of pig wisdom and expertise" in Minnesota, said Bernhard Hering, a university diabetes researcher who has been studying animal-to-human transplantation for a decade. "You don't find that at Rockefeller University."

In Rochester, the HOS company, owned by the Mayo Clinic, houses genetically modified pigs that promise to provide a future supply of hearts and perhaps other organs for people. In New Richmond Wis., the nonprofit Spring Point Project facility houses pigs bred to generate an unusually large number of insulin-producing "islet" cells that Hering hopes to use to treat diabetics.

The first pig-to-human heart transplant could be just three to five years away, said Dr. Christopher McGregor, a transplant researcher at Mayo. The first pig-to-human islet cell transplant could happen within one to three years, Hering said. In December he accepted a $401 million gift from the family of Best Buy founder Richard Schulze that he said will greatly accelerate the diabetes research.

If successful, islet cells and new hearts would be just the beginning.

"The market is huge," said Dr. Steven Miles, a professor and bioethicist at the university who studies the issues surrounding animal-to-human transplantation, called xenotransplantation. "Everybody would love to find a way to use xenotransplantation for blood," he said.

The 120 pigs at Spring Point's facility in New Richmond have no idea how special they are. When visitors call, a few of them stare back intently at the faces peering through a thick glass window. They squeal and jostle for feed just like any other herd of pigs.

But what extraordinary feed they are served. Without any animal fat or proteins, it's a vegetarian's dream. It's been irradiated to sterilize it.

The water used to power wash the concrete pens every day has been exposed to ultraviolet light to kill any germs before it comes out of the sprayer.

Humans are not allowed inside, except the handful of workers who must shower with microbial soap each time they enter what they call "the barrier," the seven rooms that house the pigs. They don not one but two layers of sanitized suits. When they clean the floor of pig feces, they wear the same kind of caps and face masks used in hospital operating rooms.

Two or more times a month, one of the pigs is killed and tested for 40 or 50 of the infectious agents that could be transmitted to humans and other pigs. So far, after two years and two generations of pigs born and raised entirely within the barrier, none has been found.

"These are not your everyday 'other white meat' type of product," said Miles.

The extreme precautions are required to convince the Food and Drug Administration that transplanting tissue from pigs will be safe for humans. Surgeons have used treated porcine heart valves to repair human hearts for years, but islet cells and entire hearts are different, they constitute living tissue from pigs and cannot be purified before transplant.

The reward, however, could be enormous, the researchers say.

People with diabetes, for example, often face a life of insulin injections, to say nothing of the many health risks that result from their disease. Their islet cells can be replaced by transplants from deceased human donors either more islet cells or entire pancreases. But there aren't nearly enough donated organs to go around, considering that 18 million people in the United States have been diagnosed with Type 1 and Type 2 diabetes. The same kind of hopeless ratios exist for patients needing transplanted hearts, livers and kidneys.

The pathogen-free descendents of Abraham could solve the problem of supply. Pig products, including insulin, have been used in humans before, but transplanting the very islet cells could give human patients an almost limitless supply.

Yet significant barriers remain.

In 1996, researchers discovered that viruses called retroviruses, which live inside of cells, could be transmitted from pig cells to human cells. Though all animals and humans carry retroviruses, the discovery "created a shiver in the community," McGregor said. It nearly brought the field of xenotransplantation to a halt.

AIDS, which originated with monkeys, is a retrovirus.

There is no way to eliminate those viruses because they are embedded in cells, and the risk of retrovirus transfer remains today. But the danger is not as great as was feared in 1996, McGregor said. Additional studies have shown that the pig retroviruses cannot live in as many human cells as researchers once feared. As a result, "people are becoming much more interested" in xenotransplantation, he said.

That leaves the biggest problem of all: the human body's own defense mechanism, the immune system. Most tissue transplanted into a human from another species would be rejected in minutes, McGregor said. Anti-rejection drugs that have been developed for human-to-human transplants could not stop it.

To solve this problem, McGregor and his colleagues at Mayo have turned to genetic engineering. Their pigs at the HOS facility have been genetically altered to eliminate the molecule on cell surfaces that triggers the human immune system to recognize transplanted tissue as foreign and to attack. They've also added genes to the pig that help minimize the immune response after transplantation.

So far, monkeys receiving genetically altered pig hearts have survived for two months. "That's huge," McGregor said.

GOP picks first black national chairman

BY JAMES ROSEN AND HALIMAH ABDULLAH
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON

Republican leaders from across the country on Friday chose former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele as the party's first black national chairman in what many said was a necessary response to President Barack Obama's historic election.

Steele, a 50-year-old son of a laundress, defeated two state party heads and incumbent Republican National Committee chairman Mike Duncan in the sixth round of daylong voting.

"This is the dawn of a new party moving in a new direction," Steele said after his win.

The choice of Steele, a relative moderate, to lead the party was the Republicans' first concrete acknowledgement since Obama's inauguration that they must chart a new course after George W. Bush's departure as one of America's least popular presidents.

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the embodiment of the GOP establishment in Washington, had urged activists a day earlier to end the divisiveness of the Bush years and open the party to new viewpoints.

Steele vowed that Republicans no longer would cede most of the Northeast, the Midwest and other regions to the Democrats.

"We're going to bring this party to every corner, to every boardroom, to every neighborhood, to every community," Steele declared to a standing ovation in a Capitol Hilton ballroom. "We're going to say to friend and foe alike that we want you to be part of us. And to those who wish to obstruct – get ready to get knocked over!"

The selection of a new Republican standard-bearer from heavily Democratic Maryland over four other party leaders reflected the widespread view that the GOP must draw younger, more diverse voters to the fold.

"In the 21st century, the Republican Party realizes and America realizes that the party needs to change," said Johnnie Morgan, a black Los Angeles activist.

Duncan, of Kentucky, who was seeking re-election despite Republican national election losses in 2006 and in November, dropped out after falling behind Steele in the third round of voting.

Steele defeated the last remaining candidate, South Carolina Republican chairman Katon Dawson, on the sixth ballot.

"Dawson, 52, congratulated Steele on his election.

"Today's hard-fought election among five honorable candidates for chairman was a testament to the strength of our cause and ideals," Dawson said.

Dawson's supporters, though, were stunned when the second black candidate, former Ohio Secretary of State Ken Blackwell, withdrew and asked his supporters to back Steele. Blackwell's handling of the Ohio elections in 2004, which Bush won, came under considerable criticism for alleged voting irregularities.

Blackwell, who had the backing of many social conservatives, said afterward that he hadn't chosen race over philosophy.

"I deplore racial politics," Blackwell said. "It's never worked."

Blackwell said that Steele opposes abortion, backs gun owners' rights and holds other conservative views.

Patrick Ruffini, a 30-year-old Republican who launched www.rebuildtheparty.com two days after John McCain's loss to Obama, said Steele's first tasks must be "closing the huge tech nology gap" Obama exposed and reaching out to voters under 30.

"We cannot lose an entire generation of voters," Ruffini said.

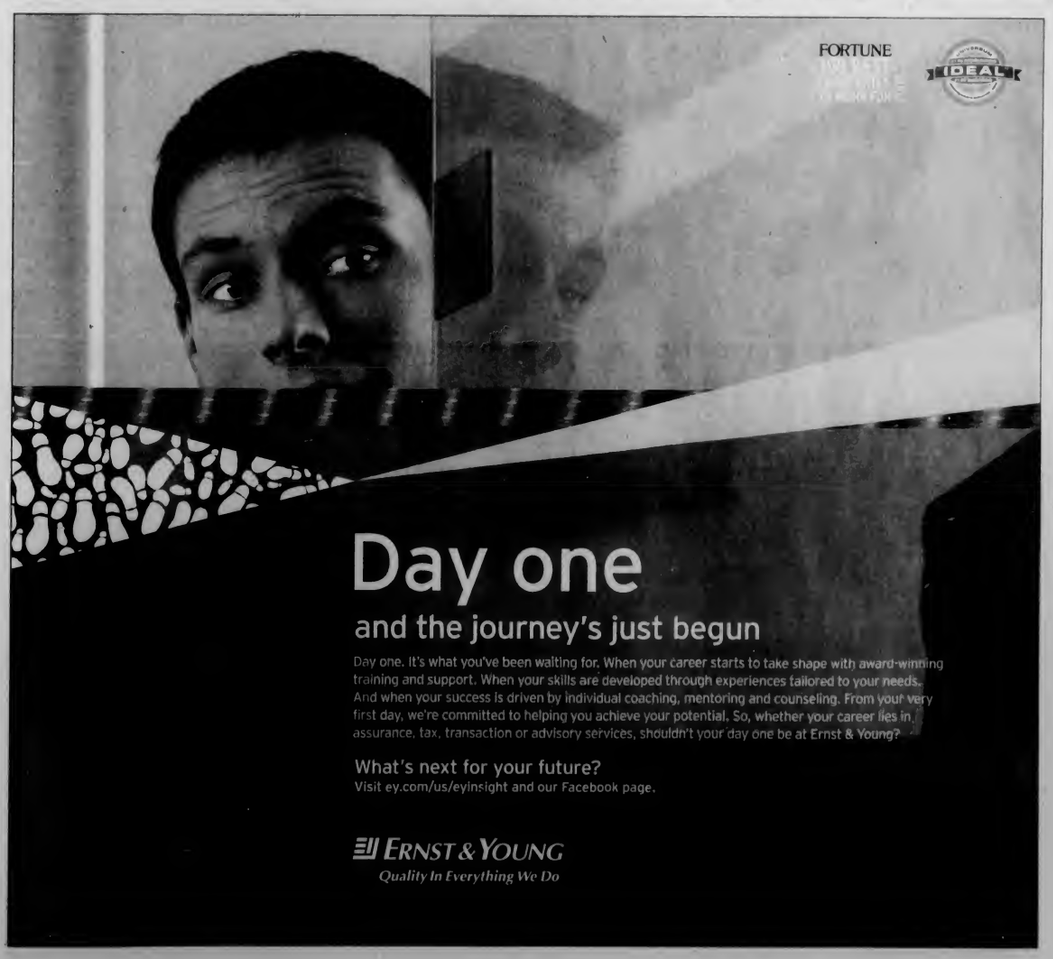
Some of the 168 RNC members in attendance were dismayed by Steele's election.

Steve Scheffler, head of the Iowa Christian Alliance, said Steele had ties to Republicans for Choice, Log Cabin Republicans, a gay-rights group, and others at odds with party conservatives.

"It's a whole group that is as far left as you can get," Scheffler said. "I'll support Steele because I'm a good party soldier, but certainly he's my last choice."

Steele's victory revives a political career that was in decline after his loss to Rep. Benjamin Cardin in Maryland's 2006 Senate race. He defeated Blackwell, two-time party chairmen Dawson and Saul Anuzis of Michigan – and the incumbent national chairman.

A sixth candidate, Tennessee Republican chairman Chip Saltsman, withdrew from the race Thursday after enduring weeks of ridicule over sending his supporters a CD that included a song entitled "Barack the Magic Negro."



Ron Thomas, a lawyer and Dawson supporter from South Carolina, said he was disappointed in his candidate's loss, but said that he looked forward to Steele's leadership of the party.

"It's a historic day to have a minority picked as chairman," said Thomas, who's black. "It's just an exciting time to have this chairman and to have Barack Obama as president."

David Lightman contributed to this report.

Michael Steel is now the Republican national chairman.

The real person of the year

Greg Collins

Time Magazine's selection of Barack Obama as its person of the year epitomized how clueless some Americans are about what it truly takes to be recognized as a person of the year. It is so easy to look at someone with a famous name or widespread popularity, whether it be Obama or John McCain, and feel that such people in positions of political power are the primary agents of change for countless other Americans.

It's time to end this elitist thinking. Being a person of the year should not be a popularity contest. It should not be a cheerleading exhibition. And it most definitely should not be a way to push forth a political agenda for the purposes of feeling good about yourself.

Luckily, the individuals who deserve to be recognized as the real people of the year – who actually have already made a difference in this world – don't need magazine covers to accomplish their noble goals.

Consider, for instance, people who have all achieved more individually by themselves than Obama, McCain, Joe Biden and Sarah Palin have accomplished the whole year.

Like the real military leaders in 2008.

Like General David Petraues, who heroically led the successful troop surge the past two years, contributing greatly dramatic decrease in violence in Iraq.

Like the American service men and women who braved terrorists, roadside bombs, improvised explosive devices, rocket-propelled grenades, and life-and-death situations daily to help stabilize a hellish environment.

Like Junior Officers in the U.S. military, who withstand unbearable heat and overbearing military equipment to hunt down Al Qaeda in Afghanistan and insurgents in Iraq.

Like the Sunni Muslims who turned against Al Qaeda in Iraq who, after three or so years of sacrifice and bloodshed, have been able to protect innocent Iraqis from the thuggery and viciousness of terrorists.

Like the real educators in 2008.

Like Michelle Rhee, the no-nonsense head of Washington D.C. public schools who has overturned the politically correct educational establishment by firing bad teachers, hiring better ones, demanding higher expectations and not caving in to selfish teacher's unions.

Like Dave Levin, one of the founders of the Knowledge is Power Program (KIPP), charter schools which aim to keep children in school for longer hours by extending school days and shortening summer vacation times.

The real people of the year, who actually have already made a difference in this world, don't need magazine covers to accomplish their noble goals.

Like Mike Feinberg, the other founder of KIPP, who led efforts to open a school in Houston, Texas, to assist thousands of Katrina victims displaced by the hurricane and continues to be at the forefront of educational reform in this country.

Like Freeman Hrabowski, the president of the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, who has refused to fund a football team, yet has transformed UMBC into an intellectual powerhouse by starting the Meyerhoff Scholars program, which gives math and science scholarships to gifted students from low income communities

To the real dissidents in 2008.

Like former Nobel Peace Prize Winner Shirin Ebadi, the human rights lawyer from Iran and open critic of Iran's oppressive theocracy and flagrant disregard for women's rights.

Like Hu Jia, the outspoken Chinese activist and blogger who highlighted China's blatant human rights violations during this year's Summer Olympics.

Like Saad Eddin Ibrahim, the exiled Egyptian professor who has demanded that the United States push for political and economic liberalization in Egypt as conditionalities for USAID.

The list goes on and on.

We can talk incessantly about Obama's soaring rhetoric or Sarah Palin's all-American persona. Yet, the aforementioned people are just some of the countless overlooked individuals who have exhibited extraordinary integrity, perseverance, courage and commitment to a greater good, regardless of whether their actions in doing so were popular at the time.

Such real people of the year face criticism, ridicule, chastisement, verbal assaults and death threats daily. Yet the same people have accomplished something real, something substantive, something that has touched the lives of underprivileged and powerless peoples in a direct and tangible fashion.

But why do people continually get glossed over day after day, month after month and year after year? It is much easier to claim a public figure has accomplished something because of vote totals or soaring rhetoric than to make the effort to discover private individuals who actually do the gritty, dirty work necessary to help the impoverished and oppressed. Aristotle anticipated this mindset thousands of years ago when he said, "for the many judge by externals, since these are all they perceive."

By all means, magazine and newspaper editors can continue to judge by their perceptions and make self-congratulatory selections for people of the year to feel good about themselves.

Fortunately for the real people on the ground, who truly do achieve results, they need neither approval nor acknowledgment from editors and politicians to actually contribute to a greater good.

UMass sports: not just for kids

Nick O'Malley

On the Friday of the first hockey game of the spring semester, University of Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon put out a letter in The Daily Collegian asking fans to keep up their energy at games, but also asked them to tone down their vulgarity in the stands.

Cahoon's letter was obviously referring to the fact that the student section at hockey games has a tradition of chanting, in unison, that each player on the opposing squad performs actions similar to a vacuum cleaner and singing the family favorite "F&# 'em up, F&# 'em up, go UMass" song after every home goal.

The coach's sentiments were reflected in the Mullins Center itself as signs that read "be respectful … keep it clean" adorned the arena. As students entered the building, each was given a scroll-like banner that unfurled to read either "Go UMass" or "Go Minutemen" as part of what seemed to be a school effort to produce a cleaner student presence in the building.

Their efforts however, were wasted.

The "F&# 'em up, F&# 'em up, go UMass" song was sung, as expected, as students chose tradition over the ears of the young. And, using the school's efforts against them, students used their "go UMass" signs and showed only the last three letters to let each player on the opposing team know what part of the body they thought he reflected as he was introduced before the game.

The students love it. Student involvement plus chants times vulgarity equals fun.

Unfortunately, the students aren't the only ones attending games. As Cahoon's letter mentioned, the Mullins Center features more than the student section, including parents and kids at these games and they don't enjoy it when an entire arena is swearing and encouraging their kids to do the same.

If vulgar student involvement makes sporting events attractive enough, it outweighs the negatives of the situation.

The problem is, this is a college campus where swearing is part of everyday conversation and is even incorporated into lectures and readings by professors. It's wonderful that there is outside interest in the athletic program, but when it clashes with the traditions set by the student body, the students have the edge.

I'm not here to endorse vulgarity. Wait, no. That's a lie – it's exactly what I'm doing.

Swearing in front of little kids aside, there were over 7,000 people, about half of which were students, on the UMass campus that were not getting arrested, were not drinking and were showing support for the athletic program, which benefits the school.

If your kid has never heard an f-bomb, he or she should not be in a five mile radius of a college campus. It's part of the culture of pretty much any campus. Plus, virtually every kid in this country has been exposed to some form of swearing before. If a kid has heard it through television, Internet and parents yelling at the guy who cut them off in traffic, and is still not using it themselves, a hockey game isn't going to make them start.

Let's face it: the cause of most student issues is boredom. If there were things to do on campus on a Friday night that were legal and a lot more fun than drinking, students would go and do it. So if swearing makes a hockey game attractive enough to take students away from the things that make UMass look bad – drinking, smoking pot, rioting, getting into fights – it's worth it.

If vulgar student involvement makes sporting events attractive enough, it outweighs the negatives of the situation. And it's not as if the entire atmosphere of UMass sporting events is based around swearing. The chanting only occurs a handful of times per game, depending on how many goals are scored.

There are a number other things to occupy a 10 year-old's attention at these games other than what the kids in the student section are saying. Get the kid a foam finger, have him dance during those contests on the jumbo-tron, yell something else every time the students swear.

During the "F&# 'em up, F&# 'em up, go UMass" song, parents should just be cheering along with the students and just say different words.

It's really not that hard. Here: "Go, UMass. Go UMass. Go UMass. Here we go, here we go, go UMass." There, tell your kids to chant that.

Regardless of what the administration tries to do during a game, it's not going to stop students from being belligerent and swearing their heads off. Students taking advantage of the "Go UMass" signs is an example of this.

In fact, the best way to tone down the students would be to leave them alone. The student section will keep singing that song and demeaning players until it's not fun anymore and won't have anything else to use because no one gave them signs they could make swears with. But when that happens, they're just going to stop going to games and drink in their dorms. So I ask you: which outcome is better?

Giving back for the right reasons

Eric Magazu

Emet is the Hebrew word for truth. And the search for truth is incorporated in the missions of most American universities.

Yet, it is unfortunate that for most of us that our search for truth is quite limited. It was once explained to me that the letters of the word emet, which are "alef," "mem" and "tav," are the letters at the beginning, middle and end of the Hebrew alphabet. The insight we attain from this notion is that, while ultimate truth is rooted in simplicity, the quest for truth requires an exhaustive search throughout all matters and our entire lives.

Even for those of us who profess to be on a quest for truth, most of the time we are seeking only to justify our own personal philosophy or ideology. We have our own worldview, a preconceived notion of how the world ought to be, and we impose its strictures on the reality around us.

This fallacy of man is, in part, what led 18th-century biblical commentator and Reformed theologian Matthew Henry to express, "many ask good questions with a design rather to justify themselves than to inform themselves, rather proudly to show what is good in them than humbly to see what is bad in them."

The most important form of truth is not found in the knowledge of practical or worldly matters, but in the knowledge of conscience, which is the knowing of what is required of us in relation to the love of God and the love of our fellow human being.

This is particularly salient as we examine the issue of homelessness. Homelessness is a problem that occurs in every country, and is a persistent concern regardless of the wealth of an individual nation. As discussed last week in The Springfield Republican, according to proposals presented to the Town of Amherst by Community Services Director Roy Rosenblatt, it is estimated that there are between 10-20 chronically homeless adults currently living in our own community.

We are fortunate that Amherst has a remarkably good system for providing hot meals seven days a week to homeless individuals and families. These meals are provided through the Amherst Survival Center and Not Bread Alone.

When it comes to providing emergency housing for the homeless, though, Amherst lags behind nearby communities, often referring families to the Interfaith Cot Shelter in Northampton.

There is currently only one location in Amherst for housing up to six homeless families, Jessie's House. This is why there are proposals before the town of Amherst to purchase additional housing units and reflects a statewide trend away from homeless shelters and towards providing individual housing units.

Even for those among us that give their time and efforts to relieve the problem, an examination of conscience is still required. For many, we serve not out of a genuine love for our fellow, but for self-serving motives, for our own glorification or for the feeling of gratification. It is easy to love those who love us, or to love within our own ethnic or religious groups or to love a person of good character. But the true test of conscience comes when faced with the situation of expressing love for a person whom our surrounding community despises.

The true test of conscience comes when faced with the situation of expressing love for a person whom our surrounding community despises.

Matthew Henry teaches us that this natural impulse to not truly love our fellow is rooted in our own hearts. He says, "No one will ever love God and his neighbour with any measure of pure, spiritual love, [because] the proud heart of man strives hard against these convictions." Henry also teaches us that, "It is lamentable to observe how selfishness governs all ranks; how many excuses men will make to avoid trouble or expense in relieving others."

At first, all of these comments may seem remarkably harsh because we can argue that at least people do help out, regardless of their motives. But these comments speak truth to straying consciences. Many of us are quick to embrace a religious, national, philosophical or ideological worldview, and put our efforts into winning converts to our cause. We will feel that by doing so we have justified our existence, but this is not the case.

We must go further, by sacrificing personal pleasure for the service of one another. Yet even this is not enough, as the true reward comes from serving the people whom we find the most distasteful.

By doing this, we transform our worldview, repair the bonds of affection among men and begin things not for what we want them to be, but we see reality for what it really is. It reveals plainly to us the beauty and simplicity of the truth, and proclaims the amazing freedom that is found in the knowledge of emet.

There are many ways to begin to live a new life, and it can be as simple as changing the way we interact with people in the life we now live. But one such way is to become involved with serving the homeless in Amherst. Opportunities are available by calling Jessie's House at 413-658-0060, the Amherst Survival Center at 413-549-3968 or Not Bread Alone at 413-253-4882.

Miller examines diets in latest book

Author travels the globe, studies several worldwide 'cold spots'

Daphne Miller's newest work "The Jungle Effect" examines countries' dietary habits in an effort to discover what makes them healthier than the rest of the world.

By Mark Grinstein-Camacho
Collegian Correspondent

"The Jungle Effect" by Daphne Miller is a bizarre combination of food travelogue, celebration of the merits of various indigenous diets and gimmicky diet book.

The central premise of "The Jungle Effect" is that we know that our Western diet, with its white bread, fast food and Coke all day, gives rise to the worst Western chronic diseases, such as heart disease and cancer. Conversely, indigenous diets – that is, the traditional diets developed by the group of people native to a certain area – should help protect against those diseases.

Daphne Miller, a medical doctor who collects cookbooks, surveys the epidemiological literature and visits the places, called "cold spots," with the lowest rates of various diseases in the world.

Most of the central chapters are part food travelogue, where she visits a cold spot and then tries to describe what the diet consists of and why it might be healthy.

For example, Iceland, despite its exceptionally dark winters, has the lowest rates of all forms of depression, including seasonal affective disorder. It is also a country where salad is scorned.

Miller visits a colleague in Iceland and tries to eat her way around the country. She discovers a reason for the Icelandic disdain of salads: most vegetables have to be grown in greenhouses. A tomato she tasted fresh off the vine in the greenhouse was hard, pale pink and tasteless. But there are many other sources of fiber and antioxidant nutrients in the traditional Icelandic diet. Bilberries, similar to our blueberries, grow wild all over the place, and for two months, Icelanders "pick them by the bucketful and eat them fresh in soups, with meat, over skyr [a fermented milk drink], and baked into desserts. Then they freeze or dry the rest to save for the winter months."

Also, whole-grain rye bread, black tea drunk daily, seaweed used in soups and even moss occasionally baked into the bread all serve as other sources of fiber and nutrients.

One aspect of the Icelandic diet that puzzled Miller at first was the prominence of potatoes. White potatoes have a high glycemic index, meaning that their starch is digested quickly and leads to a rapid rise and then crash in blood sugar levels. But in Iceland, a week's worth of potatoes are often boiled all at once, and then reheated throughout the week. She cites a study that shows that this cooking method lowers the glycemic index of the potatoes. And in the context of a meal with sources of fat and protein, their glycemic index is even lower.

Another one of Miller's theories on Iceland's low rates of depression is in the amounts of omega-3 fatty acids they consume. Iceland eats more fish per capita than anywhere else in the world: over 200 pounds per person per year, about half again more than Japan.

There are abundant other sources of omega-3 fatty acids in the Icelandic diet: the local game and dairy animals all consume vegetation rich in omega-3s, so all of the game meat, eggs and dairy in the traditional Icelandic diet is also. There are some studies that suggest that eating high levels of omega-3s is linked to lower rates of depression; Iceland is certainly a case in point.

Miller's travelogues make for mouthwatering and fascinating reading. And with her medical back-

Defending the curve

Failing students is quickly becoming a thing of the past. Many high schools are turning to more charitable grading in favor of actually educating students.

Why easy grading is good for your career

By Jay Mathews
The Washington Post

New Jersey high school teacher Peter Hibbard flunked 55 percent of the students in his regular biology class the year before he retired. There were no failures in his honors classes, he said, but many of his regular students refused to do the work. They did not show up for tests and did not take make-ups. They did not turn in lab reports. Homework was often ignored.

"Still, the principal told me that the failure rate was unacceptable, and I needed to fix it," Hibbard said. "The pressure to give grades instead of actually teaching increased. A colleague told me that he had no problem. If students showed up, they got a C. If they did some work, they got a B. If they did fair or better on tests, they got an A. No one ever complained, and his paycheck was the same. He was teacher of the year, and a finalist for a principal's job."

I often get helpful letters from teachers. Sometimes, as in Hibbard's case, teachers are so candid and wise I am compelled to quote them. Here is what Hibbard told me:

"The pop phrase is that 'those who can't do, teach.' I would like any serious critic to spend a month in the classroom. It is easy when you are a guest speaker and don't have to worry about discipline. But do the planning, maintain interest, do practice and review, write and grade a test or three, and then deal with the parents. In your spare time, maintain records, deal with teen angst and crisis, monitor the bathroom (I went to college for this?) and be available for extra help.

"The message comes from the top. When the leadership sets the example, and backs the good teacher, it is so much easier. When I have to justify failing a student who refuses to try, you can only tilt at windmills for so long."

Hibbard taught biology for 27 years. Before that, he was a field biologist for the U.S. Agriculture Department and a lobbyist on environmental issues for the housing industry. He thinks his experience in the field was invaluable. When he started teaching he could give students practical answers to the frequent question, "Why do we have to learn that?"

He said when his students asked why he left a job in industry for teaching, which paid less, he replied that his reasons were selfish. His students were the citizens who would pay for his Social Security. "The more they learned, the more they earned and the more they made, the better off I would be when I retired," he said.

In retirement, he is working part time on a program to give prospective teachers some of the real world experience that helped him. Asked for solutions for the apathy and buck-passing he observed, he sent me seven ideas. Each suggestion is followed here by my "grade."

1. Get parents involved, not in the grades, but in the learning. If Johnny cuts school or misbehaves, on the third detention, one of the parents must also be present. The time should not be "quiet time" but a session with a professional on behavior modification. Parents have asked me what to do because their child wouldn't listen to them.

One dad asked his son why he didn't turn in homework. The kid's response was, "Shut the (expletive) up, Dad" And daddy shut up. Dad had previously yelled at me over the phone about failing grades. I had guidance arrange a conference.

Guidance and I knew where the problem lay.

Grade: A (Many of us parents hunger for support of our desperate attempts to deal with teenagers. Those of us who are totally clueless can still use a taste of reality.)

2. Since we cannot require teachers to gain more experience in their field, the school system should arrange for industry to pick up teachers on a paid internship during summers.

Either colleges or school systems can do this, and to meet some districts' five-year continuing education requirements, at least 20 weeks should be required during the five years.

See GRADES on page 6

Non-cooks learn to turn out dinner for 20

By David Hagedorn
Special to The Washington Post

A little brisket, a nice slice of homemade challah, some red wine, maybe. What's not to like?

For Stacey Bran and Jason Adolf, the cooking, that's what. After all, the couple's combined skills in the kitchen max out at peanut butter and jelly sandwiches and tacos. Those are not exactly appropriate offerings for the Friday night potluck dinners they've been invited to since getting engayed and joining the Sixth and I Historic Synagogue a year ago. So they just bring the wine instead.

That was before they decided to step up and take their turn at the helm of a dinner to celebrate the Sabbath. It was time to repay their new circle of friends with some hospitality of their own. And actually cook something, a thought that frightened them.

"HELP!" Adolf, 30, wrote in his plea to us. "We'd like to host a Shabbat dinner for 20 people but have no idea what we're doing."

Adolf, a manager for a federal IT contractor, particularly wanted to learn how to cook brisket, and we already knew the go-to guy for that: chef David Scribner, who was featured in The Post Food section 11 years ago, when he was at the now-defunct Felix in Washington. We enlisted Scribner, chef/partner at Washington's Surfside, to go to the couple's apartment to help them get over their fear of cooking — and to leave them with a repertoire of dishes that would wow their dinner-party guests.

This time around, Scribner updated the succulent version of the pot roast that was just like the one his mother used to make. He ditched Lipton Onion Soup mix, replaced clunky aromatics with cipollini onions, and added some modern side dishes: root vegetable and potato gratin and steam-seared green beans with preserved lemon and garlic. He also fulfilled his students' request to learn how to make challah, no small feat given the couple's inexperience.

The cooking bug didn't hit Adolf until he met Bran, 31, on JDate, a Web site for Jewish singles. She had been an interior designer for restaurants and luxury hotels until getting laid off recently, meaning the time was right for her to learn to cook, too. (She's starting from scratch; her mother "makes about 12 things," she said, "three of them well.")

Her way of doing things and Scribner's are opposite: She likes rules, and Scribner eschews them. "I need the finite," she said. "I don't like guesswork."

"But if you prepare yourself for the fact that nothing is going to be right, you can adjust as you go," Scribner countered. His theory is, if you fail, you fail. "It's not world peace. It's just food."

It might not sound like it, but Scribner, 40, is not casual about food. He brags that he was not formally trained, never apprenticed with hotshot chefs and does not like to use recipes. But his method reveals that he spent time with knowledgeable mentors who wear their hearts on their plates, as he does. He specifically lauded Chef Carole Greenwood, for whom he worked for a few years until last year, when he opened Surfside with partners. Now, in addition to his restaurant duties, he runs a private catering business, Chefdavidscribner.com, and helps his wife, Valerie, raise a 4-year-old and 2-year-old twins.

As if to prove his assertion that cooking is a process of correcting mistakes, Scribner made a few missteps during the lesson but then righted himself and produced an utterly satisfying meal. He also managed to teach a lot of techniques along the way, chief among them

Amateur cooks Stacey Bran and Jason Adolf get an energetic lesson in sauteing green beans from chef David Scribner. Scribner brings an atypical style to the kitchen and is not classically trained.

The global eating effect

ground, she often explains aspects of a diet from a scientific perspective.

For example, in Crete, it's common to dip barley rusks in wine, and she explains that the wine helps break down a chemical in the barley that binds some nutrients to the husks, so dipping the barley rusks in wine makes those nutrients more accessible.

But her approach is also a bit over-simplistic. Miller visited some of the regions for only a very short time – her Mexico trip, for instance, was only 10 days long. How could she possibly hope to gather the hundreds of years of nutritional wisdom from each of those regions with such a brief sojourn?

Also, her focus on foods means that she ignores, skims over or simplifies other factors. The particular city in Crete she visited, the world cold spot for heart disease, was small enough that everyone walked everywhere, she reported. She urged people who would follow the Cretan diet to imitate them and do at least 30 minutes of cardio 5 times a week.

Likewise, she minimizes other debates related to food as well. Probably most of her diets would be kinder to the environment than the Western one it replaces, but a world where everyone wants fruits and vegetables shipped fresh from the other side of the world would surely be almost as bad.

That said, this book is a welcome contribution to the discussion. It is a vicious attack on diets that prescribe a certain percentage of calories from various macronutrients.

Although none of her collections of recipes are authoritative, they're a good starting point, and she lists a few cookbooks for each of her regions for those who wish to dabble a bit farther.

Iceland has one of the lowest depression rates in the world despite its cold climate and exceptionally dark winters. Author Daphne Miller contests this may be because of the nation's high fish consumption.

Amateurs try cooking on the fly

searing, braising, roasting and sautéing.

He started with the challah and pretty much broke every rule of bread making. A milk and butter mixture he'd set on the stove to warm boiled over. He had warned that he might not have recalled his old recipe accurately, and he was right. There was too much flour in the dough, so he adjusted as he went along, adding more milk until he achieved the sticky consistency he desired.

"You're not really supposed to wing bread making, but there it is," he tossed off nonchalantly. Scribner left the dough to rise, uncovered, and moved on to the next task.

He took a whole brisket, easily 12 pounds, cut it in half and opted to prepare the second cut, with its extra flap of meat (interspersed with fat), instead of the leaner first, or flat, cut. He trimmed it and seasoned it liberally with salt, pepper and garlic powder as he extolled the virtues of searing in a super-hot pan.

"We want to have smoke coming off of it, PSSSSSHHHHHH, making that sound, getting all brown and crusty on the outside," he enthused. "Searing is an active process. It's exciting!"

But when he put the meat in the pan, it went "pishhhh," sounding more like a little bit of trapped air being let out of a radiator.

"What's going on right there is not searing," he confirmed. The deep-sided braising pan Scribner had brought from his restaurant was bowed on the bottom and barely made contact with the ceramic cooktop it rested on, so it did not get hot enough.

No matter. He switched to a saute pan he had also packed. He seared the meat and then the cipollini onions and garlic in it; returned the lot to the braising pan with water, tomato paste and bay leaves; then covered the pan and relegated it to the oven to braise.

When Bran asked how she would know when it was done, her teacher responded: "Just stick a fork in it. When it's done, it's done."

Meanwhile, the challah dough, against all odds, had ballooned. Scribner turned it out onto a floured granite countertop and encouraged Bran and Adolf to work it over.

"You feel it has some lumpiness to it?" he asked. "That's not good. It's because I stopped halfway and added more milk."

No worries; the chef kneaded the dough into submission, pulled off three knobs, rolled them into strands and braided them. In minutes he had made three small loaves and then taught his students how to make four more.

And off went the pan to another corner of the kitchen so the loaves could rise.

From the way Bran worked the dough, it was obvious that she had a natural affinity for baking, though she probably didn't recognize it that day. Not much of a red-meat eater, she didn't even want to touch the raw brisket, which Adolf called "man-brisket" and couldn't resist working on. Bran preferred to layer the sliced Yukon Gold potatoes, celery root, butternut squash and rutabagas, sprinkling them with herbs and drizzling them with cream.

They both had the same question many students have: how to make sure all the dishes come out at the same time.

"It never works out," Bran said.

Scribner had a refreshingly honest answer.

"It doesn't for chefs, either. It never works out for anybody like that," he replied. "You have to sort of judge it. What things you're going to cook on the fly, like the green beans, that are just going to get sautéed in very hot oil at the last minute. What things can retain heat, like the brisket, and can be held in a low oven for a long time."

He made it sound so random, but he was finishing that conversation while everyone was inhaling plates full of brisket and creamy gratin, and eating lemon- and garlic-tinged green beans with their fingers.

And then there was the bread. When had he even put it in the oven? The loaves had baked into each other like Parker House rolls. They were crisped and brown on the outside, sweet and soft on the inside. Perhaps the crumb was a bit dense, but considering the beating the dough had taken, the final product was nothing short of miraculous.

Scribner arrived that day with no cadre of assistants to prep before him and clean up after him. He did his own dishes as he went along and left Bran and Adolf's kitchen as he'd found it. Instead of a pristine chef's coat, he wore a striped, short-sleeved polo shirt, khaki pants, a half-apron and a sun visor stamped with the Surfside logo. Had it not been January, he could have been on his way to play golf.

"This is exactly what we wanted to learn," Adolf said. "This is like Grandma's house: Shabbat dinner, Passover brisket, nice and hearty comfort food."

When they re-create the dishes for their friends, they might need to make adjustments depending on who will attend. Dairy and meat don't mix at strictly kosher gatherings, so the gratin Bran liked so much might be a no-go. But changing course won't be a problem. They can always call Scribner, and he'll help them roll with it. That's what he's all about.

Ideas ranging from instituting a national education committee to improving funding have been proposed in an effort to improve standards in high schools across the country.

Grade debate: to fail or not to?

Grade: B+ (This strikes me as expensive, thus unlikely, but worthwhile.)

3. Do away with social promotion. The federal government should set specific standards for knowledge and application. States may add to it but not teach less. The committee that sets the standards should have equal numbers of teachers, administrators, college officials and business executives. Parents should have representation. Recommendations should start on the local level and be sent for review to the next level up.

A national committee sets standards. Students who do not pass the test at the end of the year are retained. They may get supplemental help during the summer, and retake the test before the fall session starts.

Grade: A (This is expensive, too, but essential. It is possible under our current system to miss half of the questions on some state achievement tests and still be judged proficient in that subject.)

4. Protect tenure. I almost lost my job because I failed an administrator's child who did no work and got in my face, assuming his parent's position would protect him. Good teachers must not be subject to political pressure for grades. It happens far too often.

On the other hand, unions must sit with the administration and decide on a procedure that does not protect the bad teacher. In one district, a teacher with political connections was reassigned to three schools, getting a student pregnant in each one.

He eventually became an administrator with no student contact. Others relied on being popular with the students and did little real teaching. Nepotism must be banned, not just discouraged.

Grade: C-plus (The problem is real, but enforcing tenure rules is not a solution. As Hibbard's own clash with his principal shows, an administrator can wear down even a tenured teacher.)

5. Funding must be reliable and consistent. In New Jersey, the entire budget is sent to the voters. While they provide the students, they don't approve enough money to educate them.

We refer to it as expecting a Cadillac education for the price of a Chevy.

As a result of new construction, my district saw an influx of 1,200 new students with no increase in funding. Developers should be required to place money in escrow against the need for new construction. Towns should increase the funding for new development based on the taxes received from the new residents or industry.

Instead, the town keeps that money because they have financial trouble, too. The result of budgets being voted down was science books that were 15 years old in my classroom, and lab tables that were crumbling.

Grade: C-minus (Reliable and consistent funding is a fine thing but impossible to arrange in a free-enterprise, non-recession-proof democracy. So this is a pipe dream.)

6. Give teachers ownership of their program. With the requirements set by the state and district for what is learned, the teachers should have sufficient collaborative time to decide how to best achieve the goals, what books to use and what equipment is needed, within the limits of the budget. Most people with any skills want to be told what the job is, but not how to do it. That is why I went to college, and go back for continuing education programs.

Grade: A-plus (Harnessing the creative energies of teachers is the key to making schools work.)

7. Districts must set up programs for parents during the evenings or weekend for those who want to learn how to help their children with school. So many parents tell me .. they understand their children's frustration, but they don't know how to help.

They must be part of the new programs, such as new math or whole language. Once part of the process, they can speak from experience, not frustration, if a program does not work ... Teach study skills to both students and their parents throughout their school careers.

What is learned in partnership will be retained better. Besides, who is the greater role model for the child: a teacher they see for only a few hours on weekdays, or their parents?

Grade: A (My mother taught parent effectiveness classes after she retired as a classroom teacher. They were very popular, and I wish more parents had the same opportunity to learn proven techniques.)

Xavier holds on

the game late in the first half as it opened up a 10-point lead with 1 minute, 20 seconds left in the first half. UMass entered the half down 44-37.

Xavier's lead hovered between six and eight points until UMass went on a 10-2 run started by a Bonner 3-pointer with 13:24 left in the game. Harris then scored five unanswered points and Lowe stole the ball for an easy layup to tie the game at 58 with 11 minutes remaining. From then on the game was tightly contested until the final seconds.

The Minutemen were looking to add another win over a top team in their conference – they have wins over Dayton (75-62 on Jan. 10) and Temple (79-75 on Jan. 17). A win against Xavier would have given them wins over the three top teams in the conference in RPI.

UMass will look to regroup when it hosts Richmond on Wednesday night.

GAME NOTES

Lowe now has 999 career points, the free-throw he intentionally missed would have given him 1,000 ... Saturday's loss dropped the Minutemen to 1-8 on the road this season ... Gaffney has led UMass in rebounds in 14 of their 19 games this season.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu.

The Minutemen came within a missed tip-in of defeating No. 10 Xavier Saturday afternoon in Cincinnati, Ohio. UMass fell in the end, 82-80, despite never trailing by more than four points in the final nine minutes.

Gerardot leads in losing effort

Dacko told her squad at intermission what needed to happen in order for them to pull out a victory.

"We still needed to be able to defend, and the first five minutes of the second half were important, and we made a really nice second run," Dacko said. "But, we were in a scoring dreught and put them to the foul line."

The Minutewomen went on a 12-0 run to open the second half and brought them within four points of the Billikens, but still struggled to knock shots down with forwards Cerie Mosgrove and Kristina Danella.

"They went to a zone and we still couldn't buy a basket. We had open looks and that was the frustration of Danella and Cerie struggling in this game," Dacko said.

Mosgrove had five points while Danella added three, but the Minutewomen needed these two to have a hot hand in order to win.

But Billiken guard and A-10 scoring leader Theresa Lisch along with Woods and center Amanda Kemezys combined for 48 points, and converted from the free-throw line when they got there, and Lisch was able to create chances offensively.

"Lisch had two 3s, and one time we're supposed to chase on a stagger, and we don't chase, and we get fried," Dacko said.

"Another time, were supposed to hedge on a high ball screen, we don't hedge, we get fried and she made us pay."

Along with a solid defensive effort, the Minutewomen grabbed big rebounds, with Gerardot and Wright each having six apiece, while Young, Danella, Mosgrove and sophomore forward Valerie Avebe each had five.

"This is the most complete game we've played in the A-10 as far as effort and I think where our effort was on the first half was good," Dacko said.

UMass came within a point of catching the Billikens at 45-44, but SLU pulled away again with nearly eight minutes to play by 12 points, and still led by nine with two minutes remaining.

With 34 seconds left, the Minutewomen pulled within six points, as Dacko called a time-out for a desperation 3-pointer meant to find Mosgrove in the corner.

Junior guard Kim Benton threw the shot up, which was no were near the hoop, as Saint Louis secured the victory.

"It shouldn't come to that play, but we were going for a 3 to tie it," Dacko said. "It should be a situation that if we make our free throws, we win the ball game."

The Minutewomen will travel to Rhode Island Tuesday for another A-10 rival game slated for 7 p.m.

Wright having hard time with fouling

Lisch has made 46 3-pointers on the year, two ahead of the already school record 44 made by sophomore Cerie Mosgrove this season.

NOT THE WRIGHT CALLS

Notching 12 points and 10 rebounds was by no means a poor performance by sophomore forward Teya Wright, who, as of late, has been struggling. However, it was the fact that Wright got those numbers in a mere 20 minutes on the sport that was surprising.

Wright, who was in foul trouble for most of the game against the Billikens, matched up well against St. L's 6-foot 4 center Amanda Mekezys and performed well on both ends of the court. Unfortunately for Wright and the Minutewomen, the show was cut short when the team's foremost post presence went to the bench with her second foul of the game with six minutes remaining in the first half and spent four minutes into the second.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko has reiterated that her team is better when Wright is on the court. But Wright, who finished the game with four fouls, has struggled to keep the opposing team off the foul line and herself out of foul trouble on the defensive end.

Wright was far from the only UMass culprit when it came to foul-

The Minutewomen allowed the Billikens to attempt 29 shots from the charity stripe including 10 by Lisch, who finished them as part of her team-high 23 point.

RETURNING TO FORM

Stefanie Tuthill, UMass leader on the floor and in points this season, exploded late who she was the Minutewomen's biggest offensive threat against the Billikens by scoring 20 points.

After being limited to only seven points against Richmond the game before and scoring only six points in the first half, Gerardot exploded for 18 points in the second half of Saturday's game, hitting a pair of 3-pointers and going 6-for-9 from the line.

Gerardot now has five 20-point games on the season, but had not had one since Jan. 2 against Boston University. Since the emergence of Kristina Danella earlier in the season, Gerardot has had her offensive opportunities limited as her teammates have become a larger part of the offensive picture.

Early in the season, it was common-place to see Gerardot to carry the team offensively as the young unit found its stride. As the season progressed, though, players like Young and Hill began to do damage inside as sharp-shooters Mosgrove and Danella supplemented Gerardot on the perimeter.

Marcou's 4 assists spark UM

thanks to Berry's goal 1:16 into the matchup, UMass dictated the tempo and outcome of the game.

Casey Wellman put UMass up 2-0 going into the second period after NU's Alex Tuckerman was called for high sticking. With the man advantage, Justin Braun and Matt Irwin set up the power play, making passes at the points. Braun took a shot from the left point and Wellman was positioned to slap in the rebound from the left side of the goal.

Berry tallied a second goal (9:13 in the third), UMass's fourth of the game, to put the Minutemen up 4-1 and completely changing the tempo of the game.

At 13:26 in the third, Will Ortiz received a pass from T.J. Syner near the blueline to go 3-on-0 into the zone, Ortiz made a move to the right on NU net minder Brad Thiessen for the score, in what proved to be the game-winner,

"To tell you the truth I didn't even know it was a 3-on-0," Ortiz said. "I came out and saw no one there so I took a straight line to the net and [Syner] gave me the puck and just had so much speed and beat the goalie to the right side."

Chris Davis scored UMass' sixth and final goal of the game. He picked up the puck at the blueline, skated into the right slot and floated the puck past Thiessen, making the score 6-2.

The Huskies came back and scored less than a minute later, and added another goal at 19:08, making the final score 6-4.

GAME NOTES

James Marcou notched a career-high four assists and is second in the league in scoring with 31 points, behind Boston University's Colin Wilson, who has 32 ... Braun had two assists ...UMass went 2-for-2 on the power play. The last time UMass went perfect on the man advantage (2-for-2) was Nov. 25 in the 3-2 overtime loss to Vermont ...The attendance at Friday night's game was 7,128, with a record-setting 3,897 students.

Sbordon strong vs. Fordham

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the 2008-09 dual meet finale, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team defeated Fordham, 176.5-120.5, while the women's team fell short, losing 179-109, at the Col. Francis B. Messmore Aquatic Center Saturday in Bronx, N.Y.

Only two scheduled events remain on the teams' official calendars before the much-anticipated Atlantic 10 Championships, Feb. 18-21 in Buffalo, N.Y.

Saturday's split puts the Minutemen's season dual meet record at 6-1, while the Minutewomen finished at 4-3.

Men's divers Jason Cook, Adam Duffield, Byron Johnson and Zack Clark fully dominated the 3-meter dive, taking the top four spots, respectively. Meanwhile, women's divers Karen Upperco and Sarah Horstmann took first and second place in both diving events, respectively. Upperco, voted Most Outstanding Diver at last year's Atlantic 10 Championships, now has 12 first-place finishes this season, along with four sweeps.

Horstmann, Upperco and the rest of the UMass divers will travel to West Point, N.Y., for next week's Army Diving Invitational.

Other than diving, the Minutewomen saw few first-place finishes, and fell to 8-5 all-time versus the Rams. The Minutemen improved their perfect all-time record in the Bronx to 12-0.

Facing a 9-2 Rams squad that leads the conference in victories, some scattered third place times weren't enough for the women's team. Christa Narus won the 200 yard individual medley (2:11.75), but was defeated in both the 100 free and 200 fly by some tough Fordham competition.

Chelsea Downing, who currently holds the top time in the 1650 freestyle in the A-10, was a consistent point-earner for UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb's squad Saturday. Downing took fifth place in the 1000-yard freestyle (10:50.49) and 200-yard freestyle (2:01.82), while grabbing third place in the 500-yard freestyle (5:17.12).

The Minutewomen's A and B teams in the 200-yard medley relay grabbed 15 points by sweeping first and second place in a race where many other finishers were disqualified. The winning A team time of 1:39.32 was compiled by Celia Jenkins, Jennifer Corriveau, Elizabeth Walsh and Kathryne Chalikis. Teammates Eryn Brewer, Jackie Porter, Sarah Arnott and Tavis Potter nailed the second-place time of 1:47.89.

On the men's side, swimmers Dan Backler and Brian Schmidt almost edged out Rams star Sean McManus in the 200 yard breaststroke, with times of 2:16.16 and 2:16.24, respectively, to McManus' winning time of 2:14.97.

Reigning A-10 Rookie of the Week Joey Sbordon continued his parade of stellar dual meet performances with three top freestyle finishes: 200 (1:44.98), 500 (4:42.93), and 1000 (9:46.55). With 21 individual wins on the season, Sbordon heads into A-10 competition undefeated in both the 500 and 1000 freestyle.

UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth, whose team was selected to repeat as A-10 Champions in pre-season coaches polls, enjoyed key victories by Mike Berthaume (100 fly, 1:55.16), Max Butler (200 back, 1:54.62) and Jean Moliere (100 free at 47.32, 50 free at 21.56). Moliere's teammate Chris Howard came in right behind him in the 50 free sprint, at 21.90, for second place.

The underdog Minutewomen, who finished in 5th place at last year's A-10 Championships, will swim once more before heading to Buffalo, at a Kingston, R.I., Invitational next weekend.

Just short of an upset

Back-and-forth game goes to No. 10 Xavier

By Scott Feldman
Collegian staff

For an instant, it appeared the Massachusetts men's basketball team was headed to overtime against the best team in the Atlantic 10 when Chris Lowe nailed a game-tying 3-pointer with four seconds left.

However, a referee called a foul on the floor before the shot was attempted, the 3-pointer was nullified and Lowe had to shoot two free-throws with the Minutemen down by three.

|---|---|
| Xavier | 82 |

Lowe made the first and intentionally missed the second to give UMass an opportunity to grab the rebound. Tony Gaffney almost tipped it in, but it bounced just out of the hoop as UMass lost an 82-80 nail-biter to No. 10 Xavier (19-2, 7-0 A-10 Saturday afternoon in Cincinnati, Ohio.

"We were trying to get the ball to hit off the left side of the basket and we got a pretty good tip at it," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said, looking for a similar last-second tip-in off a missed free throw that the Minutemen got against Boston College on Dec. 6 that forced overtime.

It was a cruel finish for the Minutemen (7-12, 2-4 A-10), who played Xavier down to the wire and forced the Musketeers into a season-high 23 turnovers and scored 36 points off the takeaways.

"We stepped up the [defensive] heat in the second half. They were too big and too athletic for us to guard close to the basket," Kellogg said. "So we decided to pick up their guards in the full court."

Xavier shot a scorching 59.6 percent from the field in the game and got big games out of Derrick Brown (tied his career-high with 23 points), B.J. Raymond (22) and C.J. Anderson (19) to lead the Musketeers to their 10th straight victory.

Ricky Harris led the Minutemen with 17 points with Lowe right behind him with 16 points to go along with seven assists. Luke Bonner (14) and Anthony Gurley (10) also added double-figures for the Minutemen.

The game featured 14 lead changes throughout and neither team gained a lead of more than three in the last nine minutes until Xavier went up 78-74 with under one minute remaining. Harris hit a 3-pointer to close the gap to one point with 45 seconds left, but on UMass' next possession missed the potential go-ahead 3-pointer with 12 seconds left in the game. Xavier grabbed the rebound and the game turned into a free-throw shooting contest in which the Minutemen were always one-point behind.

Gaffney nearly earned yet another double-double with nine points and 12 rebounds, but despite his efforts the Musketeers out-rebounded UMass 37-26 – although the Minutemen did get 13 offensive rebounds while Xavier grabbed seven.

This game was played at a blistering pace early and it seemed as though neither team could miss. The Minutemen opened up the game shooting 9-for-13 as even Gaffney hit a 3-pointer, but Xavier made 9-for-14 as both sides traded leads with defense being an afterthought.

It appeared Xavier was starting to run away with

Minutewomen rally too late

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team played strong enough defense against visiting Saint Louis Saturday afternoon to have a very good chance of bringing their four game losing streak to a halt.

However, the Minutewomen couldn't generate enough offense and put the Billikens (10-11, 4-2 Atlantic 10) at the free-throw line, as UMass went on to suffer a three-point defeat, 70-67, at the Mullins Center.

|---|---|
| UMass | 67 |

"[I'm] extremely disappointed because our game-plan was for us to be shooting free-throws," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said after the game. "Instead, we fouled them early and put them in the bonus."

The Billikens took advantage of their time at the charity stripe, converting 22-of-27 free-throw attempts, while UMass shot just 68 percent for the game.

The loss drops the Minutewomen to 1-5 in the A-10, and 8-13 overall.

"I was pleased with our defensive intensity; we just had a tough time putting the ball in the bucket," Dacko said.

Senior guard Stefanie Gerardot had her fifth 20-point game of the season with a team-leading 24 points, while sophomore forward Teya Wright and senior guard Sakera Young added 12 and 11 points, respectively.

The Minutewomen got off to a slow start to the game, as Billiken forward Lauren Woods sparked a 22-6 run for SLU, which led to a 30-14 advantage through the first half.

With nearly nine minutes to play, Wright made a layup, but the Minutewomen didn't score for more than four minutes until Young made a field goal at the end of the half.

The Minutewomen went into halftime by scoring the final seven points and cutting the deficit to 34-25.

See W. BASKETBALL on page 7

After falling behind by 17 earlier in the game, the Minutewomen came within three points of Saint Louis but the comeback fell short in a 70-67 loss.

Team defense poses issues for UMass

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

So much of the Massachusetts women's basketball team's offense relies on the team's ability to hit the 3-pointer. The team has already shattered the previous high for 3s in a season and features three prominent threats from behind the arc: Stefanie Gerardot, Cerie Mosgrove and Kristina Danella.

UMass Basketball

It is this facet of the UMass offense that made it so peculiar when Saturday's game against Saint Louis went to halftime with neither team successfully hitting a 3-point shot. This was because one, UMass went 0-for-9 from 3-point range, and two, the Billikens didn't even attempt one.

Though the Minutewomen going ice cold from behind the arc is surprising, the fact that SLU failed to even take a 3-pointer is even more shocking.

Billikens guard Theresa Lisch, the leading scorer in the Atlantic 10, is known for her prowess from 3-point range and draws much of her game from it. However, the openings in the UMass defense allowed her to distribute the ball to her teammates and slash to the hoop with much more proficiency than taking a potentially bad shot for three. Lisch finished the first half with 12 points.

Keying on Lisch

Going into Saturday's game, the Minutewomen knew that defending the most prolific scorer in their conference would be the key against SLU. And with 21 points coming from Lisch, the UMass defense was burned by the very threat on which they were keying.

The game began with senior Sakera Young, one of the team's best defenders, manning up on Lisch. Though Young performed well in covering the SLU guard, the UMass defense adjusted so that redshirt sophomore Diatienna Hill had the assignment, which allowed Young to focus her efforts on the offensive end.

Young, and later Hill, prevented Lisch from getting easy scores and challenged her at all areas of the floor. When that happened, however, the Minutewomen were usually whistled for a foul.

One goal the UMass' defense accomplished was to keep Lisch from burning them with 3-pointers.

Weekend pair split by UM

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

When a goaltender gives up four goals in a game it's rare to hear that they had one of the best performances of the night, but for Paul Dainton that was just the case.

Before Friday night's game against No. 3 Northeastern, Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon explained that if his team's goaltenders play well, it will determine how well the rest of the team plays.

|---|---|
| Maine | 2 |
| UMass | 1 |
| NU | 4 |

Dainton did just that as the Minutemen defeated Northeastern, 6-4, on Friday night at the Mullins Center. On Sunday, the Minutemen lost to Maine, 2-1, in Orono; Maine's Jeff Dimmen scored the game-winning goal with 26.5 seconds remaining in regulation.

Dainton [35 saves) shutout the Huskies in the first period, but as the game progressed, the Minutemen began to let up defensively. Dainton, at little fault of his own, allowed a goal in the second and three goals in the third.

"Paul gave us a really solid effort," Cahoon said. "The goals that [Northeastern] got in the third period were a reflection of poor net-front defense ... [Dainton is] the person I feel the worst for, he gives up four goals in a night and gives us a stellar performance."

"If you were to say before the game started Northeastern would score four goals and lose a game you'd all be shocked, right?" Northeastern coach Greg Cronin said after the game.

Shocking it was, as UMass was called for 13 penalties and allowed three goals while being a man down, but the Minutemen's penalty kill held off the Huskies' 1 minute, 35 second 5-on-3 advantage late in the second period to change the morale for both teams – boosting UMass and crushing Northeastern's.

"Right when that time is clicking off, morale on the bench is just so high," UMass forward Alex Berry said. "There is a boost there and we want to go out there and make sure the next shift is that and building off that."

The Minutemen came out strong and played smart, and

Bluelines pressure Northeastern in win

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

In Friday night's 6-4 win over No. 3 Northeastern, the Massachusetts hockey team did many things right that it has failed to do in many games this season.

Despite allowing three late-third-period goals, the Minutemen (11-11-3, 6-7-3 Hockey East) played above their competition, getting on the scoreboard early and pressuring NU attackers to force plays instead of staying patient.

UMass Hockey

A big part of UMass' win was due largely in part to the play of the Minutemen defensemen. Topher Bevis, Matt Irwin, Justin Braun, Martin Nolet and the other UMass defensemen jumped on the offensive attack more than they have in recent games.

On UMass' first power play 9 minutes, 10 seconds in the first period Braun took control of the puck, skated into NU's end and controlled the puck against the boards behind the net, leaving his usual blue line position.

"He's carrying the puck a little more than he used to," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Without question he's one of the best defenseman in college hockey. He gives us that type of effort game in and game out.

"Generally speaking he's given us big plays and big efforts every night. He's a man among boys sometimes out there."

Braun, no doubt the leader of the defense along side Nolet, assisted on UMass' first and second goals. Braun, whose simple decision of wristing the shot on net when UMass had the man advantage at 10:11 into the first period, opened an alley for Casey Wellman to skate into and put the rebound into the net.

Dainton domination

It's been a long while since a Minuteman net minder had an outing like Paul Dainton did Friday night. The sophomore goaltender stopped 35 shots, including eight on a 5-on-3 midway through the second period. Despite allowing four goals, Dainton played spectacular. Rebounds were a rarity and his lateral movement posed no problem at any point in the game.

In the third period UMass' emotions got the better of it. The defense in front of Dainton got overwhelmed with the Huskies' aggressiveness and got wrapped up in pushing each other around instead of playing defense. The Minutemen's loss of concentration led to the three goals.

"The third period became disjointed and I think we got a little bit of a lucky night in terms of catching [Northeastern goaltender Brad] Thiessen not as sharp as he normally is," Cahoon said. "Our team defense in front of the net was absolutely deplorable; they kept working hard to their credit."

James Marcou continues to fly under the radar. The sophomore tallied a career-high four assists in Friday's game, which put him among the Hockey East leaders in points. Marcou (31) is just two points behind Boston University's Colin Wilson for the conference lead.

Marcou's patience and puck handling skills played a huge part in UMass' third goal, its second power-play goal.

UMass forward Alex Berry scores his second goal of the night against Northeastern Saturday. Berry has 10 goals and 13 assists this season.

Anniversary of Vassell

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

Today marks the anniversary of the controversial arrest of former University of Massachusetts student Jason Vassell.

According to a statement released by the Committee for Justice for Jason Vassell (CJJV) coordinator Jasmin Torrejon, "Justice for Jason" will hold a rally at 11:30 a.m. outside MacKimmie Dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area, the place of Vassell's arrest, to demand "that charges against Vassell be dropped entirely, and that UMass Amherst Chancellor Robert Holub both reinstate Vassell as a student and make a statement on behalf of the administration detailing its position on Vassell's case."

Before dawn on Feb. 3, 2008, a confrontation between Vassell and two white men, Jonathan Bosse and John Bowes, both of whom did not attend the University, took place, and resulted in Bosse's and Bowes' suffering from knife wounds, and Vassell's nose was broken.

Vassell was charged with two counts of assault with intent to murder, two counts of aggravated assault and battery with a deadly weapon. Meanwhile, Bowes was charged with two hate crimes and disorderly conduct, and Bosse has not been charged at all.

Vassell's defense said he was the victim of a hate crime, and that Bosse and Bowes instigated the conflict by breaking Vassell's window, following him into the dorm hallway and taunting him with racial epithets.

The reported circumstances of the incident leave many UMass students and staff questioning whether Vassell has been a victim of a hate crime and unjustly charged as a result of his own self-defense or if supporters of Vassell are using Vassell's race as a ploy to excuse his actions.

In addition to attending the rally, "Justice for Jason" wants people to contact Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth Scheibel's office throughout the day to vocalize opinions that protest "the ongoing racist prosecution of Vassell." Dubbing this action, "National Call-In Day," advocates for Vassell recognize that Scheibel's office has the power to remove the charges on Vassell.

"The National Call-In Day" is the beginning of a national campaign asking people from all over the country to express their concern with Jason's case," said Torrejon, a junior sociology major. "The campaign to help Jason has for the most part been a local campaign so as to preserve the reputation of the University and protect Jason's privacy. But it has been a year, and other than being able to mobilize support from the community, there have not been enough results. We need to ask folks from all over the country to express their concern about [Vassell's] case.

"Scheibel is the official who decided not to charge Bosse and Bowes as harshly as Vassell. Bowes faces only a misdemeanor that could mean an 18-month charge, and Bosse has no charges. Vassell is faced with a potential sentence of 30 years," he continued.

"I hope to see unification and solidarity among students, faculty and administration in the UMass community, as well as the Five College community, the Western Mass. Community and even the Massachusetts community, because what happened to Jason Vassell is not something that just affects the UMass community," Torrejon said.

The Committee for Justice for Jason Vassell will hold a rally, march and vigil today in support of the one-year anniversary of former University of Massachusetts student Jason Vassell's arrest.

UM reinstates lacrosse players

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Two of the eight University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse players suspended and dismissed from the team last February have been reinstated to the University.

In addition, senior Jim Connolly and sophomore Ryan Marcus have been added to the team's roster for the 2009 season and have begun practicing.

The pair was cut from the Minutemen, along with six of their teammates, for a violation of team rules. Marcus was arrested for his alleged role in an assault at 304 North Pleasant St. on Feb. 1, 2008, along with former teammates Christian Haggerty and Christopher Casey.

University officials declined to confirm if Connolly's suspension was related to the off-campus incident.

UMass coach Greg Cannella said both student athletes sought reinstatement. Each student petitioned the Dean of Students Office to return to good standing with the University without Cannella's help.

Both players took credits at other institutions during the fall semester, but sacrificed a year of eligibility per NCAA regulations.

As a sophomore, Connolly was the leading goal-scorer for the Minutemen in 2007. The senior was not arrested, but was suspended from the University for a violation of the Code of Student Conduct.

For Marcus, 2009 will mark his first appearance in a UMass uniform. The South Hadley native was a lacrosse high school standout prior to committing to the Minutemen.

However, Marcus has a trial date pending on May 6 at Eastern Hampshire District Court in Belchertown, Mass., along with Haggerty and Casey.

But as with any student who is reinstated after a suspension, further conduct violations could result in permanent expulsion.

The other four did not petition for their return and have enrolled at other colleges.

"A couple guys did call me to apologize about the situation," Cannella said. "But I haven't spoken to any of them since earlier in the fall."

For Cannella, the reinstatement of Connolly and Marcus provides a chance to bring closure to the circumstance and continue rebuilding the program.

"We have an opportunity to re-grow what was lost," he said. "We lost a lot in terms of perception of who we are on campus and the community."

For Connolly and Marcus, it marks a unique chance to make amends for past mistakes, according to Cannella.

"This is a great opportunity to show everybody who they really are," he said. "Regardless of the mistakes they made in the past, they have a chance to right that and to represent the program in a first-class manner."

The coach added that their teammates have actively embraced their return to the field, as both players remained in contact with the team over the past year.

"They both came in very remorseful and apologized to the team," Cannella said. "I felt that those guys who wanted to be back here, deserved the opportunity to be back here."

Cannella added an unusually large amount of freshmen this season to fill the holes in the Minutemen's depleted rosier.

Moose spotted in Amherst

First seen in Brandywine, then in Puffton Village

By David Humphreys
Collegian Staff

Police pursued, but could not apprehend, a wild moose in the North Amherst area Monday afternoon.

The moose, which appeared to be female and approximately 6 feet tall at the shoulder, was reported to the Amherst Police Department Monday morning, once between 9:30 and 10 a.m. near Sherman Street and another time in the early afternoon.

The moose was spotted in the Brandywine Apartments complex around 1:50 p.m. before it ran into Puffton Village and then across North Pleasant Street, near Simple Gifts Farm, and into the woods.

"It's disappeared into the woods at the moment," said APD Animal Welfare Officer Carol Hepburn. "They don't hang around too often. It probably got disorientated. [APD is] not too concerned at this moment ... if it comes downtown or to a heavily populated residential area ... [or] if it seems to be a threat ... then we'll have to do something about it."

If wildlife officials were called in to remove the moose from the area, Stephen DeStefano, a professor and research scientist with the University of Massachusetts Department of Natural Resources and Conservation, said the primary concern would be for safety of the animal and the people involved.

Officials would first try to "haze" the moose to get it out of the area. Hazing, DeStefano said, is the use of noise to deter an animal from crossing a road or other hazardous area, which officials hope would convince it to return to the woods.

What is your opinion on this matter?

On Jan. 12, the Drug Enforcement Administration rejected UMass professor Lyle Craker's request to become a marijuana manufacturer to study its effects for medical use. Do you believe that marijuana should be allowed to be grown for research purposes at UMass?

"To be honest, I would say probably, if it is for legitimate research. This is what research universities do, they tend to be on the cutting edge of research for the country. Also, it gets grant money."

-Robin Clark

Political Science major

"I think it has helped the medical field and, I mean, if we can find stuff and get cures ... then we should be able to research it. Obviously, abusing the drug [is an issue]. Just trying to keep in control who is using it, and if people are misusing it. There is always a chance with drugs around."

-Brittany Garber

Hospitality and Tourism Management major

"Personally, I think absolutely. The potential for benefits in research greatly outweigh the risks, and the potential for success in the lab greatly outweighs the potential for abuse, especially if it is monitored."

-Kaylyn Utley

Biology major

"It depends on what the research is. [If medical], it depends on what the research is. The benefits of it outweigh the risks. There's really not going to be a security problem. No one is going to steal three pot plants. If he [Professor Craker] does it right and if students do it right, there could be a lot of really good outcomes."

Moose may be lost, injured

If that doesn't work, or if the animal or people might be put into an unsafe situation because of the hazing, DeStefano said the next step is to use a sedative dart on the animal and load it into a pickup truck for transport to a state forest or wildlife area.

It is not uncommon for a moose to wander into a nearby town or city, according to DeStefano.

She said some factors leading moose to enter a heavily populated area might be for food, because they are injured or sick or the snow in their habitat is too deep for them to walk easily.

Moose sightings at UMass, although infrequent, are not unheard of.

"We've actually seen that around here... there are a couple of animals that show up by the athletic fields," said DeStefano.

Moose, he said, can create a habitat that stretches five to 20 square miles, though the animals have been known to wander much farther than that in some instances.

Google Earth expands its reach to the ocean

By Paul Rogers
San Jose Mercury News

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Starting Tuesday, if you want to explore the world's oceans – from the bottom of Monterey Bay to Australia's Great Barrier Reef – you won't need a scuba tank or submarine, only a home computer and Internet connection.

Expanding its popular Google Earth software, Google on Monday unveiled an aquatic component – think "Google Ocean" – that aims to turn everyone into Jacques Cousteau.

The new feature combines satellite imagery, underwater photographs, video and scientific data that allows users to see 3-D images of the ocean floor, along with features like the location of ship wrecks and coral reefs.

It was rolled out at a news conference Monday at the California Academy of Sciences in San Francisco's Golden Gate Park, attended by former Vice President Al Gore, singer Jimmy Buffett and a who's who of oceanographers.

Marine scientists predicted that the free software will become an important tool in expanding the public's understanding of the oceans and the environmental challenges facing them.

"Not just sober scientists but the whole world can use this as a way to know the whole world," said oceanographer Sylvia Earle, National Geographic explorer-in-residence. "It took a long time for me to be able to see a turtle underwater, now any little kid can do it."

Oceans cover 70 percent of the earth's surface, yet less than 5 percent of the ocean floor has been mapped in detail. In fact, there are better images of the moon and Mars than of much of the world's undersea topography.

The primary information to create the images came from existing U.S. Navy sonar and data from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration and the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in San Diego.

Marine researchers said they hope scientists will expand the maps in the years ahead, adding more sonar images, wildlife video and other information from their research.

The new version rolled out Monday contains some of that, including the boundaries of the world's marine protected areas, arctic ice and daily sea surface temperature changes, along with the routes of sharks, tuna, turtles and other marine animals that have been tagged with GPS devices by scientists at Stanford University and other institutions.

It also includes historic images, which allow users to see how places have changed over the years.

During the news conference, Gore, who works as a senior advisor to Google, highlighted that feature, discussing his visit to Montana's Glacier National Park in the 1990s. While Google Earth images zoomed in on the park's Grinnell Glacier, Gore noted how much it has melted in the past two decades. The new software also features historic information that showed the glacier's size shrinking since 1991.

"It's practically not even a glacier anymore," Gore said. "When I was there not long ago I walked where that pool of water has formed. This is an extremely powerful new tool.

"One of my fondest hopes is that people around the world will use Google Earth to see for themselves the reality of what is happening because of the climate crisis."

Google Earth, first released in 2005, basically works by creating maps that combine satellite photographs, aerial photography and geographic mapping data to build 3-D images so that computer users can "fly" – like in a video game – from above the Earth to view mountains, coastlines, cities, even streets and houses.

Since then, the software has been used to map the refugee crisis in Darfur, damage from Hurricane Katrina and the aftermath of last year's Chinese earthquake. Google assembled the aquatic version – an automatic download with the new Google Earth 5.0 – after meeting last year with many of the world's top marine scientists.

The ocean images are still a work in progress, however. Many undersea areas that have not been explored in much detail are only depicted in general shapes. Generating high-quality sonar images and photographs of every square foot of ocean floor would be a massive undertaking.

"It would take billions of dollars. You'd need fleets of unmanned underwater vehicles operating in formation, and some countries wouldn't even let you explore their territorial waters," said Marcia McNutt, president of Monterey Bay Aquarium Research Institute, based in Moss Landing, Calif. "It would take at least 25 years."

But previous generations have explored the land and the moon, and perhaps the coming generation will focus on the oceans, several scientists said Monday.

"Sometimes it is tempting for us to think we have explored everything we have to explore," said Terry Garcia, executive vice president of the National Geographic Society.

'Obama effect' a point of study

By Alissa Skelton
Daily Nebraskan

LINCOLN, Neb. — There's no denying people across the nation are excited about President Barack Obama's election. Millions of people attended his historic inauguration, and even more tuned in to watch it on TV.

But a recent study has uncovered another statistic: Obama's charisma and promise of change might have given the black community a newfound confidence.

A recent study discovered a phenomena called the Obama effect, which showed that the academic performance gap between whites and blacks disappeared following Obama's election.

For the study, researchers administered a 20-question test before and after Obama's inauguration. They found there was a noticeable performance gap between whites and blacks on the first test, but on the second, black students performed just as well as white students.

Researchers found that Obama's role as president inspired blacks to overcome racial stereotype anxieties.

Jeannette Jones, an assistant professor of history and ethnic studies at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, said although the study is encouraging for educators, it must be repeated to see if Obama's positive influence on test scores is the real deal.

"It is imperative that we recognize the symbolic power of an African-American president and how that could influence notions of self-worth, belonging in a community that historically was denied equal participation in the body politic and equal protection of the laws," Jones wrote in an e-mail.

Michael Wagner, an assistant professor of political science at UNL, questioned the long-term durability of the Obama effect. He said it might be a short-term effect created by the excitement of the inauguration.

"It would be more likely that a long-term effect would exist if there are regular consistencies of Obama doing well," Wagner said. "The likelihood of the effect succeeding is possible."

Researchers administered test questions from the Graduate Record Exam, which assesses analogies, reading comprehension and sentence completion.

The test was administered to 472 participants, 84 black and 388 white, at different times over the past three months to evaluate the participants' performance rate in correlation with Obama's success.

Participants were between the ages of 18 to 63 and had differing levels of education.

Blacks began performing better on tests administered after Obama's nomination acceptance speech and after Election Day. Researcher Ray Friedman, a management professor at Vanderbilt University, and his colleagues wrote that the racial performance gap after the election was statistically not significant.

The study also showed that blacks who did not watch Obama's nomination acceptance speech continued to perform below whites.

Researchers are unsure how test scores will fluctuate after Obama's inauguration. Jones said she hopes for the best.

"Perhaps, those who have not scored on tests as high as they would have liked, now find the racial pressure lifted from them when they now take a test," Jones said. "But, I must emphasize that we should not expect a symbol to address the systemic, institutionalized racism, sexism and class discrimination that are at the root of many test-taking disparities in America."

Stimulus results unclear

By Kevin G. Hall
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Tax provisions in the economic stimulus legislation introduced Monday on the Senate floor would cut Treasury revenues by at least $350 billion in a bid to spark economic activity. Tax experts say the legislation would achieve that goal, but there's plenty of room for improvement.

The nearly $900 billion plan includes tax cuts and credits as well as a wide range of spending on infrastructure, aid to states, energy, the environment and much more- all designed to prevent the economy from sinking further.

Many Americans swoon at the high price tag and ask a simple question: How will we know it works?

There's no single answer. The Obama administration has said it will use employment as a metric, expecting the stimulus effort to create or save between 3 million and 4 million jobs. However, proving that jobs have been saved that otherwise would've been lost is more art than science.

Another way to measure success is to gauge whether the plan spurs demand for goods and services. If it boosts demand for things that U.S. companies make or sell, more workers will be needed to make, ship and sell the goods and services.

"The trick from the tax side is putting money in people's pockets in ways that they spend it. How do you get people to do something they otherwise wouldn't do if you just gave them money?" said Roberton Williams, a senior fellow at the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture between the Urban Institute and The Brookings Institution, two center-left research organizations in Washington.

In tough economic times, consumers and businesses typically pay down debt and save money in case problems grow worse. That's rational behavior and one reason why consumer spending has plunged. Usually, consumption drives about two thirds of U.S. economic activity. If people are saving, they're not spending, and the economy contracts.

"If people want to save, giving them money will not force them to spend it," Williams said.

To counter this, the Senate measure would put more money into people's paychecks in small amounts that would be more likely to be spent than saved. Academic research shows that small increases in paychecks are viewed as "spendable" income, while larger lump sums are viewed as wealth to be saved.

The legislation would reduce taxes withheld from paychecks. This involves a refundable tax credit worth up to $500 for single filers and $1,000 for joint filers over one year.

Other tax measures in the Senate bill are designed to support poorer Americans who presumably would spend, not save, the money. These include expanding the earned income tax credit and the child tax credit. These wouldn't immediately stimulate the economy since they're claimed on tax forms, and the expansion would apply to the 2009 tax year.

The Senate bill also includes a number of tax provisions designed to free up cash for businesses, but how well they'd work is in dispute. Many of these provisions were sought by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which thinks that the Senate effort isn't sufficient.

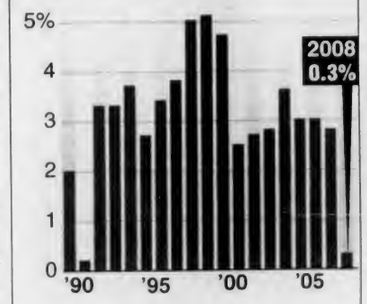
"We are generally just disappointed with the amount of business incentives in there," said Caroline Harris, senior director of tax policy for the Chamber.

The group convinced Democrats to include a provision that would allow them to defer some tax if a company pays down its debt this year or next.

That would help companies with ready cash. Helping them lower their debt burdens presumably would discourage layoffs and perhaps even spark hiring.

To help more companies, the chamber wants this provision to be expanded to allow companies to reduce debt through issuance of additional stock or bonds.

"We'll be pushing for some sort of amendment to expand this," Harris said.



Republican senators, with the backing of big business, also will try to attach an amendment that would allow U.S. companies to bring back, over two years, some of their foreign earnings, which would be taxed at a 5.35 percent rate instead of the standard 35 percent rate.

Qualifying businesses would have to direct at least 5 percent of those returning funds to areas the government deems a national priority.

"The proposal would attract an estimated $565 billion of additional repatriated earnings to the U.S. that would otherwise remain overseas," said Laura Tyson, a former top economic adviser to President Bill Clinton and a University of California, Berkeley, economist, in a Jan. 30 report.

Rescue free education

Education in America is only as strong as it is free. Our University prides itself on the research conducted by professors unencumbered by political agendas, allowed to pursue knowledge down whatever avenue provides the most promise.

Adam McGillen

In the midst of this economic crisis, education from kindergarten all the way to college stands on a perilous edge.

Locally, Gov. Deval Patrick has announced significant cuts in the state budget that will affect education in Massachusetts on a large scale.

Here at the University of Massachusetts, Chancellor Robert C. Holub announced cuts that amount to over $11 million, with a growing possibility of more extensive cuts in the future.

Saving education should obviously be a priority for President Barack Obama's administration. The change this country needs can only grow out of the minds of educated Americans that possess the intellectual capacity for new ideas.

In order to preserve education nationwide, Obama's stimulus plan — recently passed through the House and now awaiting Senate approval — more than doubles the Department of Education's budget to $150 billion.

Typically, the Department of Education distributes its funds through loans and federal student aid, providing money directly to students so they may strive for higher education. With the stimulus plan's focus on infrastructure, government money would now play a larger role in building new schools on the K-12 level as well as repairing older campuses.

Historically speaking, education resides under the jurisdiction of each state.

While the federal government offers financial aid to individual students, state governments decide the amount and the way in which taxpayer money goes toward teacher salaries, construction, repairs and the creation of new school districts — or the dismantling of old ones.

Keeping education in the hands of the states is vitally important to maintaining a diversity of thought in American schools.

After all, systems of thought differ greatly across state lines, endowing America with a wide range of thinkers capable of discovering solutions to the issues facing the United States in this new age. Free thinking drives America forward.

While he must rescue education, Obama must also deliver on his promise of transparency and Americans must watch closely to make sure this boost in federal spending on education remains just that – a boost meant to encourage and not to encumber.

While saving education from a collapse is an absolute necessity, we cannot afford to compromise our ideals in the name of security – whether national or financial.

While saving education from a collapse is an absolute necessity, we cannot afford to compromise our ideals in the name of national or financial security. Obama has demonstrated this philosophy by closing the prison at Guantanamo Bay, a symbolic statement that America will not bend its ethics for the war on terror. Yet, Obama may also threaten that very philosophy with his stimulus plan.

By granting the federal government an enormous stake in education across the country, the Obama administration may be opening the door for a single institution to determine the curriculum offered to young Americans in the future — asking us to sacrifice educational freedom for financial security.

Education lives and breathes as a function of freedom. When professors and students can develop ideas free from governmental oversight, there is no telling the progress that will spring from campuses like our own.

To borrow from George Orwell, allowing the federal government to implement itself so widely into the American education system could effectively create a "Ministry of Truth" with full reign over the distribution of information in every school.

Though that is a gross exaggeration, if the federal government begins to play a large role in the construction of new schools, it could gain a greater deal of influence over the curriculum taught within those schools.

I do not believe that is the goal of the Obama administration, but the new president's stimulus plan does set a precedent that may allow future administrations to take greater control over the education of Americans. In the throes of financial collapse, ensuring that professors continue working and schools continue operating should be a priority.

It appears Obama has made it one, but as students enjoying the freedom of a self-driven education at a state university, we must be wary that this new plan merely stimulates and does not set a standard where policymakers gain the ability to financially determine just how much free thinking we are allowed to do.

College students and young Americans played an enormous role in the push that put Obama in office. But the change sought did not arrive with the simple act of casting a ballot. Students must take responsibility in holding Obama accountable to campaign promises and to watchdog his every move as a vessel of our collective voice.

Cooling down Al Gore's heat

Jon Peterson

With all the problems the country is having – both in the beleaguered financial markets and in the unprecedented cold streak that the country has been going through in the past weeks – why is Al Gore, former Democratic presidential nominee and vice president under Bill Clinton, going before the U.S. Senate and World Economic Forum to tell them that these and all the countries' worries are just distractions from the true horror of global warming?

Make no mistake about it. If what Mr. Gore says is true, and we are causing a problem that will cause the destruction of civilization, then we should be worried.

The U.N. Environmental Program even concluded that "more than half of resorts in France, Italy, Germany, Switzerland and Austria could be forced out of business over the next five decades as the snow line rises."

Make no mistake about it. If what Mr. Gore says is true and we are causing a problem that will cause the destruction of civilization, then we should be worried.

While many believe that the majority of the scientific community has been bought on the idea of global warming – along with much of the U.S. government - the reality is that the United States' and United Nations' environmental programs are run by – and have their policy written by – politicians who readily ignore the words of their own environmental consultants and scientists.

There isn't even consensus in the United Nations though and the Czech president, Vaclav Klaus, told Mr. Gore last week in Davos that he doesn't "think that there is any global warming," adding "I don't see the statistical data for that."

While the majority of lawmakers tend to agree with Mr. Gore, 30,000 scientists – including 9,000 Ph.D. holders – have lined up with the founder of the Weather Channel, John Coleman – so that they may attempt to put together a lawsuit against Mr. Gore for fraud. Some have even threatened to sue unless Mr. Gore took their names off his list of scientists who support his claims about global warming.

A court case in the United Kingdom even ruled in 2007 over whether or not Mr. Gore's acclaimed movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," should be showed in classrooms. It was even ruled as political indoctrination and not suitable for public schools and that it had less to do with science and more with his own personal agenda.

No one can deny that the globe is warming. I even went camping over this past weekend and some of the record snowfall felt a little crispier than usual. It has been warmer and colder in the past centuries and at no point has there been more oil burning than now. Polar bears didn't go extinct then, either.

The consensus of much of the world has seemed to be with Mr. Gore. However, that has changed within the past couple of years. Distinguished scientists – including scientists from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and other top universities have produced documentaries – including one called "The Great Global Warming Swindle," – in which they explain in easily understood methods how much of a joke the worry over climate change really is.

The scientists in the documentary describe some of the natural occurrences they feel do cause climate change, though – whether it be volcanic or even solar activity causing shifts. To these scientists, global warming is occurring, but humans are having less of an effect on the Earth than natural, prolonged cycles of warming and cooling.

This all comes at a time when the country is in a most alarming state.

Millions of homes across the country, many in New Hampshire and neighboring states, have been without power due to severe ice and snow storms.

Billions of dollars are being spent to research bio-fuels that have been caused the prices of corn and other vegetables to go way up, while showing to be very inefficient. People are getting fewer hours from work and they can't afford the expense.

Governments can't afford to spend what they could in better times on such frivolous things. It now seems silly to think that it would be a good idea to try to cut our carbon dioxide emissions by 80 percent, wasting trillions of dollars even as figures from "An Inconvenient Truth" show CO2 rises to lag behind temperature jumps by 800-2,000 years.

In other business and politics, politicians, the media and corporate bodies like Shell –who always loves a good crisis – are all too willing to join with the environmentalist movement. This makes it that much easier to call out as fringe whackos all those who deny global warming.

The difference is that there is now a consensus of scientists – an international financial crisis and a fledgling new administration – as well as a lack of evidence to back up the outrageous claims of people like Mr. Gore. Everyone does agree that the Earth has risen a degree in the past century. What we hear a lot about these days is the belief in change – we just have to learn to be wary of it when it comes in terms of our climate.

Galaxies of the same political agenda

In case you don't know, "Battlestar Galactica" is a science fiction series about the plight of a rag-tag fleet of Colonials human refugees with only the titular warship for protection, against the genocidal robotic Cylons. Their destination is Earth – which is a myth to the Colonials.

Chris Amorosi

Though based on show that was essentially a borderline ripoff of Star Wars steeped in disco from the 1970s, the new Battlestar Galactica is a creature of a post Sept. 11 America. The genesis of both television show and historical era begins in a sneak attack, but in Battlestar Galactica – it is the liberal democracy who loses their war on terror.

One aspect I find fascinating in Battlestar Galactica is its exploration of the government and the military. The human civilization continues its legal traditions despite threats to civilization's very survival, thus setting up an examination of democracy under extreme stress. Much like today, decisions made by the government are in constant conflict with powerful interests, voting blocs and reason itself.

The military obviously forms a component of any war on anything, including on terrorism. Military decisions are made with the understanding that people will die as a result. Objectives and the amount of deaths needed to accomplish those goals are all weighed in the decision-making. Battlestar Galactica forces the viewer to consider what might happen if decisions made in Iraq were carried out here at home.

I warn anyone that intends to read on that I may reveal spoilers from any episodes aired so far. I also implore the fanatical fan to excuse any simplifications I make for clarity and concision. Like this country in 2008, the Colonials experienced a polarized presidential election midway through the series. The fleet came across a habitable planet reasonably hidden from the Cylons just in time for Election Day.

Battlestar Galactica forces the viewer to consider what might happen if decisions made in Iraq were carried out here at home.

One candidate wished to risk a Cylon attack and settle on the planet and the incumbent candidate wanted to continue searching for Earth. The pro-Earth candidate, Roslin, also happened to have an inordinate influence over the fleet's vote counters.

Roslin legitimately lost the election. A majority of the people rejected her safer – though less comfortable – policy. Her underlings immediately rigged the vote by intentionally losing ballots and announcing Roslin as the winner. The commander of the Galactica, Adama, found out he forced Roslin to accept the true results despite even his own misgivings. Subsequently, the Cylons found the Colonials and occupied the planet.

In retrospect for the Colonials and clear in the audience's omniscient perspective, the democratic decision to settle was flawed. Yet there is no easy solution.

Elites like Roslin understood what was at risk. How much responsibility should a government give the voter and his elected representative?

Too little and the people get restless and demand concessions vocally or violently; too much and the people vote on their short term concerns with no regard for the future.

In another episode, the fleet comes across the only other surviving Colonial Battlestar called the Pegasus. The Pegasus' commander, Admiral Cain, outranks Adama so she takes command and orders the civilian ships in the fleet to be stripped for parts. Her intentions were to attack the Cylon fleet with both Pegasus and Galactica to strike a mortal blow against the Cylons and possibly retake the Colonial home worlds. Cain naturally ignores the civilian government of the fleet since the civilians dislike their ships being cannibalized and abandoned by their warship escorts.

Arguably, Cain's plan against the Cylons is a good idea. Previous episodes establish that there is an ongoing genocide against humans on the Colonial home planets. The few tens of thousands left in the fleet may in fact represent a minority of total surviving humans and before finding Galactica Cain had waged a successful guerrilla war against Cylon forces she came across. With double the battlestars at her disposal, risking the civilians in the fleet could have saved lives the Galactica left behind.

Adama negotiates for a limited strike against the Cylons and Cain is assassinated after the battle by a rogue Cylon. Adama uses the victory to buy more time for the Colonials to escape rather than begin an offensive with his two ships.

Did Adama abdicate his responsibility as a soldier to defend civilians by carefully guiding his Baghdad-style Green Zone of a fleet while the majority of his people die in the genocide back home? Or does his "cut-and-run" tactic actually ensure the most safety for the most amount of lives?

We, as a liberal democratic society not under siege, see these fictional events actually occurring in our world today. Iraqis and Afghans are abandoned to violence in the interests of military expediency. Citizens vote with one issue in mind and complacency rather than foresight. The worst part is that these actions can be considered right, good and proper from a certain point of view.

Two Tongues too many

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

No matter how you slice it, there's something inherently flawed about "super groups." For every Traveling Wilburys there has been a laundry list of Velvet Revolvers and Damn Yankees to remind people why some things are best left on the drawing board.

Two Tongues, the new band featuring Max Bemis and Coby Linder of Say Anything along with Chris Conley and David Soloway of Saves the Day, is the latest act to adorn this loose title. Today marks the release of their much-anticipated self-titled debut and while the collaboration may sound like a wet dream for the repressed 16-year-old in many college-aged students, the resulting recording is far less satisfying.

Bemis himself describes the album as a story about the relationship between yin and yang, an album for anyone who has found another half in each other, romantically or platonically. After one listen through the album's 13 tracks it becomes clear what Bemis' newspeak is slang for: whiny unrequited love songs, and uninspiring ones at that.

The album opens with "Crawl," a suitable-enough introduction that begins with some punctual percussion over Bemis' unmistakable vocals, pleading "Wait, don't go with him / Slay the hole within / I crave your holiday / So take me far away." Before Conley belts the song's chorus with a vocal whine more profoundly juvenile than anything he's produced to date.

Following this largely mediocre opener, it's all downhill. The awkwardly angst-filled duet "If I Could Make You Do Things" transitions into the snore-inducing "Dead Lizard," setting the table for a slew of utterly forgettable songs.

Ultimately, Two Tongues' debut fails miserably on a variety of levels, chiefly on the lyrical front. The collaboration apparently has forgotten exactly what drew hordes of young fans to their respective bands in the first place. Instead of utilizing lyrical metaphors or attacking pop-culture status quos, the band settles for cheaply constructed and cliché-ridden love songs.

Conley, who has been writing and recording music remarkably more mature than this effort since he was in his mid-teens, sounds downright childish throughout the album. Bemis, who can usually be counted on at the very least for some lyrical edginess, doesn't come off any more favorably.

It's slightly embarrassing listening to a man who once renowned for his lyricism at age 17 croon about eating uncooked bacon at 28, but during the 13-track album that's about as deep as Conley gets. Worst of all, the bit about the bacon comes during the album's only cover, "Even If You Don't."

Original tracks like "Wowee Zowee" sound more fitting for the next angst-inspired Disney rock special, with its sheepishly defiant chorus of "Hey! Hey! Cut it out! / What you gonna do about it / I don't wanna go home unless I'm not alone," than on an album produced by two men in their late 20s.

With lyrics like that it's hard to blame Bemis for calling the record "one of the most emotional musical journeys" he's ever been involved in.

The band explores some more profound lyrical territory on the aptly titled "Come On." "Come on! Come on! / Get up! Get up! Get up! / I won't let you down again," Conley and Bemis belt out roughly 200 times in unison during the subtwo minute opus.

Unfortunately, the duo does, in spectacular fashion, no less than four more times before the album comes to a welcomed and long overdue conclusion. Oh, how the mighty have fallen.

Two Tongues, a band featuring members of Say Anything and Saves the Day, released its self-titled debut album today. The album falls short in many categories, especially the group's lyrics.

Slavery myths debunked

Browne takes action in film

By Kate Olesin
Collegian Staff

Facing the past is something many people dread. But when Katrina Browne discovered her, ancestors were the largest slave-trading family in the United States, it prompted her to take action and create a documentary film.

The film "Traces of the Trade: A Story from the Deep North" will be shown at the University of Massachusetts tomorrow evening with a question-and-answer period featuring Browne and two family members after the screening.

"Traces of the Trade" depicts the history of the DeWolf family and serves as an attempt to debunk the myth that the American South was solely responsible for slavery. In fact, Rhode Island had the largest share of the slave trade than any other state, according to the film's website.

What is especially chilling about the family history is the extent of their involvement in the slave trade.

"Over the generations, the family owned 47 ships that transported thousands of Africans across the Middle Passage into slavery," the film's website reads. "They amassed an enormous fortune. By the end of his life, James DeWolf had been a U.S. Senator and was reportedly the second-richest man in the United States."

The film received the Courage in Filmmaking award by the Women Film Critics Circle, who also deemed it as one of the three best of 2008. It has received positive reviews by The New York Times, The Boston Globe and The Philadelphia Inquirer, among others. In addition, the film appeared on PBS in June 2008.

The documentary is being presented in honor of Black History Month, but is also intended to educate the campus community about the legacy that slavery holds in not just the United States, but specifically in the northern states.

"Particularly in New England we think we can take a pass on slavery because we weren't necessarily the slave owner," said University Health Services health educator Tom Schiff, also an organizer for the event. "But yet here we have a history where an incredible amount of wealth was accumulated through the trafficking of human beings."

Schiff worked with groups such as the Women of Color Leadership Network, the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students and the Malcolm X Cultural Center to put the event together. But he happens to be a personal friend and former colleague of one of the family members in the film, Holly Fulton.

Fulton, who formerly lived in Deerfield, Mass., before moving to Colorado and then back to the east coast in Peabody, Mass., will be present, along with her husband, William Peebles, after the film to answer questions. Before launching the film, she was a senior staff member at and AmeriCorps program she co-founded in 1991 called Public Allies, according to the film's website.

But Schiff hopes the film will not only be an educational supplement for those pursuing subjects related to the topics in the film, but that it will keep up what he calls the University's "progressive" attitude toward histories and topics of race.

"I think that a film like this, as well as other educational efforts that happen, allow us to continue to fill in the pictures of history – the realities of history," he said. "It's not about trying about making people feel guilty about [slavery] but take a really hard look about what we have been and what we can be."

"Traces of the Trade: A Story from the Deep North" will be shown at 7 p.m. Wednesday, Feb 4 in Bartlett Hall 65 with a question- and-answer period following the screening. The showing is free and open to the public. To learn more about the film visit www.tracesofthetrade.org

Condon shows growth in album

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

Sante Fe, N.M., native Zach Condon has spent the last three years on somewhat of a musical pilgrimage. Part-traveler, part-troubadour, the 22 year old continues to evolve with each borderline and boundary he crosses, musically incorporating the cultures he encounters along the way.

With his debut album 1200cc's ("Gulag Orkestar") Condon brought listeners to southeastern Europe and supplied them with a lavish history lesson in traditional Balkan sounds and culture. His follow-up, "The Flying Club Cup," painted visuals of cobblestone walkways and crowded cafés, each song acting as a portrait of its own distinctive area in France.

For his latest offering, the ukulele-wielding songwriter decided to take a simultaneous step backward and forward, bringing listeners full circle with the double EP "March of the Zapotec / Holland."

The first disc, "March of the Zapotec," is the result of Condon's recent venture and subsequent experiences in Oaxaca, Mexico. To add further depth and authenticity to the recording, Condon employed The Jimenez Band, a 19-piece band from Teotitlan del Valle, as his backing band.

Following a 30-second instrumental reminiscent of a sideshow circus band the album begins with "La Llorona." The track sticks to a tested and true formula by layering Condon's vocals over a simple tuba and trumpet backbeat before cymbal crashes and strings enter the mix to compliment more prominent flourishes of trumpet.

From the songs instrumentation and his unmistakable vocal melodies it is clear from the album's very incipiency that Condon is not looking to re-invent himself. Instead, he is building on what he already knows, incorporating Mexican flavors into his already robust repertoire of styles.

"The Akara" opens with sorrowful sounding trumpet before blending into sad and simple ukulele strums. With a morose tone suited best for a funeral procession, Condon mournfully sings understated lyrics "And so long, mistress sings So long, I can't wait To my love Wait one more."

Concluding the album is "The Shrew." The selection offers a welcome break from the weighted instrumentation of the previous cuts with an up-tempo three-step waltz introduction. Ultimately the song revolves around the theme of lost love, however, with Condon quipping "How long she's been by my side But at last, the stable's retired." The song masterfully builds into a frantic barrage of horns, accordions and strings before abruptly easing to its original pace.

To say the album ends on a high note is an understatement. "The Shrew" is easily one of the young songwriter's most accomplished compositions to date, a tantalizing accumulation of several years of worldly travel.

The second disc, "Holland" is a solo-composed return to Condon's bedroom-inspired recordings and pseudonym [Realpeople] that predates any of his Beirut material.

The album's five tracks are saturated with Condon's teenage influences. "Holland" plays out almost like an homage to Stephin Merritt and The Magnetic Fields with its playful and often cheesy Casiotone synth beats overlaid with sultry baritone vocals. It is Condon at his loosest and most laid back, and

Martin releases debut album

By Randy Lewis
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES — Steve Martin has a reputation as one of the toughest interviews in the entertainment business. He's known for yes-no responses to questions about the making of his latest film, his thoughts on the art of comedy or, especially, his personal life.

But bring up a subject that's near and dear to his heart – like, say, the banjo – and he's a different guy.

"I'm ready to talk music," Martin said recently between a raft of promotional interviews for "The Pink Panther 2," which opens next week.

The music in question is his debut album as a musician, "The Crow," subtitled, "New Songs for the Five-String Banjo." He may once have relied on his banjo as one of the signature props in his stand-up comedy act, along with the fake arrow through the head and a set of fluffy bunny ears, but now that he's working it back into his life again, it's not for laughs.

Need proof? Just check the list of guests he's rounded up: country and bluegrass heavyweights Dolly Parton, Vince Gill, Earl Scruggs, Tim O'Brien and Tony Trischka are there, along with Irish singer Mary Black, helping out on 15 tunes that Martin wrote or co-wrote.

"I really started to think about it last summer," Martin, 63, said. "A record isn't like a movie – you can get it together pretty fast. I first thought maybe I'd do a banjo presentation record, where I'd play a couple of songs and get a bunch of other players to do the rest. Then I realized I had enough of my own songs to do an album of them."

The album was produced by John McEuen, the multi-instrumentalist from the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and a friend of Martin's for 40-plus years. Most of the songs are instrumentals, a few written more than 30 years ago, Martin said.

He came up with the others in the last three years after collaborations with Scruggs ("He taught me how to play 'Sally Goodin' when I was 21 – he's very generous") and Trischka reawakened his desire to play more actively than he has in decades.

The title song, which Martin recorded for Trischka's album "Double Banjo Bluegrass Spectacular" in 2007, "actually became a minor hit on the bluegrass charts," he said. "That got me thinking about other songs and just coming back to the banjo, which I'd always played idly."

The one track with an overt sense of humor is "Late for School," a briskly paced bluegrass workout with whimsical lyrics built around one schoolkid's stream-of-conciousness recitation of his fear of being tardy.

The wit in "Daddy Played the Banjo," which Martin wrote with Scruggs son Gary, is more subtle. It's a faux musical folk tale with a surprisingly sweet lyrical twist, while "Pretty Flowers," which reunites Parton

Zack Condon's new double EP, "March of the Zapotec/Holland," will be released on Feb. 17 featuring a more mature sound.

Instrumental power

while the result is far from a masterpiece, it offers a refreshing glimpse into how far he has evolved as a songwriter.

The EP's opener "My Night with a Prostitute from Marseille" is nothing new for most fans of the band. The track gained widespread Internet fame following its inclusion on Natalie Portman's digital-only, charity compilation "The Big Change" and has been floating around various music blogs for some time since.

The album hits its stride on "Venice," with the inclusion of trumpet over an electronic backdrop and picks up steam transitioning into the album's strongest offering, "The Concubine." The track implements glockenspiel and accordion in favor of straight synth. The song feels somewhat out of place among the rest of the more stripped down, digital works, but is a joy nonetheless.

"Holland" concludes on the 80s-inspired, yet unfortunately uninspiring electronic drum-heavy instrumental, "No Dice."

Whereas "March's" true strength is in its instrumental arrangements, "Holland" allows Condon to showcase his prowess for sweeping vocal melodies. The idea of a Condon-composed instrumental only utilizing digital instrumentation seems conceptually flawed, and the finished product does little to prove otherwise.

As a complete package, "March of the Zapotec / Holland" is an ideal EP for the ever-evolving artist. It's both a glimpse into the future and a retrospective in one. And while "Holland" is not in itself a groundbreaking release, it is an important companion piece that allows listeners to see how far the young songwriter has progressed: from bedroom synth beats to 19-piece waltzes.

Beirut's "March of the Zapotec" will be released Tuesday, Feb. 17 on Pompeii Ba Da Bing Records.

Zack Condon's most recent album is about his experiences in Oaxaca, Mexico, staying authentic by using a 19 piece band from Mexico.

Steve Martin releases his first album, "The Crow," because he didn't know what else to do with the songs he had written.

Actor welcomed into bluegrass circle

and Gill as duet partners, also might generate smiles for the way it gently transforms the time-honored courting ritual.

The album, Martin said, wasn't meant to dazzle with his musical skills – even though he turns out to be an accomplished instrumentalist and an inventive composer.

"It was more like, 'Gee, I've written these songs. What should I do with them?'"

Besides, as he pointed out to Trischka upon being invited to play one of the duets on the "Bluegrass Spectacular" album, "there's about a million guys who could play the traditional tunes better than I can."

Maybe so, but the bluegrass pros have welcomed Martin into their circle. Avant-bluegrass players Trischka and Bela Fleck came along for a televised performance of "The Crow." Martin also held his own on a "Late Show With David Letterman" appearance when Scruggs led an all-star jam on the bluegrass national anthem, "Foggy Mountain Breakdown," with a little help from friends Gill, Marty Stuart, Albert Lee and a slew of other top-drawer pickers.

Still, Martin has his reasons for focusing on his own tunes.

"In the last two years, I went back to tablature, learning different songs like (the banjo standard) 'Nola.' "I spent a year learning 'Nola' and got it down pretty good," he said, exhibiting no small sense of pride in the accomplishment. "Then for a little while I didn't play and it just vanished. So I realized it was best to stick to my own songs."

In what was the closest he came to a punch line during the genial interview, he added: "They're easier for me to remember."

Independent awards help young talent

Folkmans give artists a nudge

By Douglass Crouse
McClatchy Newspapers

CLIFTON, N.J. — Composing and performing a crowd-rousing tune is tough enough.

Then there are booking gigs, managing venue accounts, keeping in touch with fans and landing a distribution deal. At a time when anybody can string together a few notes and upload the result to the Web, attracting and maintaining an audience can challenge a musical artist's pluck.

It was to elevate such talented, flying-under-the-radar performers that Martin and Jude Folkman created the Independent Music Awards nine years ago. At times, they discover singers and bands with a local or regional following who just need a nudge to go big.

These aren't "American Idol" competitors with a part-time hobby. "The artists we support are the ones who do it because they can't imagine not doing it," Martin Folkman said.

No cash or prizes are given out. Each year's winning songs are sent in CD form to radio and television stations and made available as downloads through emusic.com.

For the artists, there is also the pride of praise from some of the biggest names in music.

Judges for the most recent awards included Peter Gabriel, Roger Daltrey of The Who, country star Clint Black, alternative rocker Suzanne Vega and blues guitarist Buddy Guy, each of whom selected winners in specific categories from a pool of five finalists.

Last year the program attracted 8,000 entries from around the world in 56 categories.

Richard Julian, a pop- and folk-influenced songwriter from New York City, won the Album of the Year category in 2003 for "Good Life." He's since signed with EMI's Blue Note Label Group, and is a member – along with Norah Jones – of the Little Willies.

"Anytime you're doing things on your own indie-style, something like this can lend credibility to it," he said of the IMA award. "I did well by letting people know I'd won and persuading them to go back and give it (the CD) a fresh listen."

Running the IMA is only part of the Folkman story. The couple's company, the Music Resource Group, also publishes an online and annual print version of The Musician's Atlas, an information guide and directory of music industry contacts. And they send out a monthly electronic newsletter to 89,000 music industry entrepreneurs.

The first edition of the atlas came out in the fall of 1998. The Folkmans sought to provide the information often neglected by larger, pricier guides – the stage size at each venue, the quality of sound systems and availability of a sound engineer, for instance.

Big labels use the print guide for talent development. And at $49.95, artists can afford to keep one in their backpack. Online, they can find updated contact info for venues around the country and practical advice on nearby hotels and restaurants.

Managing Editor Lauren Veteri said the atlas provides answers to the concerns she hears most often from artists, who often distribute their music on their own rather than pursue major labels.

"A lot of bands don't know how to turn their art into money," she said. "Some creative types don't understand the business side of it or even just hate that aspect of it."

Until last month the Folkmans ran their 11-year-old company out of their Montclair, N.J., home, where space was so tight that one employee a week had to work offsite. They moved into a Clifton warehouse last month.

Everyone at the company has some sort of musical background; the editor of their club section, Robert Fontana, is a former winner in the IMA's pop/rock category. They plan to hire more staff soon, including at least one Web designer.

Jude Folkman had entrepreneurship in her blood: her father, Melvin Cohen, founded Handi-Hut Inc., a manufacturer of bus shelters, and Dome'l, a door and skylight maker. Both are based in the same Clifton building the Folkmans now occupy.

Martin first learned music appreciation while sitting at his mother's feet as she played piano and his father sang. He still plays guitar, although generally not in public.

"We really appreciate the artistry and chutzpah it takes to put your thoughts and energy into a piece of music and then put it out there for the world to hear," he said.

He and his wife previously ran a public relations and marketing firm, with many of their clients connected to the music business.

"We decided it was no longer fun to promote other people's products – we wanted our own," Martin said.

At the time, the promise of the Internet was fast becoming clear, as artists such as Ani DiFranco bypassed the major labels to put out music independently.

"As we looked around, we saw that independent artists in all genres were beginning to strike out on their own," Jude said.

To further those efforts, the Music Resource Group plans more live events in New York City.

"Artists performing live in front of an audience will always be the best way to make those connections," Martin Folkman said.

Roger Daltry, of The Who, is one of the judges for the most recent Independent Music Awards event.

Steelers wide receiver Santonio Holmes raises his arms in celebration after making the go-ahead touchdown catch with 35 seconds left in Super Bowl XIII. Holmes was named MVP in Pittsburgh's 27-23 victory.

Holmes shines in SB

By Joe Posnanski
McClatchy Newspapers

TAMPA, Fla. — There was Santonio Holmes, in the moment, and there's no counting how many times he had practiced this, no guessing how often he had dreamed this precise dream. The football came fast and high. His feet were close to the sidelines. The whole blessed country was watching. It was the Super Bowl. All he had to do was catch the ball.

Of course, Holmes always believed he would catch the ball if he got the chance. Don't we all believe that? That's the beautiful thing about sports, the thing that brings us all closer. The players out there may be bigger, stronger, faster. But in the end, we all want to believe the same thing, right? We all want to believe that, in our own way, we would catch the ball to win the Super Bowl.

What a game. Do you remember when the Super Bowl games were annual jokes, yearly blowouts played between funny commercials? Suddenly, a few years ago, the games started to become tense and wonderful. Mike Jones tackled Kevin Dyson a yard short of the goal line. Adam Vinatieri made the long field goal. He made the field goal again. Eli Manning threw the ball and David Tyree caught it against his helmet. Every year's game seemed to top the last.

Then, there was this one: Pittsburgh vs. Arizona. What a game. There were so many great plays, too many to remember. There was Arizona receiver Larry Fitzgerald catching the ball over the top of a Steelers defender. There was Pittsburgh quarterback Ben Roethlisberger running around and throwing good passes while dragging Cardinals defenders the way the honeymoon car drags tin cans.

There was Pittsburgh's James Harrison making what might go down as the most remarkable play in Super Bowl history, a 100-yard interception return that ended the first half, a stumbling, rambling, teetering masterpiece that seemed to start and stop seven different times but did not stop until he leaped helmet-first into the end zone.

And there was Fitzgerald one more time – no receiver has ever dominated a playoffs the way Fitzgerald has dominated this one – and he caught the pass over the middle, sprinted the last 64 yards, scored the touchdown that gave the amazing Arizona Cardinals a three-point lead with 2:37 remaining. It had been 61 years (and three different home cities) since the Cardinals won a championship.

"Yeah," Fitzgerald would say. "I thought we were going to win."

That took us to Santonio Holmes' moment. He walked into the Pittsburgh huddle to start the Steelers' final drive, and he would claim to say this to Roethlisberger: "Ben, I want the ball in my hands no matter what, no matter where it is."

Did he really say that? Holmes is just a third-year wide receiver. He had never led the Steelers in receptions. He had never been a team leader like his fellow receiver Hines Ward. The words don't seem to fit.

But ... there was always something about Holmes, a sort of determination that you could not help but notice. "Santonio is a guy who just loves to deliver in the big moments," Steelers coach Mike Tomlin would say. And this was something everyone on the Steelers understood. Holmes was hungry to be the hero.

"There was a couple of guys grabbing me," Holmes would say, "and they were telling me, 'Ten (his number), you are going to be the guy to make a play for the team. Don't give up on it.' I almost lost it for a minute."

Sure, maybe it came from how he grew up. His mother was 16 when he was born in Belle Glade, Fla. They lived in a housing project. To entertain reporters, Holmes sometimes would tell stories about how he chased rabbits through the mud. There was nothing else to do in their little town, and they could get three dollars per rabbit.

"I think it strengthened my legs," he would say.

Of course, it wasn't always that innocent, wasn't just about chasing rabbits. Holmes admitted this week that he sold drugs while he was in high school. He admitted it this week because this was the big stage, and he wanted people to know what he had overcome, he wanted people to know what he had to do to get here. It hasn't been easy for Holmes. He's had his brushes with the law. He's had his moments of despair. But he wanted everyone to know that he overcame it, he made it from nothing, from the street corner, and he reached the Super Bowl.

"I believed in myself," he said.

And that final drive, barely more than 2 minutes left, the Steelers were backed up to their own 12, and then Holmes caught a 14-yard pass. Two plays later, he caught a 13-yarder for a first down. Two plays later, he worked free, caught a pass, turned and ran all the way to the Arizona 6, a wild 40-yard play. There were 49 seconds left.

Self among the best

Kansas loses 5 players to NBA, undefeated in Big 12

By Chuck Carlton
McClatchy Newspapers

The only misstep for Kansas coach Bill Self this season might have been saying too much to a top recruit after a high school game.

Life after a national championship was supposed to involve pain, even at a program with the credentials of Kansas. The Jayhawks saw five players drafted by the NBA and did not return a single starter this season.

So much for rebuilding.

Kansas (17-4, 6-0) enters tonight's road game at Baylor as one of two undefeated teams in Big 12 play, joining Oklahoma. It's veteran-laden Baylor that desperately needs a win after three consecutive losses.

Michigan State coach Tom Izzo, whose team beat the Jayhawks last month, said "it was a joke" that Kansas wasn't ranked.

Nebraska coach Doc Sadler gave Self high marks for managing talent and egos last season, and regrouping now.

"Is he the best coach in the country? I don't know," Sadler said. "But I can promise you this: when you talk about one of the best coaches in the country at any level, college or pro, his name will be mentioned."

Before the season began, Self appeared to be in perpetual smile mode, enjoying the attention and satisfaction that came with delivering a title.

Self said he couldn't understand how some coaches would avoid revisiting the championship game video. It had become part of his routine at home. And it never got old.

Now he may have a chance for a sequel, if not this season, maybe in 2010.

"This group, if they stay together for a couple more years, can be the same type of team," Sadler said.

Point guard Sherron Collins ranks third in the Big 12 in scoring (18.3 ppg). As a junior, he qualifies as an elder statesman.

"They need somebody to feed off of, and he's certainly been the guy for that," said Self, who recounted a recent demonstration of Collins' leadership in practice. "He made a unique statement the other day. He said 'It's my job to make sure our guys provide the effort. It's coach's job to correct us.'"

Cole Aldrich, a 6-11 sophomore, shoots 65 percent from field and averages nearly a double-double (14.2 points, 9.8 rebounds).

Several freshmen have played key roles.

The adjustment to college has been harder than it looks, according to forward Markieff Morris.

"We're getting used to everything," Morris said. "We had to get used to playing all the time, even when you're tired. We had to get used to being able to take up all the slack."

At times, the Jayhawks haven't risen to the occasion, with double-figure losses to Arizona and Michigan State. Self has fretted about his team's toughness away from Allen Fieldhouse.

But that's relatively small stuff, about as minor as the brief postgame chitchat between Self and John Wall, a 6-4 guard from North Carolina considered the nation's top high school recruit.

Self acknowledged congratulating Wall in passing, during a period when the NCAA forbids all but briefest of exchanges. Kansas athletic officials are investigating the exchange.

Minutemen mostly healthy

Good wins, bad losses

Despite the 7-12 record, the Minutemen have some big wins this season. A victory over Xavier (7 RPI) would have topped them all, but in addition to Kansas (17-4, 23 RPI), UMass also topped Dayton (20-2, 32 RPI) and Temple (12-8, 48 RPI).

It seems like the Minutemen have either played up to their level of competition, or down. The losses to Toledo and Jacksonville State (at home) top the list, but UMass also lost to Saint Louis (11-8, 175 RPI), La Salle (12-8, 107 RPI), Charlotte (7-13, 194 RPI) and Southern Illinois (9-12, 125 RPI) in games the Minutemen probably feel they should have won.

This trend isn't all-encompassing, however, since UMass did not play well against some strong teams, including Vanderbilt (78-48 home loss), Houston (80-54) or then- No. 13 Memphis (80-58).

Postseason?

An automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament is not a possibility for the Minutemen this season. UMass still has a lot of work to do just to make their third-straight National Invitation Tournament appearance.

To qualify for the NIT, a team has to finish the season with a record of at least .500. At 7-12, UMass would have to win eight of its 10 remaining regular-season games to get over the .500 mark. If the Minutemen were to go 7-3 in their last 10 games, that would bring their record to 14-15 – meaning they would have to win at least two games in the A-10 Tournament to be eligible for an NIT bid.

Injury luck

Kellogg uses a nine-man rotation, mixing in four bench players with his regular starting five. Four of his starters – Tony Gaffney, Anthony Gurley, Lowe and Harris – have played in all 19 games this season, and other than some scrapes here and there, have been at full strength.

UMass has only had two real injuries to speak of this season, losing 7-footer Luke Bonner to a knee injury for seven games early in the season. Sophomore Matt Hill was lost for the season (torn ACL) after playing in three games, totaling 27 minutes of game action. He wasn't expected to receive much playing time this season. He finished with three points and three rebounds.

default win at No. 6. Lecluyse took the first set 6-2 and was tied at three all in the second until Cortes pulled out, retiring.

No. 1 Boney dropped the first set 6-2 to Selma Babich. After fighting back in the second set, Boney eventually fell 6-4, giving the Minutewomen their only loss of the day.

Grinding out a tough win at No. 2 singles was Carpenter, who was victorious 7-5, 7-6 (1) over Harvey.

Also pulling out a hard-fought win was Hodgson at No. 4, who defeated Hosotsuji 6-3, 7-5. At No. 5, Danai added a victory beating Lahens 6-2, 6-1.

Dixon was impressed by her team's performance coming out of the gate to begin the season.

"I felt that our effort was really strong and that our play was as good as could be expected considering it was our first match and we haven't competed since November," Dixon said. "Our intention and intensity was very good and the team play was right where it should be."

However, she still feels there is room for improvement.

"We needed to begin better and close out better towards the end" Dixon said. "The kids were very nervous and that is to be expected. That usually is the case when you haven't been mentally acclaimed to matches."

UMass looks to continue their strong start to the season this Sunday when they host Atlantic 10 Conference opponent Fordham at the Bay Road Tennis Club.

Lauren MacKay, along with her partner Kaitlyn Carpenter, won their doubles match 8-5 after falling behind 5-0 in the first five sets.

Chris Lowe attempts to drive to the basket against Toledo Dec. 3. UMass lost to the Rockets 57-56 on a last-second tip-in. Toledo currently has a 4-17 overall record and a 310 RPI.

Men surpass expectations, Cotto wins 55-meter hurdles

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Correspondent

Heading into Friday's Boston Games, Massachusetts men's track and field coach Ken O'Brien planned on tinkering with his strategy.

"Most people will be working their 'second event' for this meet," O'Brien said. "But I still have high expectations."

The Minutemen all but surpassed those expectations by finishing second in a field of 13 teams. Junior Tyler Cotto continued his blazing start with a first-place finish in the 55-meter hurdles. Freshman Zach Koncki also finished third in the hurdles with a time of 8.02 seconds.

The Minutemen scored the most points in the 5000-meter event. Junior Nicolai Naranjo finished third with a time of 14 minutes, 53.47 seconds, while junior Jonathon Pierce finished right behind him with a time of 14:32.92.

Seniors Peter Fortunato and Josh Boone left their mark in the mile. Fortunato finished third with a time of 4:16.89, as Boone clocked in 3:28 seconds behind him in fourth place.

Sophomores Darius Velez and Scott VanderMolen earned third-place finishes. Velez completed the 55-meter dash in 6.50 seconds and VanderMolen finished the 1,000-meters with a time of 2:32.95.

The women's team also had a strong showing at the Reebok Games. Most of the team's points came from the field events, with junior Lisa Wilson leading the way. Wilson scored the most points for the Minutewomen, finishing third in the shot put (43-05.25 inches) and seventh in the weight throw (49-00.25).

Other strong field events performances came from Stephanie Aguguo and Kristen Bakanowski. Aguguo finished third in the triple jump, while Bakanowski did the same in the pole vault.

Junior Holly Heinricher placed third in the 200 meters with a time of 25.62 seconds. Heinricher also placed third in the 4x400-relay along with Claire Petit, and sisters Kirsten Bakanowski and Brittany Bakanowski.

Northeastern finished first in the men's division by scoring 118 points. The Huskies were propelled by the first-place finishes of Adrian Li (high jump and long jump), Brian Racca (triple jump), Nate Hunter (shot put) and Bamidele Faboyede (weight throw).

The Huskies were followed in standings by UMass (83.5 points), Stonehill (66), Vermont (59) and Maine (58.5). UMass-Lowell finished 3.5 points behind Maine.

On the women's side, Boston College finished first, followed by South Florida, Northeastern, Vermont and UMass. The Minutewomen beat Maine by four and a half points to finish fifth.

Like the Northeastern men's team, the BC women's squad notched five first-place finishes. Junior Caitlyn Bailey won the 800 meters with a time of 2:07.95, which was good enough to qualify her for the NCAA Provisionals. The Eagles also claimed the top five spots in the mile, with senior Mallory Champa winning the event.

Both the UMass men's and women's teams return to action Friday for the Gregengack Invitational at Yale University. The meet starts at 6 p.m. and ends Sunday afternoon.

Limiting turnovers key to victory

interesting area of the game when the two teams meet.

UMass has the players to make these shots and that's why they have more than twice as many 3-point attempts as the Rams.

As well as being an inside player, Danella shoots 40 percent from 3-point range, senior captain Stefanie Gerardot shoots 33 percent and sophomore Cerie Mosgrove is shooting 36 percent from 3-point land off the bench.

Rhode Island is one of the worst teams in the A-10 at the defending the 3-point shot. The Rams are letting teams sink 35 percent of their shots from beyond the arc.

At 6-feet tall, Mosgrove is also a body to put on bigger players.

For the Minutewomen, the major issue against URI won't be on the boards but in the open court. UMass has 410 turnovers to Rhode Island's 170 steals. Opponents have stolen the ball from the Minutewomen 184 times this season.

The transition game will need to be a focal point for UMass as well. Most of the Minutewomen's turnovers occured when the Minutewomen were trying to set the offense and it's because of poor passing and a lack of composure on offense.

Shoniker will run the offense for the Rams. She's a fiery player whose intensity sometimes gets the best of her. Like Cooper, She is a physical player and frequently gets into foul trouble. Her 50 fouls are second on the team and she has fouled out of five games this season.

Lindsay Harris is another player that gives the Rams a spark. At 5-foot-10, she leads Rhode Island in steals (42) as well as blocks (17). UMass coach Marnie Dacko will probably put Diatiema Hill on Harris because they are similar players as they are the defensive stoppers for their respective teams.

The Minutewomen have made a record breaking number of 3-pointers this season, with 137 baskets from long range. Stefanie Gerardot, above, and Kristina Danella are the primary shooters.

3-pointers crucial to UMass

one-dimensional offense.

When the sharpshooters are hitting their shots, it opens up the opposing team's defense and exposes them inside. This allows guards Diatiema Hill and Sakera Young to drive to the hoop or pass the ball to sophomore forward Teya Wright in the post.

"If they're hitting from the outside, that allows me and [Young] to get to the basket," Hill said. "And they're going to double up on us and we can pass it out to our shooters."

UMass relies on the efforts of their three main deep threats to do the bulk of the scoring. Gerardot, the team's leading scorer, has shown the ability to score inside and out but is most dangerous when she is behind the 3-point line. Mosgrove has already broken the school's single-season record for 3-pointers and continues to add to it at a torrid pace. Finally, Danella has emerged as an additional threat from deep and has accumulated the third-highest scoring average on the team since working her way into the starting lineup against Northeastern.

However, when the 3-point shot is not working for UMass, the team begins to struggle offensively. Saturday's game against Saint Louis was a example of this as the Minutewomen went 0-for-9 from behind the arc and went into halftime trailing 34-25 and were down as many as 17 points.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko, feels her team is talented enough to pull itself out of bad shooting streaks.

"When I see we go 0-for-9, I'm thinking the next time we're going 9-for-18, I think that's how quickly we're going to turn it around," Dacko said. "We've got people who can step up and knock the ball down."

The coach's beliefs were confirmed in the second half of the game against the Billikens. The Minutewomen shot 53.6 percent from the field in the second half, including 4-of-9 for three, and pulled within three points in a close loss.

Although the mainstay of the UMass offense is the 3-pointer, the alternative sources of scoring, such as guard penetration and post play, have supplemented the core of shooters.

Wright, who was the team's second-leading scorer, is a constant threat for a double-double, but has a tendency to get into foul trouble and take herself out of games. Also, guards Hill, who is coming off of a major knee injury, and Young, who has developed into a major offensive threat as of late, have been able to take advantage of defenses overreacting to the Minutewomen's 3-point threat.

Steelers add to legacy, win 6th NFL title

By Mark Craig
McClatchy Newspapers

TAMPA, Fla. — Move over, Cowboys. There's a new America's Team and it's located in the heart of the Rust Belt in western Pennsylvania.

Riding the greatest play in Super Bowl history and surviving one of the wildest fourth quarters in the game's 43-year existence, the Pittsburgh Steelers beat the Arizona Cardinals, 27-23, in Super Bowl XLIII at Raymond James Stadium.

It's a record sixth Super Bowl title for the league's best franchise, bar none. A franchise that doesn't sign thugs named Pacman, problem children named T.O. or make news for any other silliness off the field.

The Steelers make news for winning. Winning Super Bowls, in particular. Chuck Noll won the first of four in his sixth season. Bill Cowher won his only one in his fourth season. And now Mike Tomlin has won his first in his second season to become the youngest coach to win a Super Bowl (36) and, believe it or not, the third former Vikings coordinator to go on and win a Super Bowl as a head coach elsewhere since 2000.

"I'm not concerned about my personal milestones," Tomlin said. "I just want to contribute to the legacy of the Pittsburgh Steelers."

He did. And in doing so, the Steelers turned in a play that will be discussed for the next XLIII years and beyond.

Of course, that's what happens when you combine the NFL Defensive Player of the Year (James Harrison) with a defensive coordinator (Dick LeBeau) who has been a part of the NFL for 50 years.

The Cardinals were trailing 10-7 and had the ball at the Pittsburgh 2 with 18 seconds left in the first half. Harrison, playing right outside linebacker, took a quick step toward the line of scrimmage, making it look like he was going to blitz.

Cardinals quarterback Kurt Warner, whose strength is anticipation, threw a slant pass intended for Anquan Boldin. Harrison quickly dropped a step back and was right in the path of the ball. He made the interception and took off 100 yards for the longest play in Super Bowl history.

"The field looked short at the beginning and long in the middle," Harrison said. "And by the time I got to the end zone, I was dead."

He was tackled at the goal line by Larry Fitzgerald. The play was reviewed, and the call of touchdown ended the half.

And affirmed that it would be the greatest play in Super Bowl history. Ever.

"I've never seen a greater one in the Super Bowl," said Miami Herald columnist Edwin Pope, who has covered all 43 of them. "Not even close."

After the game, LeBeau agreed. In fact, LeBeau took it a step further, saying, "It's the greatest defensive play I've ever seen."

Edwin and Dick were treated to a bucketful of more great plays in the second half.

Fitzgerald, a nonfactor with one catch in the first 49½ minutes, had a stretch run for the ages. He caught two fourth-quarter touchdowns, including a 64-yarder that put the Cardinals ahead 23-20 with 2:37 left in the game.

But Fitzgerald was upstaged by Steelers receiver and Super Bowl MVP Santonio Holmes on the ensuing drive. Holmes capped a 78-yard drive with what might be the greatest offensive touchdown in Super Bowl history. He slipped just behind triple coverage in the corner of the end zone and got his feet down just inbounds for a 6-yard touchdown with 35 seconds left.

In his typical style of play, quarterback Ben Roethlisberger made the play possible by scrambling to extend the action. He won his second Super Bowl in five seasons, all before age 27.

Roethlisberger completed six of eight passes for 83 yards and ran for four more on the winning drive. Holmes caught four of the passes for 73 yards. Holmes finished with nine catches for 131 yards.

The evening began with the crowd of 70, 774 turning Raymond James Stadium into Heinz Field South long before kickoff. A crowd that was at least 80 percent Steelers fans, all waving gold Terrible Towels and chanting, "Here we go Steelers, Here we go!" up to an hour before kickoff.

"Just look at how our fans travel everywhere with us and buy all the Steelers jerseys and Terrible Towels and stuff like that," said Steelers running back Gary Russell, a former Gopher. "It doesn't matter who everybody else calls 'America's Team.' I think America's Team is in Pittsburgh."

Warner deserved better

By Bernie Miklasz
McClatchy Newspapers

TAMPA, Fla. — Kurt Warner deserved better than this. He deserved to walk off the field as a champion, a winner, moving closer to the Pro Football Hall of Fame instead of navigating his way through another team's hailstorm of victory confetti.

Warner deserved to have a dance with his wife Brenda, with kisses and hugs by the stadium railing instead of having to stand on the field in a state of shock, watching the last dance go to the Pittsburgh Steelers.

This was supposed to be Warner's second Super Bowl triumph, and the official happy ending that would complete a remarkable career comeback.

But valiant Steelers quarterback Ben Roethlisberger grabbed history from Warner with a rally of his own. And this gripping, gut-wrenching, instant-classic of a Super Bowl ended with the Men of Steal ripping the moment from Warner's grasp for a 27-23 victory and the sixth Vince Lombardi Trophy for the Steelers franchise.

Warner fans watching in St. Louis had seen this movie before. They have felt Warner's pain on another Sunday like this, seven years ago. For Warner, this was the sequel. Not to Super Bowl XXXIV, but to Super Bowl XXXVI, when his late comeback from 14 points down for a tie was upstaged by quarterback Tom Brady and the New England Patriots.

"It's always disappointing, losing your last game of the season, especially when it's the Super Bowl," Warner said. "It's disappointing when there is a chance to win at the end."

For a while, it looked like Warner, 37, would reach that promised land in what could be the final game of his unique NFL career. He had fired a slant into the hands of the breakaway racehorse, Larry Fitzgerald, who ran off for a 64-yard touchdown. The Cardinals, trailing 20-7 after three quarters, suddenly had a 23-20 lead with 2 minutes, 37 seconds remaining.

"It was a shot to the heart," Steelers safety Troy Polamalu said.

Warner made only one mistake on what should have been the winning drive: He left too much time on the clock. But no one could change that now; Kurt's work was done. At that stage, he had passed for 344 yards and three touchdowns. He had become the first quarterback in Super Bowl history to have three 300-yard passing games. He has the three highest yardage totals in this game's annals. He had tied Joe Montana's record of 11 touchdowns in one NFL postseason. No quarterback has passed for more career Super Bowl yards (1,156) than Warner. It would be downright greedy to ask for anything more.

Warner had even recovered from his terrible blunder at the end of the first half, when he got baited into a goal-line interception that Pittsburgh linebacker James Harrison returned for a Super Bowl-record 100-yard touchdown. It gave the Steelers a 17-7 lead at the half.

Warner recovered. Doesn't he always? Counted out again, Warner hurried the Cardinals back with two fourth-quarter TD passes to Fitzgerald for the late lead.

Believe it or not, Cardinals owner Bill Bidwill was about to become the champion of the NFL after a long, meandering journey of futility through three NFL territories: Chicago, St. Louis and Arizona.

I suppose some things are not meant to be.

Bidwill had Warner, the old quarterback from St. Louis. Unfortunately, at the end of Super Bowl XLIII, Bidwill also had one of those old, soft St. Louis defenses, circa 1975.

Bidwill collects bow ties. The Rooneys, who own the Steelers, collect Lombardi trophies. Just getting Bidwill's franchise to the Super Bowl was an epic achievement for Warner.

"Kurt Warner is Kurt Warner," Roethlisberger said. "He is a phenomenal football player. He is a heck of a competitor, and I told him it was an honor to play against him."

Nearly 10 years ago, Warner and the St. Louis Rams won a Super Bowl because the Rams' defense held off Tennessee near the goal line, with linebacker Mike Jones making "The Tackle" to secure the victory.

Who would be Jones this time? Nobody. There would be no rescue. Warner lost a Super Bowl because the Arizona defense couldn't hold off the Steelers, and no one stepped forward to make a saving tackle on Santonio Holmes.

Holmes set up the cash-money score by buzzing 40 yards with a Roethlisberger pass, then jumped high into the night to pull down the winning 6-yard touchdown pass with 35 seconds remaining.

After the kickoff, Warner had only 29 seconds to work with, and he was low on time and ammo. There would be no more heroics – just a sack and a fumble on his final snap. Warner completed 31 of 43 passes for 377 yards and the three scores, and if anything this performance only buttressed his Hall of Fame credentials. But Warner wasn't thinking about that now.

"It's hard," Warner said. "You have the lead late, but you know it isn't over, and everything is still riding in the balance. Your emotions are so high with two minutes left in the game, and you know that you are two minutes from being world champions. On the flip side, they come down and make a big play to win the game and the emotions flip."

Tom Brady did it to Warner once, and now it was Big Ben. Two kicks to the gut, seven years apart, that left Warner staring at the scoreboard. It was tough watching him walk away like this again.

UMass looks to snap losing streak

UM looking to stifle gifted Rams backcourt

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While some teams in women's college basketball need a dominant player to carry them, others thrive on pure team basketball.

Today, the Massachusetts women's basketball team faces a team that hasn't found winning ways with either philosophy.

Rhode Island (9-12, 2-4 Atlantic 10) has two players that average double figures in scoring, but when compared to the rest of the A-10 Conference, it is completely outmatched.

The Rams are led by guards Sierra Cooper (11.3 points per-game) and Megan Shoniker (10.6), but neither is in the top 20 spots in the A-10 for scoring. The Rams have seven players who are at least six feet tall. They also have five that are major contributors, two of whom are starters.

The Minutewomen (8-13, 1-5 A-10) have starting forwards Kristina Danella (6-foot) and Teya Wright (6-foot-1) to combat this. Danella has flourished since being inserted into the UMass starting five and has played her best against conference opponents, scoring 13.2 points per game.

Her physical play is an invaluable complement to Wright in the post. This matchup will favor Wright because she has three inches on the 5-foot-10 Cooper and has the advantage in blocks and steals as well.

Cooper has also notched a team-high 60 fouls this season.

However, the game won't be played mainly on the boards. Even though URI has the height, they don't have the technique or the dominance. While blocking 34 shots this season, the Rams have been blocked 47 times.

UMass needs to box out effectively, regardless of the size of its opponents. Fundamentals need to be executed well and this includes both rebounding and ball control.

URI handles the ball well, turning the ball over 1.6 fewer times per game than its opponents. But, the Minutewomen can't depend on the Rams to make many mistakes.

Shoniker is a threat from 3-point range, hitting 33 shots from beyond the arc this season. This will be an

Danella, Mosgrove rewriting record books

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Even though the Massachusetts women's basketball team entered the season looking to draw from the dribble-drive offense of men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg, the team has departed from their original design. As the season progressed, the Minutewomen have adapted a drop-back-and-shoot offense that relies heavily on 3-point shots.

UMass has made 137 3-pointers this season, already breaking the previous record of 118. It is plain to see that this is the most 3-point shooting team in UMass women's basketball history, having attempted 412 shots from long range.

The Minutewomen have also broken a wide assortment of 3-point shooting records this season. Freshman Kristina Danella tied this individual single-game mark with seven 3-pointers, while the rest of the team also hit seven to set a new team mark at 14 in an 80-51 win over Northeastern on Dec. 20. Sophomore Cerie Mosgrove has already blown away the single-season record for 3-pointers in a season, with 44.

The players have acknowledged that the team's perimeter shooting plays an enormous role in their offense, realizing that it is how the team has developed over the year.

"It's a huge part of our offense," senior Stefanie Gerardot said of their 3-point shooting. "We'd rather have a layup than a 3-pointer. If we continue to get layups, that's great. But it balances out our offense."

Although they have the ability to shoot from behind the arc, the Minutewomen have avoided becoming a

Road woes continue

Painful losses overshadow impressive Minuteman wins

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With a 7-12 record, barring a miracle run in the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the Massachusetts men's basketball team will miss out on the NCAA Tournament for the 11th straight season.

Assuming that run through the conference tournament doesn't happen, the Minutemen won't have a lot to celebrate looking back on the season.

But they do have the win over Kansas.

And what a win it was – they beat the defending national champions, they did it on the road, on national television and to top it off, they did it in dramatic fashion holding on at the buzzer to a 1-point win.

And as it's turned out so far, it was mostly an aberration.

Out of nine road games this season, the Minutemen have won a total of once: Kansas. Out of eight games decided by five points or less, they've won twice: Kansas and Temple (by four). In games decided by eight or less, they are 3-8.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg talked about how his team needs to learn how to finish games.

"We just didn't close it out. I think we're getting better at figuring out how to win games at the end," Kellogg said during Monday's A-10 teleconference. "At least this game we gave ourselves a chance to win, but a missed 3-pointer and a good play by a Xavier player was the difference."

Against the then- No. 10 Musketeers (17-2, 70- A-10) on Saturday, UMass cut the lead to 1-point with 47 seconds to go on a 3-pointer by Ricky Harris. After missed 3-pointer by Xavier, Chris Lowe pushed the ball up the court and found an open Harris for a 3-pointer and a potential 2-point lead.

This time, however, Harris' shot didn't drop, and the Minutemen fell short, 82-80, after Xavier made four late free throws to seal the win.

Overtime hasn't treated UMass well, either. The Minutemen have dropped both overtime contests this season, one to Boston College on Dec. 6 and another to Charlotte on Jan. 21.

Although UMass beat then-No. 25 Kansas (61-60) on Dec. 13, they are still 1-2 in 1-point games this season. Both games were extremely disappointing for the Minutemen, losing to lowly-ranked Toledo (4-17, 310 RPI) and Jacksonville State (9-11, 226 RPI).

Small earns top 5 finish in slalom

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

At the University of Massachusetts Winter Carnival at Pat's Peak, N.H., Matthew Small continued his streak of finishes in the top 10 as he helped propel the Massachusetts men's ski team placed third out of 10 in their second event of the weekend.

The junior recorded his fourth top-five finish in the slalom this season, as he skied to a time of 1 minute, 44.8 seconds, just .36 seconds behind second-place finisher Travis Plass of Colby-Sawyer, sophomore Stefan Ogle also made a strong contribution as he finished 15th in the race.

UMass' third-place finish has them comfortably in third in their conference, well ahead of fourth-place Boston College. This performance came on the heels of a fourth-place finish Saturday, at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology carnival in New Hampshire.

Senior co-captain Alex Zahoruiko placed in the top three for the first time this season, as he finished with a time of 1:44.57 in the Giant Slalom race. Freshman Tom Sampson and junior Travis Hopkins also had top-15 finishes, they were 11th and 15th, respectively.

The Minutewomen also placed fourth in Saturday's Giant Slalom event. Jamie Taloumis led the way, as she finished fourth in the giant slalom, her highest finish of the season. Her 1:49:33 time marks the sophomore's second top 10 finish in January. Juniors Emily Shilletto and Heidi Skinner also placed in the top 15 in the race.

In Sunday's UMass Carnival, the Minutewomen finished fifth overall. Shilletto finished in the top-10 of the slalom race as her eighth-place finish led the Minutewomen.

In the aftermath of their performance this weekend, the Minutewomen remain fifth in the conference, but have inched closer to Brown University, who are in fourth, but just two points ahead.

The next event is Feb 6, at the BC carnival in Jackson, N.H.

Minutewomen knock off Long Island

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In its first match returning to action, the Massachusetts women's tennis team defeated Northeast Conference finalist Long Island at home in the spring opener.

The Blackbirds (0-2), ranked second by head coaches in a recent NEC Preseason poll, fell to the Minutewomen (2-0) by a 6-1 score. UMass improved to 3-0 all time against LIU after winning all doubles matches and taking five of six singles matches.

The highlight of the day came from No. 3 doubles pair, Kaitlyn Carpenter and Lauren MacKay who turned in a victory after falling in an early 0-5 hole.

"I was stunned that they went down 5-0 in the span of five minutes. In the blink of an eye, I looked up and was shocked to see the score," said UMass coach Judy Dixon. "They both were very nervous and barely breathing. I told them they needed to get more shots on the court and have the other team play more balls."

The duo made an impressive comeback to take the win over Stephanie Elie and H'Ann Johnson by an 8-5 score. Dixon spoke on Carpenter and MacKay's effort.

"They won one game, then another game and then kept it going. It's very tough to come back from five games down in an eight game pro set," Dixon said. "I give them a lot of credit because mentally it's very difficult to do. I was really pleased at their ability to turn it around and fight back from the deficit."

Winning by the same score at No. 1 doubles were Candynce Boney and Maude Leclusye. The pair defeated Babich and Dora Lahens 8-5. At No. 2 doubles, Laura Dinai and Tanisha Hodgson came out on top against Ashley Harvey and Amy Hosotsuji by an 8-3 score.

Kicking off singles play, Long Island's Elie, slated at the No. 3 slot, had to sit out due to an injury. This resulted in Liliana Cortes, Hosotsuji, and Lahens moving up a spot to Nos. 3, 4 and 5, which gave MacKay the

Holub details restructuring

University plans to reorganize colleges due to budget cuts

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Less than one week after announcing plans to restructure the University of Massachusetts' academic colleges, Chancellor Robert Holub offered details of possible changes in an e-mail to the University community yesterday afternoon.

Holub's proposed plan would eliminate four colleges, in addition to forming a Task Force on Recognition (TFR) to facilitate faculty involvement in the decision process. The chancellor specified that a final decision on the details of the reorganization would not be reached until the faculty had an opportunity to provide feedback.

In his e-mail, Holub described the potential annual savings to be between $1.3 and $1.5 million, estimates he termed as "conservative." However, the chancellor did not offer an estimate of the one-time costs of restructuring in light of the University's impending $46 million operating budget deficit for the next fiscal year.

An estimate of the expenses associated with the change has not yet been determined, said University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

The crux of the chancellor's proposed plan involves combining the College of Social and Behavior Sciences with the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, in addition to consolidating the College of Natural Resources and the Environment, the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics and the Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

The TFR will evaluate the proposal over the next four weeks and provide further feedback to Holub by March 6. In addition, the chancellor called on the Faculty Senate to make a formal recommendation. Holub will present the changes to the senate during its Feb. 9 meeting.

He also instructed the TFR to develop any alternate organizational plans "that it finds appropriate."

Though, the phrasing of the e-mail and his presentation to the faculty last Friday indicate that a restructuring will most likely take place, regardless of full faculty support.

"I know that not everyone will agree," wrote Holub. "But I hope that faculty will put aside their per-

Around 80 protesters march their way through campus Tuesday calling for the charges against former UMass student Jason Vassell to be dropped. The event organized by the Justice for Jason Vassell Committee was held on the one-year anniversary of the controversial arrest.

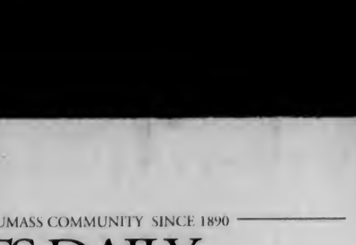
A group of about 80 protesters marched down University Drive on Tuesday afternoon, stopping traffic en route to the University of Massachusetts Police Department, in protest of the charges facing former UMass student Jason Vassell.

The rally, which was organized by the Justice for Jason Vassell Committee and came on the one-year anniversary of the campus incident that has Vassell facing a possible prison sentence of up to 30 years, took the marchers to the site of last year's incident – MacKimmie Hall – to the UMPD, where organizers made a statement calling for change and awareness.

"Today, we're not just calling on [Northwestern] District Attorney [Elizabeth] Scheibel to drop the charges against Jason, we're not just calling on [UMass Chancellor Robert] Holub to reinstate Jason into the University, but we're calling on an investigation into the UMass Police Department," said UMass student and committee member Tristan Brosnan to the crowd in front of the UMPD.



Committee members specifically called out for an investigation of UMPD lieutenant Robert Thrasher, who they claim led a racist investigation and "had it out for Jason from the start."

"I think it's important to understand some of the language that came out based on the motion to dismiss. What we found out as a result was that our lieutenant of the UMass Police Department – the lieutenant that's supposed to be protecting us, that's supposed to be keeping us safe, that's supposed to be treating us as students, as citizens, and as equals regardless of the color of our skin – proceeded to investigate Jason's case and referred to him as an 'asshole,' as a 'donkey,' as a 'drug dealer,'" Student Government Association President Malcolm Chu said. "That is the epitome of racist police behavior."

Vassell, who is being charged with two counts of aggravated assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (a pocket knife) and two counts of armed assault with intent to murder, is due in Hampshire Superior Court on Feb. 18 at 2 p.m., for a pretrial hearing, where the judge will hear Vassell's motion to dismiss.

In addition to the march, organizers set up a national call-in day for Tuesday to the district attorney's office, asking callers to voice their opinions to Scheibel regarding Vassell's charges.

Endowments on the decline across the Five College area

BY SAMUEL BUTTERFIELD
HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE CORRESPONDENT

Amid a downturn in global economic activity, the member schools of the Five Colleges, Inc. said they can handle the ailments plaguing world markets. Handling and thriving are admittedly different, so they plan to make changes to their present spending policies.

With reduced spending and demand sweeping across all economic areas, heightened unemployment, and markets like the S&P, the Dow Jones and NASDAQ down at least 33 percent over the past year, few colleges and universities will be exempt from tough decisions regarding their spending habits.

Peter Rooney, director of public affairs at Amherst College, said the school does not anticipate any layoffs, and while little has changed in Amherst's financial planning since an Oct. 28 statement by President Anthony W. Marx, Amherst is making some adjustments to its spending.

In the statement addressed to the campus community, Marx wrote, "even with our relatively strong investment management, the endowment has lost roughly a quarter of its value since June 30."

Despite the stark hit to the endowment fund, Marx was hopeful that Amherst would remain solvent and said the school is "in a strong condition relative to many of our peers," due to "several years of strong endowment performance."

Although Marx said he believed Amherst could bear the impact of the economic slowdown, he stated that the school would make some alterations in financial planning.

In a similar statement, Smith College President Carol T. Christ was less optimistic about her school's financial status.

Christ wrote that Smith's decline in endowment of approximately 25 to 30 percent "likely necessitates a reduction in expenditure of about six to eight percent – or at least $12 million."

She added, "We expect to experience other negative financial trends – an increase in financial neediness of our students, necessitating an increase in the financial aid budget; a decline in philanthropic giving; increases in operating or health insurance costs – that require us to reduce our expenditures by a greater amount." The statement forecasts the problems many schools face.

The value of endowments at Mt. Holyoke College in South Hadley has dropped by $150 million since July 1, said the school's president, Joanne V. Creighton. The situation is similar for the other Five Colleges.

sonal preferences and work within the proposed structure toward the goal we all want: moving UMass Amherst into the upper echelon of public research universities in the country."

According to Holub, the official name of the new colleges would be a faculty decision, but temporarily referred to them as the College of Humanities, Arts, and Social Sciences (CHASS) and the College of Natural Sciences (CNS).

The chancellor broached the idea of creating an arts and sciences mega-college that would include over 40 departments, but said that he has "serious reservations" about creating such a large administrative unit.

"I believe that the structures I am proposing make the most sense for the campus at this particular time," Holub wrote. "They will also demonstrate that we are taking the financial crisis seriously and that we are managing the campus effectively."

The reorganization would streamline many processes repeated across colleges, thus greatly increasing the administration's operating efficiency, added Holub.

The chancellor also promised that the implementation of any plan would involve "minimal disruption" for faculty and departments and possibly create new opportunities for cross-departmental collaboration.

Additionally, the School of Nursing would be administered under the College of Public Health and Health Sciences yet maintain some independence with an associate dean. Also, the plan would add the resource economics department to the Isenberg School of Management.

The plan would leave the College of Engineering and the School of Education untouched. Holub was clear in his address to the faculty last Friday that the three pre-professional schools should not be restructured due to possible reaccreditation issues.

The e-mail followed a prevailing sentiment at last Friday's faculty meeting of a desire for details about Holub's intentions and various calls for concern over the danger of a budget crisis precipitating reorganization.

which they deem to be unjust.

Chu said the committee had at least 600 people confirmed to call in from 20 states and four countries, and was hoping for over 1,000 people to call.

A message to the district attorney's office was received but was not returned.

The charges against Vassell stem from a Feb. 3, 2008 incident between Vassell, an African American, and Jonathan Bosse and John Bowes, both Caucasian, who did not attend the University. According to court documents, Bosse and Bowes racially slurred Vassell outside his dormitory window, gained access to the main lobby and instigated a fight that left Vassell's nose broken and Bosse and Bowes with stab wounds.

Bowes was later charged with two hate crimes and disorderly conduct and faces a maximum of four years in prison. Bosse was never charged.

The march, which lasted over an hour in the snow, went across the Southwest Residential Area, down University Drive, to the UMass Police Department and ended at the Whitmore Administration building. Much of the group held up signs urging people to call Scheibel, asking for an investigation into the UMPD and for the charges to be dropped.

Protesters hold signs calling for the charges against Jason Vassell to be dropped as they travel across the UMass campus.

The group chanted while they marched, including "No justice, no peace, no racist police" and "Whose streets? Our streets," while they marched down University Drive with a UMPD cruiser riding behind them.

A vigil was also held Tuesday night outside of Vassell's former dorm window of MacKimmie. About 30 people with candles stood in a snowy silence for 30 seconds to symbolize the 30 years of Vassell could face in prison.

"It's a day of shame, but it's a night of pride," said UMass African American studies professor Amilcar Shabazz, reflecting on the day's events. "For these students to make this kind of sacrifice for Jason, to do with they're doing is something to be proud of."

Chu was encouraged with the turnout and the potential impact the day made but was upset that the day was a full year in the making.

"We're going to keep on pushing, but today was a heartfelt day. We didn't expect to get here last year. We didn't think it would come this far; we thought it would be over quickly," Chu said. "The D.A. has continued to prosecute in the same way she's done from the start. We'll continue to fight that, but the University has continued to be silent. We didn't expect that at all."

"I speak with Jason fairly often and it means a lot because he knows he has support, but ultimately he's still facing 30 years in prison," continued Chu. "He's persevering, and he keeps pushing forward, and he's really appreciative of the support all over the country."

However, Christ took steps to emphasize that Smith is still in a workable fiscal position.

"We are fortunate that we have financial reserves that allow us to be thoughtful and deliberative in this process," she said.

One Smith student identified another issue the school is facing.

"Smith isn't hiring any new professors in a few areas of study that need more teachers," said freshman Caroline Kracunas.

At Hampshire College, Senior Assistant to the Vice President for Finance and Administration Nancy Karella said the school is weighing its options and that they have reached no concrete decision about how to handle recent economic trends, adding, "a lot is going on obviously, and it's in a state of flux."

Mark Spiro, Hampshire's vice president for finance and administration said via e-mail that Hampshire is in better shape than many comparable small liberal arts schools given that they have a small endowment because of a short history and a young core of alumnae.

Spiro said, "Income from our endowment provides only about three percent of our operating budget net of financial aid, while some of our peers might benefit from endowments that provide 10 times that amount."

Spiro said that Hampshire's limited endowment means that "while our endowment is down by about the same amount as those of most colleges, the decline has less impact on our operating budget."

Hampshire, then, will need to continue to attract full classes, according to Spiro, as 80 percent of its net revenue comes from tuition, room, board and fees.

At Mt. Holyoke College in South Hadley, president Joanne V. Creighton also released a statement at the start of the semester to members of the faculty and staff, stating, "the College needs to make both short-term and longer-term changes to remain financially stable."

"Annual giving is significantly below last year at this time, and financial aid is a higher percentage of tuition revenues," Creighton said. "While our endowment's performance was outstanding last year, its value is down over 150 million since July 1."

The harsh financial situation at the school did not stop with increased student requests for aid.

"Our current estimate is that we will need to close a four to five million gap in fiscal year 2010 and perhaps an equally large gap in 2011. This could grow if we see any significant reductions in enrollment," Creighton said, underscoring the same problem most schools will need to address in order to retain as much operating budget as possible.

Creighton said Mt. Holyoke "will be aggressively pursuing ways to reduce costs while minimizing the need for layoffs," and that most vacant positions will not be filled, further revealing the blow in ability to fund programs many schools will be suffering.

Obama too soft on Iran

Alana Goodman

President Obama may have star quality, charisma and a rockin' beach body, but there's one person he's failed to impress during his first month in office: Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

During an interview with the Arab-language TV station – and occasional Hamas missile launch site – Al Arabiya, Obama attempted to reach out to the roguish Iranian president.

"[If] countries like Iran are willing to unclench their fist, they will find an extended hand from us," he told viewers.

But Ahmadinejad has since rebuffed Obama's offer – and he's now demanding that the U.S. president "apologize to the Iranian nation" for "crimes" against Iran.

Ahmadinejad also insists that Obama put an "end to the U.S. military in the world" and cut ties with "the Zionists, outlaws and criminals" before Iran will consider speaking with him.

Other Iranian leaders have also rejected Obama's recent overture. Iran's official government spokesman took a moment off from organizing another Holocaust denial conference in Tehran to mock the U.S. president's invitation of friendship.

"This request means western ideology has become passive, that capitalist thought and the system of domination have failed," Gholam Hossein Elham told the Mehr news agency.

Iran's negative reaction to Obama's invitation is not surprising. The president brought it on himself by repeatedly disparaging the United States during his radio address to the Muslim world. By framing his words in an apologetic tone when he said, "Too often the United States starts by dictating…we sometimes make mistakes. We are not perfect," our president was essentially agreeing with Iran's fundamentally false premise that America has a reason to apologize to Muslims.

Apologizing or engaging in unconditional talks with Iran… will undermine our foreign policy and make us look weak in the eyes of the Muslim world.

In fact, much of Obama's Al Arabiya interview reflected the same anti-American undertones used by our enemies in the Middle East.

"America was not born as a colonial power," said the president, indicating that he believes the United States currently engages in colonialism. Not only is this assertion decidedly false, it is also a common myth perpetrated by terrorist propagandists.

"[The] same respect and partnership that America had with the Muslim world as recently as 20 or 30 years ago, there's no reason why we can't restore that," Obama said in the same interview, insinuating that the United States has not respected the Muslim world since the 1970s.

I wonder if Obama would dare say that to one of the millions of American soldiers who risked their lives to liberate Muslims in Bosnia, Kosovo, Kuwait, Afghanistan and Iraq over the last few decades.

Obama's harsh analysis of America was in distinct contrast to his glowing portrayal of Iran. In fact, the only disapproving thing Obama said about the Iranians was that their recent actions, which include threatening Israel, pursuing nuclear weapons and aiding terrorists, have not "been helpful."

By denigrating the United States and dismissing the rampant humanitarian violations of countries like Iran, Obama is giving radical leaders the fodder they need to continue spewing their anti-western propaganda.

Along the same line, apologizing or engaging in unconditional talks with Iran – especially while it continues to ignore UN resolutions and sanctions – will undermine our foreign policy and make us look weak in the eyes of the Muslim world.

U.S. and Israeli foreign policy leaders predicted a negative backlash from Iran when Obama first proposed unconditional, direct talks with Ahmadinejad during the 2008 presidential campaign.

"We live in a neighborhood in which sometimes dialogue – in a situation where you have brought sanctions, and you then shift to dialogue – is liable to be interpreted as weakness," Israeli foreign minister Tzipi Livni said on Israel Radio last year.

The Carter Administration is a prime example of this foreign policy blunder. Carter met unconditionally with throngs of brutal dictators: Castro, Torrijos, Kim Jong Il and Mugabe, just to name a few. The tyrants laughed at Carter's naivety behind his back – but still managed to dupe billions in U.S. aid and support out of the president during meetings. Despite all of the discussions, negotiations and U.S. concessions, Carter could not manage to convince a single one of these dictators to stop committing unspeakable humanitarian atrocities.

Carter's passivity led to the capture of 52 U.S. diplomats who were held by Iran for 444 days, only to be released minutes after the hawkish Ronald Reagan took office.

Contrast that with President George W. Bush, whose policies got rid of Saddam Hussein and helped free 50 million Iraqis from tyrannical rule. Never again will Iraqi prisoners be beaten, humiliated and tortured in Saddam's prisons and thrown into mass graves. The future for Iraq looks promising, and more importantly, free.

The same cannot be said for the oppressive regime in Iran. As the country continues to refine its nuclear program and Tehran prepares to host a conference titled "Holocaust? A Sacred Lie by the West," Obama is still scrambling to find a way to meet with leaders of the terrorist country. Media outlets reported this week that President Obama has been busy drafting a personal letter to Ahmadinejad.

I don't know what the letter will say, but its message will be clear: If you want to be taken seriously, terrorism works.

Re-examining the Afghan occupation

John Glaser

Excuses for war are many and creative, often hiding the true reasons for conflict behind vague principles of exporting democracy or saving civilization as we know it. But perhaps even more capricious are the people's reasons for throwing their support behind these mostly deceptive excuses.

The situation in Afghanistan has been called the "Good War." Coupled with Iraq, Afghanistan is the country nearly everyone agrees we ought to have invaded, even after the fact.

Obama was ostensibly elected, at least in part, based on his anti-war stances, and has spoken strongly against the initiation and continuation of the Iraq War (on which he's now backtracking, but I digress). However, he is gearing up for an Iraq-like surge in Afghanistan, a policy which nearly none of his blind-faith supporters have spoken out against, despite how clearly it rings of neoconservative Republicanism. They seem about as fully prepared to wallop on the war drum as over 60 percent of Americans were in the lead up to the invasion of Iraq, to say nothing of the media support it's getting.

Afghanistan is not about the good fight. It's about an occupation now. It's about our empire.

Despite claims of change having come to America with Obama's election, this is one among many examples of the status quo steadfastly sticking with us. Afghanistan is not about the good fight. It's about an occupation now. It's about our empire.

The truth is that our governing elite, now a guild Obama fulfillers with little departure from the norm, "misunderestimated" what the occupation of Afghanistan would be like. These tribal populations of mostly rural, illiterate, impoverished people have managed to thrust occupiers from Alexander the Great to Britain to the Soviets out of their lands. But for some reason we think we're different.

Like Iraq, Afghanistan was expected by Washington to render a quick, decisive victory after which the return of all American forces would promptly follow. Now in its eighth year, the conflict has delivered few results and is only getting worse.

The government we've attempted to set up, led by Hamid Karzai, is embarrassingly powerless, with nearly zero control over its people and almost entirely unable to provide any services. It is said to be one of the most corrupt governments in the region as the illegal postponing of elections is only one among various exemplifications of that charge.

Additionally, the principle effect of our military presence there has been to push Islamic extremists over the border and into the lawless tribal regions of northwestern Pakistan, further destabilizing an already-troubled state, which happens to be armed with nuclear weapons. This, in turn, has caused increased frequency of American military cross-border attacks into Pakistan, the legality of which is murky at best and which often kills civilians.

While acting on intelligence regarding the whereabouts of a known insurgent, American military forces, a few weeks ago, raided a home in eastern Afghanistan in the night without warning. The military called it a success, claiming the 32 people they killed were all Taliban insurgents. Days later, survivors of the raid, with the support of pro-American provincial governor and a central government delegation, said that actually 13 civilians had been killed and nine wounded. Sadly, civilian casualties and mistaken killings are not rare.

Inevitable events such as this, which are inherently characteristic of any imperial occupation, are conspicuously ignored throughout this policy-making process and are almost never cited as a contributor to the ongoing and increasing insurgency there.

If the larger objective of this occupation is to form something like a modern, democratic nation state, then may the gods help us. This is interventionist, Bush-like, nation-building ignorance of the highest order. Yet, Obama supporters naively see him only as a counterpoint to our previous administration, framing this transition as a juxtaposition of the arrival of good and the departure of evil, stubbornly refusing to admit their significant and dangerous similarities.

If the aim is to prevent Afghanistan from becoming, or remaining, a launching pad for terrorist attacks like 9/11, will further occupation accomplish this? Will an Iraq-like surge really render this a reality?

In the waning years of the Bush reign, millions of Americans regretted casting their vote for Bush. How could they have known he'd turn out to be one of the worst presidents ever? Obama supporters had better prepare themselves for that looming possibility. They must prepare to regret, prepare to admit fault and accept blame. But more importantly, prepare at least to learn from this mistake, as Americans have rarely proven capable that, no matter what shining promises of change an incoming administration makes, they are and have been devoted members of the political establishment.

This war can end soon, in a few years or in a decade. Whenever it ends, it will end, inevitably, in the only way it can, with a precipitous withdrawal of troops and a giant tail tucked under our big fat ass, having accomplished so little in comparison to what it cost.

Empty readings carry no weight

I've heard that Japan is 10 years ahead of the United States.

I'm not really sure what the person who told me this was talking about, because I stopped listening. But I have an inkling it has to do with them being ahead of us technologically. However, I'm not really sure how that makes sense, considering that it doesn't take 10 years to transmit information from Japan to the United States. But I guess that's why instead of knowing why, I care more about what that could possibly mean for the United States.

Ben Moriarty

If, for instance, it means that in 10 years, we will have a massive amount of people walking around and talking about how cool anime and StarCraft is, it will be a sad day for mankind. If, however, it means that in 10 years we will also be selling beer out of vending machines and we will be allowed to walk around sporting six-foot-long Katanas while wearing nothing but sumo wrestling undies, then that world would be very fine to me.

But even worse, and hopefully not as likely, it could mean that in 10 years' time we will be, like the Japanese are now, obsessed with blood types as if they are an actual indicator of what one is like as a person. This, surely, would make me cry even more than a society filled with people thinking that acting like a cartoon character with spiky hair is cool.

In 2008, four of Japan's top 10 selling books had to do with people's blood types and how each blood type was representative of the person. For people with blood type A, they are creative and sensible. B's are wild and cheerful, AB's are cool yet rational and O's are optimistic.

This idea has been taken so far and so seriously that public officials have felt it necessary to share their blood type and Olympic training methods have been altered to reflect their blood type despite the necessary warnings in all the books that say these things are not definitive and are just little guidelines.

As noted by many before me, this is obviously just an elaborate horoscope-type idea that has no rational basis for it whatsoever. But that has not stopped all, as people don't seem to care because they love being told what kind of person they are by others, especially when it's something like "you are wild and cheerful."

The trick to tricking people is to make them feel good about themselves by something natural, so they feel they were born great and better than everyone else.

This is why we still have palm readers and people who think that, when you were born in relation to celestial bodies, it actually has an effect on what type of person you are.

Or because the American education system sucks.

But since you're reading this, you apparently care what I think, despite me not reciprocating that feeling at all. So I might as well jump the gun and start the American version of the blood type horoscope so that in 10 years, I will be remembered as a genius among fools.

The trick to tricking people is to make them feel good about themselves by something natural, so they feel they were born great and better than everyone else. For this reason, I can't say that if your favorite band is Pavement, you're amazing, and that if you love the Cowboys, you're cool. It has to be something stupid, like when you were born or what color hair you have.

I have black hair. I'm lazy, stupid and don't have a job. So, according to my guide to life, if you also have black hair, you are probably like that as well. And you definitely are neither wild nor cheerful.

If you have white hair like my grandfather, you're probably, like him, sagacious, well read and educated and have the opportunity to work for NASA in the future.

If you have red hair like my brother, you are quick to anger, engage in odd natural rituals and you will one day dream of running your own casino. You probably have a feather in your hair to draw attention away from that disgusting mop of red hair on your head.

If you have blonde hair, which by my classification is yellow, you probably need to eat some more food, because you're too damn skinny, but I love your food.

If you think those statements are racist, they're not. They are dumb and useless and foolish. But I guess it does show that the person who said Japan is ahead of us also is dumb – because Japan is unimaginably behind us. We've been basing what people in our country are like from undecided natural consequences for the past 400 years.

And it will never stop, because then people won't be able to feel better about themselves.

Degrading the disabled is a debacle

Matt Kushi

In the long struggle for equality for people with disabilities, there has been good news and bad news. The good news for disability advocates is that there has been great ground gained in disability awareness and equality issues. However, there is still work to be done. Namely, it is the language we use that concerns people with disabilities.

"Stop being such a retard." This line sounds awfully familiar doesn't it? It is a line that is used day in and day out by people everywhere, not just on the premises of this campus.

Every time I hear a person utter this line I cringe. I cringe when I hear the word "retard" in a hurtful manner because I know that the intent is to degrade a person that has just done something perceived as stupid or wrong.

When you say that a person is a "retard" or is "retarded," you are basically saying that the subject of the word is lowering themselves to the level of somebody with mental retardation, now known as an intellectual disability. That isn't right.

The word is being used in an offensive slang manner that degrades fellow humans, both the person that the slur is directed toward and people with intellectual disabilities.

Have people with intellectual disabilities done anything to deserve this? No. People with intellectual disabilities are the same as you and me. They just have some obstacles in their lives that we don't.

Then why do we so frequently use a word as offensive slang rather than what it really means?

To give you the correct definition of the word, it is, according to Answers.com, "to cause to move or proceed slowly; delay or impede."

Let us give people with intellectual disabilities a fair and impartial chance. Let us stop using the word "retard" in an offensive manner.

Critics of this article may be wondering if I think that I have all of the answers. They may think that I am too politically correct. That I am portraying myself as a self-righteous wonder who sees all of the world's wrongs. My answer to both criticisms is no, I am not.

In fact, I used to be a person who used the word in an offensive manner before I stopped. However, since I am in a position to take a stand against the word, I plan to utilize my opportunity.

The argument over the word "retard" and "retarded" used in a negative tone is an argument that I have engaged in many times.

This past summer, I took part in an online forum discussion on the movie Tropic Thunder on Abcnews.com. Several disability groups had taken offense to the movie over the negative use of the word "retard."

In the argument that I was having with one gentleman, I had the line thrown at me that I was overreacting because words have no value.

Right. Let's expand on that thought shall we? If words don't have value, then why am I writing this article? Why do we have language? So, in my dear little friend's world, a word is just a word, a life is just a life, a person is just a person – not a very logical argument.

You see, words do have value. It is how we live amongst one another. When you tell someone that you love them, you are telling them that they mean something special to you. When your family tells you that they are proud of you, they are telling you that they are happy for what you have done.

Why do I attack this subject with such tenacity? If you know me personally, or have read any of my previous articles on disabilities awareness, then you know where I am coming from. I have a family member who has an intellectual disability.

I know that this article is not going to stop people from using the word "retard." However, if I can stop one person from using the word inappropriately, then I will consider what I have said a success, no matter how small that success may be.

I am aware that not all people, with or without disabilities, find this word offensive. What I represent here is the voice that claims the usage of the word to be at fault.

If after reading this, you still don't have a picture in your mind of the people that you are insulting by using the word "retard" as an offensive slur, I would like you to think on this line.

The line comes from the movie Tuskegee Airmen. The line not only exemplifies what these African American World War II fighter pilots were thinking at this time, but really what all suppressed people in this world think.

The line reads as follows, "There is no greater conflict within me. How do I feel about my country and how does my country feel about me? Are we only to be Americans when the mood suits you? A fair and impartial opportunity is all we ask. Nothing that you yourselves wouldn't demand."

Let us give people with intellectual disabilities a fair and impartial chance. Let us stop using the word "retard" in an offensive manner.

U-Style at UMass: campus fashion

JULIE HOLBROOK/COLLEGIAN

Jessica Ouellette looks to accent her personal style by using accessories, especially scarves. She keeps her wardrobe creative while staying on the sophisticated side.

Collegian writer finds layered look preferred by this senior

BY JULIE HOLBROOK
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Senior Jessica Ouellette is an English major with a specialization in American studies, nonfiction writing, professional writing and technical writing, with a minor in classics. When she's not busy doing school work or applying to graduate school, she certainly turns heads on campus with her impeccable style and sense of fashion.

In this particular ensemble, each item comes from Madewell, an up-and-coming boutique located at the Natick Collection in Natick, Mass. (another location will be opening on Newbury Street in Boston on Feb. 17). This outfit is layering at its finest. Jessica is wearing a gray tank top, and matches it with an oatmeal-colored loose-knit top and a chic cobalt cardigan with a pair of dark denim skinny jeans.

She pulls it all together with her accessories – specifically her beautifully embroidered lilac scarf, and of course her superchic Heritage high-heeled boots.

When asked about her personal style, this is what Jessica had to say.

Collegian: How would you describe your look?

Jessica: Creative and fun, with a sophisticated twist. I really like vintage clothing.

Collegian: Why did you choose each item of your outfit?

Jessica: I like to layer. In my opinion, boots and dark denim are classic. Scarves are fun and fashionable. And cardigans are comfortable and add another dimension.

Collegian: What is your favorite article to add to an ensemble?

Jessica: I love scarves. You can throw on a t-shirt, and add a scarf and it gives your outfit a totally different look. Scarves are great for all seasons.

Collegian: What are some essential items that every girl should have in her wardrobe?

Jessica: There are four essential items worth having – boots, denim, cardigans and scarves.

Collegian: Any other fashion tips you'd like to give to readers?

Jessica: Don't always try to match – add color and layers.

Collegian: And finally, where is your favorite place to shop?

Jessica Madewell…they sell a range of items from vintage-inspired tops and dresses to garment-dyed denim.

With new store, icon tries to stay on top

Von Furstenberg talks about her snow suit at the inauguration, the evolution of her dress

BY AUDRA D.S. BURCH
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

MIAMI — Diane von Furstenberg has just arrived in South Florida, still thawing out from the merciless chill of Washington, D.C., still glowing from all that history in one place.

Von Furstenberg, who introduced the world to the jersey "wrap dress" more than three decades ago, is happy to chat about her charmed life, but not before a word or two about that remarkable Tuesday, President Barack Obama, and well, "the" dress.

"Here she is, the designer, the former princess, the cultural icon, perched on a bench in her dazzling new company store in Bal Harbour, Fla., beckoning all to look at her digital camera.

"That's me, in the snowsuit! Can you believe it?"

Indeed, frame after frame has captured von Furstenberg's unmistakable, almost kittenish smile, her knowing stare and shoulder-length curls tamed today by a Russian fur hat. She is leaning against a balcony in a black snowsuit.

"My very good friend is Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, so I had a very good seat right behind the stage. I could see most everything," she says, not entirely oblivious to the young women in the store stealing glances. "It was soooo cold, but it felt warm because it was such a beautiful day."

Though almost 1.8 million people came to the National Mall, von Furstenberg's inauguration experience had a certain megawatt glamour quotient.

She found a chaperon in Vogue culturalist-at-large Andre Leon Talley, and the two made a handsome, photo-worthy pair. Her itinerary included cocktails at Maureen Dowd's Georgetown digs and high tea at Hickory Hill, Ethel Kennedy's Virginia estate where guests included Harry Belafonte and George Lucas. She ran into musician Citizen Cope, who told her that most every time he sees a beautiful girl, she is wearing DVF. Ever of the moment, von Furstenberg blogged about it all.

"When Obama became the nominee, I decided I needed to know more about him. I read his book, 'Dreams from My Father,'" says the naturalized U.S. citizen. "After reading the book, I knew then that I trusted this man completely. He is exactly what America needs."

Not 48 hours after the inauguration, von Furstenberg breezes into town for her 29th store opening and, in some ways, to celebrate her own history.

She's done this a thousand times, gracefully, patiently talked about the chapters of her story – all while playing the perfect hostess in the dressing room.

She helps a young woman decide whether the floor-length white sequined gown is right, discusses the awesome nature of Pilates with a middle-aged mom whose amazing body comes from another era. She greets adoring fans and sips bottled water and even finds a moment to re-apply her lipstick, a DVF shade called Foreplay.

Then she effortlessly segues into the von Furstenberg rise:

Born in Belgium. Educated in Switzerland. Married a German prince. Launched her fashion house in New York.

"I never could have envisioned how my life would turn out," says von Furstenberg, married since 2001 to media mogul Barry Diller. "But I always knew the kind of woman I wanted to be."

Von Furstenberg came to own the 1970s. Her wrap dress was a raging success, crossing the stratums of both the uptown set and Studio 54ers. At one point, her company was producing 15,000 dresses per week.

Von Furstenberg's life seems to divide into two parts – her early success and her later success. She would likely see it as a continuum, one big adventure.

She built her company – from a style experiment born in the West Village, to a global multimillion dollar luxury brand – upon the singular idea that women could be empowered and sexy.

Eventually, the fashion world and its followers moved on. Von Furstenberg's popularity waned, and she labored quietly until the fall of 1997, when she staged a remarkable comeback using her famous moneymaker. This time around, the wrap dress, still sumptuous and body-hugging, was just a bit sleeker, a bit shorter. It became an instant hit with a new generation of fashionistas and with the old guard that had been wearing the vintage version.

At a time when elder fashion designers are taking a bow, the 62-year-old and her family continue to grow the empire with the famous initials – the DVF logo is stamped on most everything from purses and luggage to rugs and sunglasses.

And she is at the center of pop culture: von Furstenberg has been a judge on Bravo's "Project Runway," and her headquarters in New York's Meatpacking district is the backdrop for the MTV reality series "The City."

Now, she is dabbling in interior design, "just a few rooms at my favorite hotel, the Claridge in London," she says casually.

This is not her first foray into the hotel biz. Three years ago, she conflabbed with W Hotel to produce an emergency fashion kit with her black wrap dress and DVF cosmetics. And the waitresses at celeb-haunt Hollywood Roosevelt's lounge wear the designer's signature wrap dress.

And she continues her personal mission to help women, working with a number of humanitarian and civic organizations. Her commitment to women's issues has imbued much of her work. One of her 2008 collections was inspired by Wonder Woman; part of its proceeds benefited Vital Voices, a women's empowerment organization.

"My goal is to continue to make clothing that makes women feel beautiful," she says, wearing her own a patterned sheath, a bold black-and-cream wrap coat, nude fishnet hose and chunky gold jewelry. "I just want to stay relevant."

AP

Diane von Furstenberg became a well-known and respected designer in the 1970s with her wrap dress. The dress would bring her great wealth, but the style would eventually die out, only to resurface in the 90s.

DIANE SAYS

Q: Who is the DVF woman?

A: I think she's everywoman. I am a grandmother, and I know people just like me who wear my clothing. And yet, when I was at the inauguration, I can't tell you how many women who were probably under 35 who told me they wore my clothing. The DVF woman is active, she is smart, she is fun and she is confident.

Q: Where do you draw your inspiration?

A: Women inspire me, the way they move, the strength they display. The colors and fabrics and prints – that of course comes from nature.

Q: What makes the knitted jersey dress such an enduring hit?

A: I can understand a brand or a label surviving, I can see a designer surviving, but it really is hard to believe one dress still being so popular. The fabric molds the body making you feel sexy. It's like a good friend. You wake up feeling bad, open the closet and there she is, like a good friend. She has a way of making you feel better.

Q: You have been outspoken on the vexing issues of underweight models and diversity on the runways. Why?

A: I feel like you have to speak out because of the power and influence of fashion. If we are going to get some of the blame, then it is our duty to promote healthy, diverse beauty.

Obamas help boost sales for J. Crew after inauguration attire

BY WENDY DONAHUE
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

The First Family's unofficial endorsement of J.Crew threatened to backfire in the days after the inauguration, and not just because Barack Obama dared to wear a white bow tie, custom made by the retailer, with a short jacket instead of a traditional tailcoat. (The audacity!) A week later, history already is judging the decision to mix the mass brand with exclusive designer items, many from the now famous Chicago boutique Ikram, as a stroke of fashion genius.

"We don't want our First Family to look like the family next door exactly, but we also want to feel like we can reach out and touch them," said Mandi Norwood, a former magazine editor and author of "Michelle Style," to be published in May by Avon A, an imprint of HarperCollins. "This was a very shrewd move, going to a store that isn't really cheap but is affordable to lots of people, and getting them to collaborate in exclusive design, and allowing them to roll it out at a later date so we can all have it in some fashion. It's a win-win."

Make that a win-win-win.

J.Crew enjoyed a 10.6 percent bump in its stock price Jan. 21 after it claimed credit for the Obama daughters' vivid coats, the first lady's green gloves (as well as her attire the day before) and the president's white bow tie on Inauguration Day. And, whether credit goes to the Obamas or a big sale, traffic to its website has remained steadily high since last week, causing periodic technical difficulties as recently as Wednesday. The brand even gets ink on the cover of Us Weekly, hitting newsstands Friday.

Initially, however, some shoppers were put off not just by problems with the website's servers, but also because they couldn't buy the same pieces once they got on. Others pointed out that J.Crew makes much of its clothing in China.

The company's responses have taken the edge off of those complaints.

Last weekend, J.Crew announced that it would make the exact same pieces for fall that the Obamas wore. They will be available in August.

The First Family was sporting outfits courtesy of J. Crew at the inauguration. They hoped to keep their look simple and sleek while staying away from designer labels.

First Lady's dress made with culture in mind

Designer gold coat and dress stitched by workers with diverse heritages and dreams

BY JEAN PATTESON
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

ORLANDO, Fla. — Sometimes, it takes a village to make a dress.

The gold dress and matching coat Michelle Obama wore to her husband's inauguration were commissioned, designed and stitched by a mini-village made up of immigrant women from Europe, Asia and South America – a multiethnic reflection of the "patchwork heritage" President Obama spoke of in his inaugural address.

For those women, it had to be the ultimate made-in-America dream come true to see the first lady wearing their handiwork on the steps of the Capitol.

Isabel Toledo, the ensemble's Cuban-born designer, surely speaks for all the women when she enthuses in post-inaugural interviews: "This is wonderful. I feel so, so happy. She looked beautiful."

Her husband, artist Ruben Toledo, is even more effusive:

"BEYOND A THRILLLLLLLL!!!!!!! IT'S SUCH AN HONOR. WE ARE WALKING ON AIR," he writes in an e-mail.

"This is such a blessing. Our staff consists of people from China, Korea, Poland, Italy, Mexico and Colombia. We have young interns from Japan, Germany, Qatar and Brazil. So you can see we are all living our American dream and feel honored to share our craft with the world," says Ruben, who also is from Cuba – as is his father, Vitellio Toledo, who at age 81 still works as their cutter.

The first lady ordered her gold-lace outfit from Ikram, the ultra-chic Chicago boutique owned by Ikram Goldman, another of the immigrant women who had a hand in the inaugural outfit's evolution.

Born in Israel, Goldman moved to Chicago with her mother and brother when she was 14. After her mother's death a few years later, she worked as a waitress, baby sitter and junior sales associate. She joined the upscale Ultimo boutique in 1990, and opened her own dream establishment a decade later.

Today, she is the first lady's most trusted fashion adviser.

Like Goldman, Toledo was a child when her family emigrated from Cuba and settled in New Jersey. She later attended the Fashion Institute of Technology (FIT) and Parsons School of Design in New York. She launched her first fashion collection in 1995, a year after she and Ruben were married. Since then, their small design house has won high honors – including, in 2005, the Smithsonian's Cooper-Hewitt National Design Award for the best in American design.

Although her exquisitely crafted, cutting-edge designs have long been a favorite in the exclusive boutiques of Paris and Tokyo, Isabel Toledo was hardly a household name in America before last week's inaugural. Obama's gold dress and coat changed all that.

The press descended en masse, and Toledo was the toast of the next morning's TV shows, newspaper fashion pages and the blogosphere.

"She's one of the best designers working anywhere in the world today," said Valerie Steele, director of the Museum at FIT, who describes Toledo as "a wonderful combination of Spanish aristocrat and bohemian artist."

"She is a designer's designer – someone who other designers really admire," said Steele.

When asked late last year to design an ensemble for Obama, Toledo wasn't sure she could finish it in time. The wool-lace fabric had to be shipped from Switzerland, then measured, cut and quilted together with several layers of French silk for warmth – a complex and time-consuming task for her small staff of about a dozen seamstresses.

But this was not an opportunity to be missed. For a week and a half during the Christmas holidays, Toledo and her seamstresses worked "nonstop" on the garments in her penthouse studio, which overlooks the Empire State Building in midtown Manhattan.

Although she had "a feeling" the new first lady would wear the design for the inauguration, Toledo wasn't sure until the morning of the event. That's when her mother-in-law called and told her to turn on the TV.

She and her staff gathered around the studio's set, and there she was: Michelle Obama in their dress.

The design is "typically Isabel – so sophisticated," said Steele, who is staging a retrospective of Toledo's work at the FIT museum this summer. "It looks simple, but when you know her work, you realize the complexity, thought, design and intelligence that went into it."

While there were no guarantees as to when or where the ensemble would be worn, it was designed with the inauguration in mind.

The outfit is "occasion dressing taken to the ultimate degree," said Simon Doonan, Barney's creative director, and an occasional guest judge on "America's Next Top Model."

Upon learning who designed Obama's outfit on Inauguration Day, Doonan immediately replaced the window displays in Barneys' flagship on Madison Avenue with "Isabel Toledo celebration windows."

"A presidential inauguration is not a red-carpet moment, over in a flash," he said. "An outfit for an inauguration has to be at once historical and timeless and perfect. It's under more scrutiny than any frock in history."

Why THIS dress for Michelle Obama?

Isabel Toledo met Michelle Obama for the first time at a fundraiser in New York last year. She was charmed by her open, friendly manner, and wanted to capture that impression in the garments.

Lace, with its open weave and elegance, would be the perfect fabric to complement the first lady's personality, she decided. The complex texture and color variations of lace also would represent the diversity of America.

As for the yellow-green color, which Toledo calls lemongrass, it was chosen, she says, because it feels "fresh, new and full of sunshine."

Toledo selected the color "to be optimistic, to make Mrs. Obama feel happy," says Valerie Steele, director of the Museum at FIT. "Isabel lives by emotion. She starts with a feeling when designing. As a result, people respond emotionally to her clothes."

Obama's dress and coat would cost between $2,000 and $3,000 in a store such as Barneys New York, where Toledo's designs are sold – and where a lighter-weight version of the ensemble will be available this spring.

First Lady Michelle Obama's dress was specially made by a staff of immigrants living out the American Dream in the clothing business, as stitchers, embroiders and cutters.

Keeping in mind her husband's historic election, First Lady Michelle Obama made sure that her dress was unique looking and created with people's dreams in mind.

Similar attire sought by public

Here's how the product placement of the century began, creative director Jenna Lyons recalled: "Basically we had gotten an e-mail from someone in (Michelle Obama's) camp who said, 'Can you call me?' It was cryptic. I called this person back, and she said, 'I'm doing this stuff for the Obamas, and this is what I want.' We did a first round of sketches. They said, 'We love it' and 'Can you do more?' We did more. We pushed the button around the 18th of December to make everything."

Custom-making pieces caused no concern. Nothing was extravagant, Lyons said.

The Obamas are returning unused clothing, she said, and J.Crew will invoice for the rest.

"It never felt elitist at all. They were planning this all at the end of the season. They would've had a hard time (finding the pieces) if they'd just gone shopping. They needed something unique and special but from an approachable company."

Just how approachable was the subject of some debate: What is J.Crew's brand positioning these days? "I don't think we're moderate or luxury," Lyons responded. "We're not doing what Gap is doing, but we're not doing what Louis Vuitton is doing. What we are trying to do is offer people Monday through Sunday things that are of great quality that people can mix into their wardrobe. We're trying to shed the preppy iconography of our past and associate more with classic pieces, the trench coat, the white shirt, the chino; those things can be worn many ways, but the chino we show maybe with a sequin tank top and heels. We're taking something that's stodgy but making it feel more modern."

Prices range from $8 for a headband up to $3,000 for a shearling coat.

"That's why it's hard to put a label on it," Lyons said. "We're trying to break out of that old retail model: That's moderate; that's bridge; that's luxury. Nobody dresses that way."

Then there's the China connection.

"If we could make more things in the U.S., we would," Lyons said. "We are a larger company, and one of the problems is there is no place to go in the U.S. We make all of our denim and belts and (swimwear) in California. But nobody in the U.S. makes shoes; no one makes sweaters. There are a few (manufacturers) in Brooklyn, but they couldn't handle our volume."

So, if anyone thought President Obama's biggest fashion challenge lay behind him ... think again.

and seven rebounds.

The game featured back-and-fourth scoring in the first half, with Danelia tying the game for the fifth time on a 3-pointer with almost nine and a half minutes to play.

Neither team led by more than four points until Gerardot hit a 3-pointer to put the Minutewomen up by seven with eight minutes to go in the half.

UMass led 28-23 at the half, and despite being chased, never stopped leading in part to Young and a stout defense that allowed Rhode Island to shoot just 37.5 percent for the game.

Rams guard Crystal Bellinger, scoring in double-digits for the third-straight game, recorded a team-high 15 points and added six rebounds and four steals in the losing effort.

URI opened the second frame with a jump shot from Bellinger and a pair of free throws by forward Sierra Cooper, cutting the lead to one after a minute of play.

But the Minutewomen went on a 10-0 run with just under 16 minutes, 30 seconds to go in the ballgame thanks in part to Young, who added seven points during the run, breaking the game open for UMass, 38-27.

URI rallied with a pair of baskets by guard Meghan Shoniker and went on an 11-4 run that cut the lead back down to six.

The Minutewomen would take a double-digit lead after a Rams lay-up cut the UMass lead to eight with just over four minutes in regulation.

UMass closed out the game with a 14-5 run and out-rebounded URI 20-13 in the second half to secure the game.

The Rams shot poorly from 3-point range, going 4-for-13, as the Minutewomen dominated in points in the paint, 39-22.

UMass was also able to turn takeaways into points, along with second chances, leading 17-12 in points off turnovers and 13-8 in second-chance opportunities.

The Minutewomen will look for its second-consecutive conference win with its second-straight road game against Dayton this Saturday at 7 p.m.

UM looks to end slide

schedule that ranks 135.

The Spiders are built around a youthful core including three sophomore starters and just three seniors on the team. Senior Jarhon Giddings is the only senior starter, on a team that returned almost every player and finished fourth last season in the A-10.

Junior swingman, David Gonzalvez, leads the team with 16.7 points per game and 4.4 rebounds per game and shoots 50 percent from the floor. Last year's A-10 Rookie of the Year, Kevin Anderson, has also been an integral player this year for the Spiders. The sophomore is second on the team in scoring with 14.6 ppg and also grabs 2.3 rebounds per game.

Three of Richmond's five starters average double figures in points per game, but the Spiders lack an inside presence alter the loss of forward/center Dan Geriot. The junior led Richmond in points (14.3 ppg) and rebounds (5.5 rpg) last season but injured his knee in a summer league competition and will miss the entire season.

Richmond's lack of an inside game could work to UMass' advantage. With Tony Gaffney (10.89 rpg) and Luke Bonner (5.42 rpg) both averaging more rebounds than the Spider's leading rebounder (Justin Harper 5.1 rpg).

Despite the lack of an inside game, Kellogg acknowledges that the Spiders do play a unique style of basketball and the Minutemen need to be prepared.

"We're going to have to do some things to make sure we're aware of how they're trying to play and what they're trying to do," Kellogg said.

Kellogg also noted during his weekly teleconference that the Spiders don't play at a slow tempo but are a very patient team.

"They wait for you to make a mistake, and then they capitalize," Kellogg added.

Last year, while Kellogg was an assistant to John Calipari at Memphis, he saw Richmond when the then-No. 3 Tigers defeated the Spiders 80-63. According to Kellogg, even though the Spiders lost by 17, they controlled the tempo of the game.

The Minutemen will look to defend their home court where they are 2-1 in A-10 play, compared to their 0-3 record on the road.

Summitt misses 1,000

BY VAHE GREGORIAN
ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

OKLAHOMA CITY, Okla. — Before a national television audience and 12,552 fans at the Ford Center, with college basketball history on the line, the drama and intrigue extended into the last minute Monday night.

But Oklahoma star Courtney Paris' staggering streak of double-doubles ended at 112 games when she fouled out with nine points and 12 rebounds.

"That's the only thing that we did well, huh?" Tennessee coach Pat Summitt said afterward, mustering a momentary smile.

The story line, of course, was supposed to have been about a different type of history: Could Summitt, already distinguished by her eight national championships, including the last two, win her 1,000th game?

That's why multiple balls were used in the game, each apparently destined for a different hall of fame or shrine. That's why Brent Musburger and Bob Knight, the winningest major-college men's coach with 902 victories, called the game.

But that possibility had evaporated much earlier, in a flurry of Tennessee turnovers that left Summitt seething most of the second half as Oklahoma built an 18-point lead on the way to an 80-70 victory.

"Trust me, I'm not concerned about a number for me," she said. "I'm concerned about this basketball team investing in our system and not picking and choosing when they want to play hard...some of those turnovers were just, quite honestly, ridiculous."

With four players in double figures and Danielle Robinson doling out 12 assists with her 17 points, the second-ranked Sooners did nothing to diminish Summitt's pre-game assessment of them as a team with promise of reaching the Final Four in St. Louis.

But the victory by OU (19-2) also did nothing to diminish Summitt's place in the game, even as she tries to come to terms with a 16-5, 12th-ranked team that features four freshman starters.

OU coach Sherri Coale said Summitt's 999-187 record was similar to Paris' streak in that both are "incomprehensible." Yet Summitt's reach has been much broader, she noted, citing the crowd and national TV exposure as evidence.

"We couldn't be here," Coale said, adding, "You don't do that without somebody who's grown this game. And that somebody would be her."

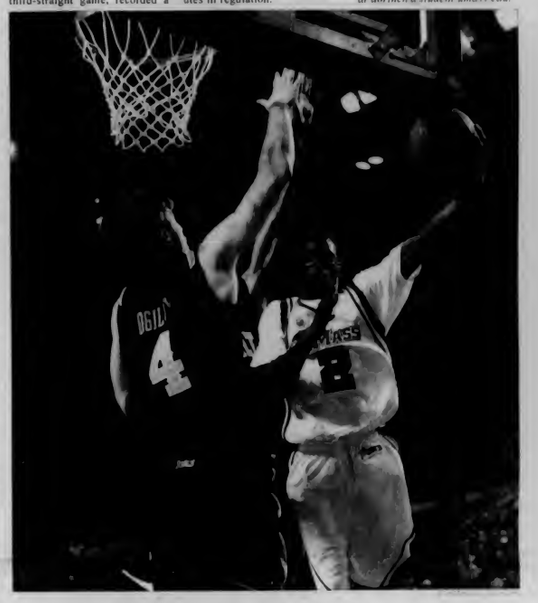
The loss, of course, only delays the inevitable for Summitt, whose singular place in the game long since has been assured.

She was known as Irish Head when she was hired by Tennessee right out of college at Tennessee-Martin 35 years ago, initially daunted by the notion of what was supposed to be an assistant coaching job.

Two weeks later, her trepidation intensified. Then-coach Margaret Hutson decided to take a sabbatical and Head was named head coach, leaving her "absolutely overwhelmed and scared to death," as she once put it.

So much so that she didn't object when Tennessee administrators shortened Patricia to Pat instead of the name she'd always gone by.

But she burrowed in and began creating a program from the ground up, setting up chairs and sweeping the floors before the first game she ever coached, an 84-83 loss to Mercer on Dec. 7, 1974.



Her first win came a month later. Within two years, they were flipping over like an odometer amid a streak of 32 straight 20-win-plus seasons, on course to roll over to a number no one could contemplate seeing again at this level.

The victories, though, are only a hint of the impact and influence of Summitt, who took her husband's last name when she was married in 1980 and has maintained it since being divorced.

Among the other staggering figures that will be her legacy, Summitt has produced 111 graduates, cajoled 58 players to at least one championship ring and inspired 45 former players to become collegiate or high school coaches.

Tennessee's Pat Summitt was denied her 1,000th victory as a head coach monday night against No. 2 Oklahoma. Summitt currently has a record of 999-187 and eight national titles to her name.

David Gibbs drives to the hoop against Vanderbilt on Jan. 3. The freshman has seen a significant amount of playing time this season, averaging 16.5 minutes per game.

Minutemen begining to buy into Kellogg's philosophy

and simply compete hard on every possession. He feels that he saw that effort against Xavier last Saturday and believes that can be a springboard to success today against Richmond.

"I feel like we are in the right frame of mind right now," Kellogg said. "I'm interested to see our guys compete every time out no matter who the opponent is."

Forward Tony Gaffney feels that the team is starting to buy into the philosophy that Kellogg is preaching.

"I think that against Xavier we played the style of basketball that coach Kellogg wants us to play," Gaffney said. "We don't believe in moral victories, but we are happy with the way we played. If a few calls or bounces go our way, we could have won that game."

Out of all the players on the UMass roster, Gaffney probably is the best example of what kind of style of basketball Kellogg wants his team to play. Gaffney is second in the NCAA in blocked shots per game (4.5), eighth in rebounds per game (10.6) and has recorded seven double-doubles this year. He has been crucial, but when the Minutemen guards follow his lead and crash the boards, the team typically excels.

Against Temple on Jan. 17, UMass guards combined for 14 rebounds (out of 36 total), and after that game Kellogg talked about how much easier that makes it on their frontcourt and how it speeds up the Minutemen fast break.

Right now, the Minutemen are looking forward to the A-10 Tournament as their best chance to extend their season. With a 7-12 record, a slot in the National Invitational Tournament looks unlikely and at-large NCAA berth is pretty much impossible. Winning the A-10 Tournament is their only shot at playing in the NCAA tournament.

"We have the ability and the talent to make noise in the A-10 Tournament," Gaffney said. "We just have to pull everything together."

Hockey East goes to the dogs

Terriers, Huskies meet Monday for Beanpot Championship

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Northeastern beat Boston College, 6-1, in the opening round of The Beanpot Monday night at the TD BankNorth Garden. The college hockey world is affixed in the Huskies' corner, but Boston University still stands in their way.

The Terriers defeated Harvard, 4-3, in the early game. The matchup between BU and NU is emerging as common trend in nearly every contest and ranking system 2008-09 has to offer.

Hockey East

Check out the PairWise. BU owns the top spot. NU sits tied for No. 7, but the three games left between the two (two Hockey East and Monday's Beanpot final) could flip that. The Huskies are two points clear of BU in the Hockey East standings. Expect the teams to start trading the first and second positions until the weekend of Feb 20 and 21 when they have their home-and-home pair.

Even some of the races for statistical leaders come down to a Terrier and a Husky. Brad Thiessen is first in the conference in save percentage at .937; meanwhile BU's Kieran Millan is second at .933. The race for goals-against average has Millan and his 1.55 ahead of Thiessen's 2.02.

While no one outside Huntington Avenue expected the Huskies to be a top team in the conference, never mind the country, NU coach Greg Cronin and his team aren't satisfied just yet. With the win over BC, the Huskies are one win away from their first Beanpot Championship since 1988.

"The drought that we've experienced over the years, it does weigh on us," Cronin told USCHO after Monday night's win. "They're kids; you can't filter out the media attention [given to the drought]. Now it's one game. You put this one in the bank and move on."

RACE FOR TOP FRESHMAN

Massachusetts freshman center Casey Wellman leads all freshmen in scoring with 24 points (eight goals and 16 assists). He earned January's Hockey East Rookie of the Month award with three goals and five assists in UMass' eight games.

Two points below Wellman is Providence center Matt Bergland. The most consistent rookie in Hockey East, though, has been BU goaltender Kieran Millan. For most of the season, he and fellow rookie Grant Rollheiser have shared the goaltending duties, but Millan has been the better of the two.

The Terriers lead the conference in scoring, but Millan's play is the primary season for their season-long dominance. They still lead the PairWise Rankings, and earned the No. 1 overall spot in the USCHO/CBS College Sports Division I men's poll. Millan's consistent excellence is the primary reason for BU leading national championship talk.

WHO'S STAYING HOME?

With its loss to Maine, UMass is essentially out of the race for home ice in the first round of the Hockey East Tournament. A strong finish could propel UMass into contention, but it would also require some help from New Hampshire, BC and UMass Lowell.

UNH owns the spot right now with 19 points – one more than BC and UML who are tied for fifth. The Wildcats have a pair with Maine this weekend; a three-point weekend could lift them into third place if Vermont falters against upstart Providence.

Boston University swept the Wildcats two weekends ago. The win against Vermont averted any late season momentum shift in Durham.

"We can't lose two weekends in a row. We lost two games as it is," UNH defenseman Blake Kessel told the Manchester Union Leader. "You can't be doing that too often in Hockey East. Losing three in a row in a two-week span would kind of throw us off for the Maine weekend. This gives us confidence, and now we can just go back to our normal routine."

With the second stage of Beanpot games coming next Monday, BC only plays once this weekend; the Eagles host UMass Friday night at The Heights in the final regular-season game between the teams.

UML spends the whole weekend on the road, first at Boston University and then in Amherst in the deciding game in this year's Alumni Cup (awarded to the winner of the season series between the sister schools).

WILSON'S REVENGE

In the final weekend of the 2006-07 regular season and in the first round of the playoffs, then-freshman David Wilson replaced injured Ben Bishop against UMass. The Minutemen scored 14 goals against him in those four games, eliminating Maine from the Hockey East Tournament.

UMass hockey fans still remember the sight of the inexperienced goaltender constantly digging pucks out of the net while the Minutemen cruised into the Hockey East Semifinals.

On Sunday, Wilson made his first start against UMass since those games in March 2007. He stopped 21 shots in the Black Bears' 2-1 win. Senior defenseman Jeff Dimmen scored the game-winning goal with 24.5 seconds left in regulation.

"It's definitely nice for me [to be playing]," Wilson told The Bangor News after the win over UMass. "I love to play. I love to be in the net. I'm really enjoying things right now."

The win ended a nine-game winless streak (0-7-2) for Maine who currently stands to earn the eighth and final spot on the Hockey East Tournament. The Black Bears are one point behind seventh-place UMass and three points clear of ninth-place Providence.

A home-and-home pair with rival No. 11 New Hampshire awaits Maine this weekend. Freshman Scott Darling earned the starting role with a strong first half but hasn't been so consistent in the New Year.

"I'm definitely surprised," Maine senior Chris Hahn said of Wilson. "Scott got more time and [Wilson] was out of the picture a bit. But he just stayed positive and worked hard, and he was the backbone of our team this weekend."

ICE SHAVINGS

Vermont winger Viktor Stalberg earned Hockey East's player of the month award after scoring eight goals and assisting on four others in the month of January ... Massachusetts winger James Marcou is second in the league in scoring with 31 points on eight goals and 23 assists; no UMass player has ever led the conference in scoring ... New Hampshire forward James vanRiemsdyk is fourth in the league in scoring with nine goals and 18 assists. Since a five-point game against Holy Cross on Dec. 11, though, he's struggled with one assist and no goals in six games played.

Xavier breaks Top 25 after 7-week drought

BY ADAM MCGILLEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Xavier rejoined the AP Top 25 teams in the nation after an eight-week absence from the poll.

The No. 23 Musketeers (19-4, 7-0 Atlantic 10) first appeared on the preseason AP poll as No. 22 in the nation but slipped off the list following a televised loss to cross-town rival Cincinnati on Dec. 7. The team has since won 12 of 13 and 10 straight, led by their stand-out sophomore Ta'Shia Phillips.

A-10 Basketball

Phillips leads the league in double-doubles with 11 this season. Her short career already boasts an impressive 29 double-doubles. The 6-foot-6 center from Indianapolis, Ind., also hit a milestone this season, breaking the 500 rebound mark. She currently has 277 total boards while shooting 63 percent from the field.

Leading her team back onto the AP Top 25 has also garnered Phillips national recognition for her individual effort. She was recently named to the John R. Wooden Award Preseason Watch List along with fellow A-10 competitor, George Washington's senior center Jessica Adair. The Wooden Award is college basketball's most prestigious trophy.

WHERE THE LISCHES RULE

Shooting 45 percent from the field and 43 percent from beyond the arc, St. Louis University's Theresa Lisch moved up to number 12 on the SLU women's career scoring list after scoring her 1,000th point earlier this season. She's not the only Lisch with talent though, as her brother Kevin is currently tied for eighth among the all-time scorers for the Billiken men.

While Kevin Lisch's efforts have helped a still struggling SLU men's team (12-9, 3-4 A-10), Theresa Lisch has lifted the Billiken women into fourth position in the Atlantic 10 (10-11, 4-2 A-10). The recipient of two consecutive A-10 Player of the Week awards in January, Lisch leads the conference in scoring, averaging 20.8 points per game. She has scored more than 20 points in 13 games and over 30 points on two occasions, including a 37 point performance that gave SLU an overtime victory over La Salle, 77-73.

Lisch's performance against the Atlantic 10's second-place team, Charlotte (15-6, 6-1 A-10) on Tuesday night could be pivotal in setting a tone for the Billikens as they try to move out of a three-way tie for fourth between SLU, St. Bonaventure and Temple. As the league's leading scorer, expect her to have a big impact on the Billikens' run for a conference championship.

DAYTON FRESHMEN SHINE

Justine Raterman recently made a racket at Dayton when she combined Rookie of the Week honors in the A-10 with a Player of the Week award. The last time a women's basketball freshman in the conference won both awards outright was UMass's Kelly Van Huisen in 1996. This was Raterman's first Player of the Week honor but the seventh time this season she has earned the rookie spotlight.

The top rookie in the conference, Raterman ranks ninth among all scorers with an average of 13 points per game.

Flyers coach Jim Jabir brought in seven freshmen for this year's team, and it may be the most talented group Dayton has assembled. Each week, the A-10 hands out a Rookie of the Week award, and every week it has gone to a Dayton Flyer.

FORDHAM TURNS IT AROUND

When Fordham closed its season last year, things could not get worse. They hosted then No. 15 George Washington, a conference foe who defeated the Rams handily 66-27. The Rams ended last season 0-29 overall and 0-14 in conference play.

RICH LOMBARDI / COLLEGIAN

Fordham finished last year without a win at 0–29 but is currently tied for first in the nation in team turnaround. The Rams currently boast an overall record of 7–14.

This year has been a different story though, as the Rams (7-14, 0-6 A-10) currently stand tied for first in the nation in team turnaround standings at a positive seven advantage in wins over last season.

Fordham began the season alternating wins and losses, holding to a much improved .500 record and keeping games more competitive. The start of the New Year has since sent the Rams back to their losing ways though, as they have dropped eight straight games since the calendar turned over, including a loss in overtime to Navy on Jan. 5, 70-66.

Fordham will have to look to Randall Hurst, their leading scorer and rebounder (12 ppg, six rebounds per game) to pull them out of their slump and lift them from the bottom of the A-10 conference.

False perceptions of Big 12

Kansas half a game behind No. 2 OU in conference play

BY MIKE JONES
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WACO, Texas — I personally don't like the perception that the Big 12 is "down" this season.

Now, I'm not arguing that the conference is as good as it was last year when Kansas won the NCAA championship and Texas played its way into the Elite Eight and 10 players were NBA draft-worthy.

But "down" doesn't apply. There are no real dog programs around anymore, despite the fact that some are struggling to win games. And for the most part, everyone but No. 2 Oklahoma is in some kind of transition.

That would, of course, include the Jayhawks.

Part of the "down" perception comes when people look at the staggering losses Kansas experienced. You know the names – Brandon Rush, last-game hero Mario Chalmers, Darrell Arthur and the gang of seven major contributors from that championship season are no longer on the roster.

Yet, the 'Hawks rolled into the Ferrell Center on Monday ranked No. 21, a half-game back of the Sooners and geez, not so bad after all as the separation month of February has arrived.

"I do like where we are right now," KU coach Bill Self said the morning before last night's tipoff. "I don't think we're where we should be."

Self was referring to where he felt his team should be come March. And he has to like even better where his team is right now heading back to Lawrence with the 75-65 Big 12 road win against a team that was supposed to live at a prestige address in the conference's first division neighborhood but is having problems meeting the mortgage.

And here's the rub. The younger, least-experienced team took this game over in the second half because it played smarter and with more poise. Presided over by point guard Sherron Collins, KU got a lead and then carefully extended it through a series of clock-draining, well-executed possessions. They had a plan.

"Our guys played older tonight," Self said. "We're still not as hard and tough as we need to be, but this was a step in the right direction."

The Bears, as experienced as any team in the conference on its home floor, had no plan other than shoot the three or drive. Forward Kevin Rogers went long minutes without touching the ball though he made 6 of 9 shots. He should have had 15.

And with Curtis Jerrells (0-for-7 from the floor) still missing in action and seemingly playing without much emotion, Baylor was without a level head to counter Collins, who scored a game-high 17 points with a game-high six assists.

"Sherron was fabulous," Self said. "And I was really pleased with the way we played the second half. That was as good as we've played all year.

"I think this is one of the hardest places in the Big 12 to come in and win because of their talent and experience. But we knew we had a chance to come in and play one of the most talented teams in their house and we were most excited to play."

Collins continues to play at an all-conference level and fill the leadership role Self so desperately needed him to do if he was to have any success in a reloading season.

"I was impressed with the way our young guys played," Collins said. "But I can't be too impressed because that's what we expect out of our young fellas. We know what potential they've got and how well they are learning and how well they've bought into coach's system.

"I like where we are right now and I know we can get better. And we've got time to get better."

On the other hand, time is suddenly running awfully fast for a Baylor team that at least seems to be falling farther and farther behind.

Kansas coach Bill Self had to be restrained by his staff early in the season during the Jayhawks' 61-60 loss to UMass on Dec. 13.

Minutewomen snap streak, defeat Rams

Young lifts UMass to 70-53 win with career-high 22 points

Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team followed their game plan last night instead of letting an opposing team dictate what they were going to do.

The Minutewomen got off to a strong start, reached the foul line and hit their free throws en route to a 70-53 victory against Rhode Island last night.

UMass went a combined 11-of-14 from the charity line, with senior guard Sakera Young leading the way, going 6-of-7 on her way to a career night with 22 points. Young added four steals, and broke her own record set just two games ago against Richmond by going 8-for-11 from the field and 6-for-7 from the free-throw line.

The team also finished the game with a 50.9 percent field-goal average, and was able to hit the glass both offensively and defensively.

The victory was the Minutewomen's (9-13, 2-5 A-10) first since their conference-opening victory against Fordham, a game which they won, 71-62, on Jan. 10th.

The Minutewomen snapped their five-game losing streak, after a three-point loss and a number of comebacks were halted by St. Louis on Saturday at the Mullins Center. Against the Billikens, the Minutewomen could not get to the foul line and couldn't get started on the offensive side of the board.

Sophomore Teya Wright added 16 points and nine rebounds in the effort against the Rams (9-13, 2-5 A-10), while senior guard Stefanie Gerardot notched 12 points along with going 2-for-3 from 3-point land.

After an offensively unsuccessful Saturday against the Billikens, freshman forward Kristina Danella shook her scoring woes, adding nine points

Senior Stefanie Gerardot added 12 points and four rebounds in UMass' 70-53 rout of Rhode Island. The guard is the team's leading scorer on the season, scoring an average of 15.4 points per game.

UM hosts Richmond

With wins against some of the top teams in the Atlantic 10 and a two-point loss to then-No. 10 Xavier, games against middle-of-the-pack Atlantic 10 opponents should be easy for the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

So far this season, that has not been the case for UMass coach Derek Kellogg and his Minutemen. Despite those strong games, UMass has lost to the likes of Toledo and Charlotte.

Although the Minutemen are coming off arguably one of their best games of the year, an 82-80 loss to Xavier, today's opponent, Richmond, will not be taken lightly by Kellogg and his team.

"I've had the opportunity to watch them quite a bit on tape," Kellogg said during his weekly A-10 teleconference. "Quite frankly, I'm a little nervous."

While Xavier (19-2, 7-0 A-10) boasted a perfect record in conference play and is nationally ranked, the same can't be said of the Spiders. Richmond (11-10, 3-3 A-10) is just a game over .500 overall and is .500 in the A-10.

Richmond still holds a better record than UMass (7-12, 2-4 A-10) but on a much easier schedule. The Minutemen currently have the 21st toughest schedule in the nation as opposed to Richmond's

Minutemen hope to play more consistently against spiders

With wins over Temple, Dayton, Kansas and a two-point loss to Xavier, the Massachusetts men's basketball team has proven that it has the ability to compete with any team in college basketball.

However, having ability and consistent ability are two very different things. Too often this season, whenever UMass doesn't play at the top of its game, they have lost to teams like Jacksonville State and Toledo that don't have nearly the skill level of say, Kansas.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg understands that getting a flawless game every night is impossible, but he wants the Minutemen to show the ability to win games when things don't go smoothly.

"A college team won't have their so called 'A' game every time out on the court, Kellogg said. "But can we pull out a couple wins with our 'B' game?"

One of the major issues for the Minutemen (7-12, 2-4 Atlantic 10) is that they are a shooting team. Between Luke Bonner, Chris Lowe, Anthony Gurley and Ricky Harris, UMass has four starting players who can shoot 3-pointers well. If they can knock down those shots consistently, they can beat just about any team in the nation. In what are arguably its four best games, UMass has shot over 35 percent on 3-pointers, the best effort being Jan. 10 vs. Dayton when they hit 46.7 percent from long range.

When those shots aren't falling, the Minutemen can't seem to compete. They shot 29.6 percent in an 80-54 loss against Houston (Dec. 30) and 17.4 percent in a 78-48 loss to Vanderbilt (Jan. 3). The real challenge for Kellogg is finding a way to steal games when the Minutemen's shooters are cold.

Kellogg feels that to overcome a bad shooting night, UMass must make up for it with relentless effort and toughness

Simmons off to Revs camp

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

On Nov. 22, 2008, Zack Simmons sat in the press tent after losing to Harvard, 1-0, in the first round of the NCAA tournament thinking that he just played his last soccer game.

Last Friday, Simmons signed a developmental contract with the New England Revolution, but due to team and league policies he is unable to discuss the terms of his deal.

The Major League Soccer program called Simmons after the MLS draft – in which the Revolution didn't draft Simmons – to invite him to preseason. The Revolution filed discovery on Simmons, meaning they owned the first rights to him. He planned on entering their preseason camp.

"[Then] last week they offered me the [developmental] contract," Simmons said. "New England was where I wanted to be, so I signed it."

Simmons walked onto the Massachusetts soccer team as a freshman and became arguably the best goalkeeper in program history. He played every second of the 84 games in his four year career as a Minuteman. He had a .97 goals against average and currently holds nearly every record in the books, including single-season wins (17), wins (42), shutouts (30) and saves (386).

In 2007, he led the Minutemen to the College Cup and was named All-American – the program's first since 2002. In 2008, he was ESPN The Magazine's Academic All-American of the year.

After the loss to Harvard, Simmons hoped that something would work out for a professional soccer career, but it wasn't a sure thing.

"When we finished up our season, I was kind of coming to grips with the fact that it might have been my last game, but I'm definitely glad to hopefully have another shot at playing another game," Simmons said. "This is definitely beyond anything that I thought I'd ever do with soccer."

Simmons started training on Monday with the Revolution. The preseason training is supposed to be an enjoyable time of year for the team, and it's stressed by the coaching staff and veteran players. The team is working to keep themselves fresh physically and mentally to ease their way into the season.

"I think it's a great approach on preseason because you don't want guys to get burnt out," Simmons said. "[Preseason is] difficult, but it's also a lot of fun and it's a whole new experience and a whole new level. It's just taking it all in and trying to learn from the older guys and trying to work hard."

New economic proposal from UM professor

By Kimya Heidyat-Zadeh
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts professor of economics Gerald Epstein is one of the collaborators on a new long-term economic policy for the U.S. economy.

While economic policies up until now have dealt with short-term relief for industries and workers – namely tax cuts and bailouts – Epstein is one of 20 progressive economists to work on a policy statement which aims for long-term economic stability.

The statement, called the Progressive Program for Economic Recovery and Financial Reconstruction, includes plans for greater regulation of financial markets, investment in education, healthcare and a green economy, as well as the establishment of funds and loans for key industries, federal aid to states and localities and increasing minimum wage as well as workers' ability to unionize.

"The neo-liberal, laissez-faire policies of the Bush administration that have been followed in the U.S. for the past 25 years or so have led to enormous economic insecurity for most Americans and to a huge increase in economic inequality," said Epstein. "Any recovery program must be based on restoring more stability and more fairness to our economy."

Obama considers former SOM prof for 'bad bank'

By Samuel Butterfield

Former Isenberg School of Management professor Sheila Bair is being considered by the Obama administration to help create a "bad bank" to absorb debt and bad assets from troubled American banks.

Bair, the chairwoman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp (FDIC), was appointed by former President George W. Bush, but quickly became a financial enemy of the Bush regime due to her consistent calls for government regulation and intervention in the mortgage market.

Despite looming financial calamities across the banking system, Bair has told Americans to remain calm and ride out the economic woes.

"We all just need to get a hold of ourselves," she told the Associated Press in an interview Monday.

Raised in the small town of Independence, Kansas, Bair brings a Midwestern practicality to managing America's banking system. A graduate of the University of Kansas and its school of law, Bair quickly shrugs off her soft-spoken demeanor for a business attitude, which her former political mentor, Bob Dole, described to the AP as "aggressive in the

Library evacuation caused by two fires

MATT ROCHELEAU/COLLEGIAN

The Amherst Fire Department arrived shortly after smoke alarms were triggered around 12:38 p.m. yesterday. The alarms were set off by two small fires on separate floors of the W.E.B. DuBois Library.

Two small fires on separate floors caused an evacuation of the 26-story W.E.B. DuBois library, which remained closed for about three-and-a-half hours Wednesday afternoon.

Both fires were short-lived, caused minimal damage and are under investigation, officials said. There were no injuries.

The fires began in green paper recycling bins on the 18th and 22nd floors, according to a University statement. Smoke triggered the fire alarms and lit emergency strobes around 12:38 p.m., forcing officials to evacuate the building and prevent others from entering until 4 p.m.

Terry Warner, assistant director of administrative service of the library, said this is the first time there has been a fire in the library since she began working there in 1985.

The fire on the 22nd floor was put out by a person riding the elevator down who smelled smoke when the elevator's doors opened. The person put out the smaller of the two fires using one of the library's emergency fire extinguishers, said Warner, who declined to disclose the person's name but did say that the person was not a library staff member. The other fire was put out by the Amherst Fire Department.

"We're pretty good about evacuating," said Warner. "Our main concern is getting everyone out safely - leave it to the professionals to take it from there."

The library's second priority, she said, is to make sure the building is "safe to occupy before we let anyone back in."

Initially, library workers had told students that they would be allowed back in the building within a half-hour.

However, officials later announced the library would not re-open until 4 p.m. because, "the building was cleared to contain the fire and clear the air of smoke," said responding UMass police officer Brian Green

SGA votes on ALANA increase

By Mike Fox
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Senate voted last night to endorse the expansion of advising opportunities available to the ALANA community.

The motion was sponsored by several senators who talked about the need to increase opportunities and student-support systems within the campus available to people seen as traditionally underrepresented.

The bill called for a number of measures including increasing funding for graduate student aids for ALANA associated programs, creating office assistance for each program, removing existing student-support systems from the cultural centers and the Center for Student Development to more academically focused areas, creating support systems to advise on academic affairs and assist outreach and encouraging the programs to apply for grant funding.

Senator Derik Oslan of Central residential area, one of the sponsors of the bill and the Internal Chair of the ALANA Caucus emphasized his feeling that the impersonal nature of the school can make it difficult for traditionally underrepresented students.

There were concerns about whether the SGA's efforts would be better suited on an initiative to improve all campus advising, but Oslan said the "ALANA caucus represents all students who feel that they are underrepresented or underprivileged." He added that similar successes for other groups would be considered a success of the caucus and the greater University community.

Several senators expressed concerns over the motion; such as where funding would come from due to the current budget crisis.

"I support a program like this," said Senator Ben Levine of Southwest residential area, "But it is too idealistic during the current budget crisis and would be smarter to pursue down the road.

"With the size of a school like UMass, students can't expect people to come knocking on their doors offering help. People will be rewarded if they seek assistance."

"At this university in addition to large institutions of similar form, it is common practice in times of economic instability to discontinue the allocation of resources that are most closely associated with underrepresented students; particularly students of color, the support programs alluded to in the motion were

Few people think of hip-hop when they consider effective educational tools to use in the classroom, but Marcella Hall is working to change that misconception.

Hall, a social justice education doctoral student at the University of Massachusetts School of Education, and her innovative ideas about education have started to get increasing recognition in academia. Last month, Hall was one of 10 graduate students, chosen from over 200 other applicants to receive the K. Patricia Cross Future Leaders Award, by the Association of American Colleges and Universities (AAC&U).

The award, which requires a stringent application process, recognizes graduate students for exemplifying exceptional leadership ability and demonstrating a commitment to developing academic and civic responsibility in themselves and others.

The AAC&U is a national organization which aims to promote "quality, vitality and public standing" of undergraduate liberal education, according to the organization's website. The Cross Award is one of the ways the AAC&U aims to recognize and encourage promising new educators.

"It is such a prestigious thing to even be affiliated with them," said Hall. "I believe so strongly in what they've done around the country."

The ten recipients of the Cross Award were vetted at the annual meeting of the AAC&U, held in Seattle from Jan. 21-24. Over the four-day conference, they were introduced to the award selection committee as well as their colleagues, and participated in meetings where they were able to present their own work.

"They really rolled out the red carpet at every opportunity," said Hall. "They really wanted us to feel special."

Hall said that it was energizing to receive recognition for her work.

"Writing a dissertation is a very isolating thing. I came back from the conference feeling inspired and affirmed," she said.

Her dissertation "Education in a Hip-Hop Nation: Identity, Politics and Pedagogy" explores how hip-hop can be incorporated as a learning tool in the curriculum. One of the opportunities at the conference for the award recipients was being invited to

"I got to meet presidents from across the country, which was really cool," she said.

Another one of the highlights of the conference for Hall was meeting the sponsor of her award, K. Patricia Cross, member of the Board of Trustees of The Carnegie Foundation of Advancement of Teaching and the David Gardner Professor of Higher Education emerita at the University of California at Berkeley.

"This is a stellar year for the future of faculty leadership," said Cross in a press release. "It is heartwarming to see these impressive and dedicated teachers joining the faculties of our colleges and universities, and we are so pleased to provide both praise and publicity for their extraordinary accomplishments."

Hall's work reflects many of the goals the AAC&U seeks to promote. She is currently the associate director of the Center for Multicultural Education and Programs at New York University, an organization that seeks to "make an institutional impact in intercultural awareness and understand-

Morris signs 19 in first class

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Despite having the job for only a little over two weeks, Massachusetts head football coach Kevin Morris still found plenty of time for some major roster additions.

Nineteen players were added to the UMass roster for the 2009 season on national signing day, headlined by junior college quarterback transfer Kyle Havens – who will compete with four other quarterbacks to be the replacement for graduated star quarterback Liam Coen.

Morris' class has six other offensive players – most notably record-setting running back Jamar Smith from Binghampton, N.Y. – and 11 defensive players, including linebackers and identical twins Tim and Tom Brandt from Natick, Mass. The group also consists of Jeff Strait, who will likely start at punter as a freshman.

Havens, who will be a junior with two years of eligibility remaining, is the only transfer on the list. The other 18 players will be freshman, and many of them will likely be redshirted.

Morris was pleased with the group that committed to play at UMass, especially considering the program got off to a bit of a late start.

"Being that it's my first class, and it came right in the middle of the [coaching] change and right during the peak of recruiting when kids are on the fence to where they're going to go, I am really pleased with everyone of these kids that we have on board," Morris said.

The announcement comes on the first day of signing, meaning that Morris' work is far from over.

"People forget that signing day is just the first day, not the last. Recruiting is a long process," Morris said. "There are a few more spots to fill. It's always going to be the best available on the board, we're going to stick to that philosophy – position comes second. We're trying to get the highest value first."

House votes to delay digital switch over

BY KIM HART
THE WASHINGTON POST

WASHINGTON — The House voted Wednesday to delay the nation's transition to digital television by four months, less than two weeks before broadcasters were scheduled to turn off traditional analog signals and air only digital programming Feb. 17.

The vote is a victory for the Obama administration and Democratic lawmakers who pushed to give consumers more time and resources to get ready for the switch. Some Republicans argued a delay would cause further confusion and cost broadcasters millions.

President Obama has said he will sign the bill delaying the switch once it lands on his desk.

Broadcasters now have until June 12 to turn off their analog signals, although they can do so anytime after Feb. 17 if they choose to. Many broadcasters already air a digital signal as well as an analog signal. Once analog signals cut off, consumers with older analog TV sets that receive over-the-air broadcasts with an antenna will need to buy a digital TV set or install a converter box to keep getting signals.

By law, broadcasters must shut off analog signals in order to free up more airwaves for public safety communications networks and new wireless services for consumers, such as wireless broadband service. The bill passed by Congress will allow public safety agencies to use the TV frequencies as they are vacated by stations.

The push to delay the transition began when the Commerce Department program to distribute coupons for converter boxes ran out of money. Since then, more than 3.3 million consumers have been placed on a waiting list for the $40 coupons. New coupons cannot be mailed out until already-issued ones reach their 90-day expiration date.

A top aid to Obama sent a letter asking members of Congress to consider delaying the transition so money from the stimulus package could be allocated to the transition process, including the coupon program. The call for a delay was echoed by consumer groups and some broadcast networks. AT&T and Verizon Wireless, which spent billions last year to purchase the soon-to-be-freed airwaves, said the one-time delay of the transition would not hurt their plans to use the spectrum for their own advanced wireless products.

The bill to postpone the digital switch was first passed in the Senate last week. Two days later, House Republicans blocked the bill from getting the two-thirds majority needed to pass under the rules applied to the legislation, even though the majority of lawmakers voted in favor of the delay.

But on Thursday the Senate passed the same bill that had failed in the House, which gave the House another vote, this time needing only a simple majority to pass.

On Wednesday, House Commerce Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., sent a letter to other committee members informing them of the number of consumers in their districts waiting for coupons. The committee's ranking Republican, Joe Barton, R-Texas, argued in his own letter that half the consumers on the waiting list have satellite or cable service and are therefore not in danger of losing TV service.

Acting Federal Communications Commission Chairman Michael Copps said today that 143 broadcasters have already terminated their analog signals and another 60 stations plan to do so before Feb. 17. Other stations have told the agency they plan to shut off analog signals on the original transition date, but they may choose to remain on the air.

The U.S. has been planning to switch from analog to digital for a number of years because of the technological advantages.

States has led to a worldwide domino effect, the policy statement promotes the coordination global recovery effort.

"It is not so much a question of the U.S. helping the rest of the world," said Epstein. "It is a question of the U.S. taking a lead role in cooperating and helping to coordinate a global response to the problem.

"Of course, the U.S. should keep its commitments to giving at least 0.7 percent of its GDP (gross domestic product) in foreign aid to help achieve the millennium development goals, but the most important thing is to make sure the world deals with these problems cooperatively rather than breaking up into dysfunctional and dangerous competition or even anarchy."

As for efforts to stimulate the national economy, Epstein believes the Obama administration's $819 billion stimulus package needs to invest more money in green technology, education and health.

"I would have preferred it had more aid for states, towns and cities, more spending on employment guarantees rather than tax cuts," said Epstein. "Tax cuts are not the best way to go because they generate fewer jobs for every dollar spent and they focus on increasing consumption, when in fact, we need to provide much more in the way of investment."

The Obama stimulus package has allocated $275 billion in tax cuts, $217 billion in aid to states and local governments, $120 billion in relief, $74 billion on infrastructure, $59.5 billion in energy efficiency projects and $54.6 in human capital and, according to The Wall Street Journal.

The policy statement calls for aid to states and industries key to the economy's health, like the automobile industry, in the form of loan guarantees and direct loans.

"It is true the United States government has borrowed a lot of money, though it is not extremely high by historical standards or compared to other countries," said Epstein. "We borrow a lot from ourselves and from others around the world.

"If this money is wisely spent so that it adds to investment and productivity and helps improve the health and education of our citizens and the ability of our country to produce without destroying the planet, then our economy will prosper and we won't have much problem paying back the debt."

The Progressive Program also states that government should be an employer of last resort, or an employer which workers go to when no other jobs are available.

"Starting immediately, people should be able to get government jobs at prevailing or living wages (whichever is higher) to engage in useful work for the community," says the policy statement.

"As part of this recovery, we must begin to make a transition to a green economy: one that is based on non-fossil fuels so that we do not contribute more to global warming," said Epstein.

"As Robert Pollin and his colleagues at the Political Economy Research Institute (PERI) have shown, these policies can also generate many good jobs and therefore contribute to fighting the ongoing crisis."

Short-term recovery programs in the Progressive Program include aid to states meant to keep families in their homes with a one-year moratorium on housing foreclosures and policies to improve income support and raise the minimum wage.

The Progressive Program also calls for "congressional hearings to investigate the cause of the financial crisis and to study the best methods for reregulating finance."

Plans to improve the ability of workers to form unions are included in the policy statement, which Epstein said will give workers the ability to organize and voice their opinions on how the economy should work.

Bair went to work for the U.S. Treasury in 2001, but left for Amherst in the summer of 2002 to spend more time with her family and teach financial regulatory policy.

Former Isenberg School Of Management professor Sheila Bair.

Isenberg School professor of finance Ben Branch said Bair, despite being on leave from UMass, is an asset to the school and the Obama administration in that she brings recognition to the University and a voice of tempered moderation to a generally liberal government.

"Sheila Bair is a real credit to the school to the extent that people associate her with us," he said.

Branch also said that the new "bad bank" was by no means a lock.

"From what I understand, the government is leaning towards guaranteeing these assets as opposed to buying them up, which would mean there would be no bad bank and would be the FDIC insuring them," he said.

Bair has overseen many of the steps taken to corral America's present financial issues. In July 2008, she halted all foreclosures on bank-owned loans in the portfolio of IndyMac, which failed earlier that month, so as not to unnecessarily foreclose on any homeowners in a time of mass foreclosure.

Bair also oversaw two of the largest bank mergers in history, that of Wachovia by Wells Fargo and that of Washington Mutual by JP Morgan Chase.

Bair clashed with the Bush administration over its $700 billion bailout package, which she said was insufficient for Americans facing foreclosures. In November, she released a $24.4 billion plan aimed at preventing further foreclosures, though former Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson refused to pay for it.

Some senators had other concerns about the proposal.

"I don't feel comfortable about making the cultural or ethnic identities that students identify on their applications available," Said Senator Josh Davidson, also of Southwest.

The motion passed with 17 votes in favor, five against and three abstentions.

The Senate also voted to approve a motion that called for the reinstatement of Jason Vassell as a student, whose arrest last year continues to spark controversy.

Controversy over octuplets

BY ASHLEY SURDIN
THE WASHINGTON POST

LOS ANGELES — Public opinion seems to be cresting against her, her own mother is rattled, and now fertility experts are suggesting the case of Nadya Suleman and her octuplets constitutes a breach of medical guidelines.

Suleman, 33, gave birth to six boys and two girls by Caesarean section Jan. 26 at a Kaiser Permanente Medical Center in Bellflower, Calif. The miraculous event – reportedly one of only two live octuplet births ever in the United States – quickly drew criticism after it was revealed that Suleman is single, unemployed, lives with her mother and already has six children – including twins – ranging in age from 2 to 7.

Her daughter "is not evil, but she is obsessed with children. She loves children, she is very good with children, but obviously, she overdid herself," her mother, Angela Suleman, told the Los Angeles Times. She decided to have more embryos implanted in hopes of having "just one more girl."

"And look what happened. Octuplets. Dear God."

The birth of eight babies to a woman who becomes responsible for 14 children is attracting a different set of worries from the medical community, particularly fertility doctors, who say it goes against the mission of their work: to minimize high-risk, multiple-birth pregnancy and safely provide a woman with a single healthy baby. It is also raising questions about the lax regulations covering doctors and clinics that provide such services.

"It was a grave error, whatever happened," said Eleanor Nicoll, a spokeswoman for the American Society for Reproductive Medicine (ASRM), which was not involved in the research.

The estimated length, 43 feet, "is the same as the largest Tyrannosaurus rex that we know of, although it only weighs one-sixth as much," he added.

The find sheds light on snake evolution but also provides insights into climate. Because Titanoboa cerrejonensis, as it has been named, was cold-blooded, the tropical climate had to be 6 to 8 degrees warmer than it is today for a snake that large to survive, said evolutionary biologist Jason Head of the University of Toronto Mississauga, lead author of a paper on the fossils appearing Thursday in the journal Nature.

The fossils of several specimens of the snake are from a cache of fossils excavated from the Cerrejon coal mine in Colombia. Paleontologists are excited about the find because there are few fossils of tropical vertebrates from the period after the dinosaurs' demise 65 million years ago.

Most rock outcroppings that might contain fossils have been hidden by the region's foliage, said paleontologist Jonathan Bloch of the University of Florida, who identified the snake. "The entire 10-million-year period following the extinction of the dinosaurs is a blank slate," he said.

Bloch and his students found hundreds of specimens dug from the mine, including "the largest freshwater turtle ever known" and "beautifully preserved skeletons" of an extinct species of crocodile "known to have been in South America but never seen before."

They also found fish fossils, related to bone fish and tarpon, that would have lived in brackish seawater. "That indicates it was a big, riverine system close to the ocean," Bloch said.

Titanoboa was probably the largest non-marine creature living on Earth during that period, Head said. The turtles and crocodiles that the team excavated were probably the giant snake's primary diet.

Snakes are generally able to swallow prey that weighs about the same as they do, Conrad said. Modern photos show reticulated pythons eating deer that weigh 120 to 150 pounds, he said. This snake, weighing 2,500 pounds, "could eat a large cow or a bison" – if there had been any around.

Extrapolating from the energy requirements of modern snakes, the team estimated that Titanoboa required an average yearly temperature of 86 to 93 degrees Fahrenheit, higher than the modern average of about 83 degrees in coastal Colombia.

This expands on current theories about what happens at the equator during periodic bouts of natural global warming. One school of thought holds that temperatures at the equator are buffered, staying relatively constant while more northern latitudes heat up.

Library trash blazes

The fires were both started in recycling bins on the 18th and 22nd floors. Damage was minimal to the library and there were no injuries.

Junior Emily Ward said that she smelt smoke while studying on the 18th floor.

"We heard the alarm and everyone was like 'ah crap,'" said senior Alex Owens who was in room 767 of the library when the alarms sounded.

Owens, a journalism and anthropology double major, said people were directed away from the elevators and told to use the stairs.

"I was down in the basement and the alarm went off," said Keith Shannon a senior journalism major. "They were saying it was a drill."

Shannon was supposed to have a class in library room 720 at 1:25 p.m., which was cancelled due to library's closing.

"They told me that I needed to go away for a half hour," said Kristen Johnson, a sophomore sociology major who attempted to enter the building at 1 p.m. "They didn't tell us anything, but a firefighter went in and then another went in a little after."

The Fire Department, UMass Police and Environmental Health and Safety all responded to the scene.

Past alarms and evacuations have been non-fire related, like those caused by dust from construction being done inside the building, or fire drills, Warner said.

Gargantuan snake discovered

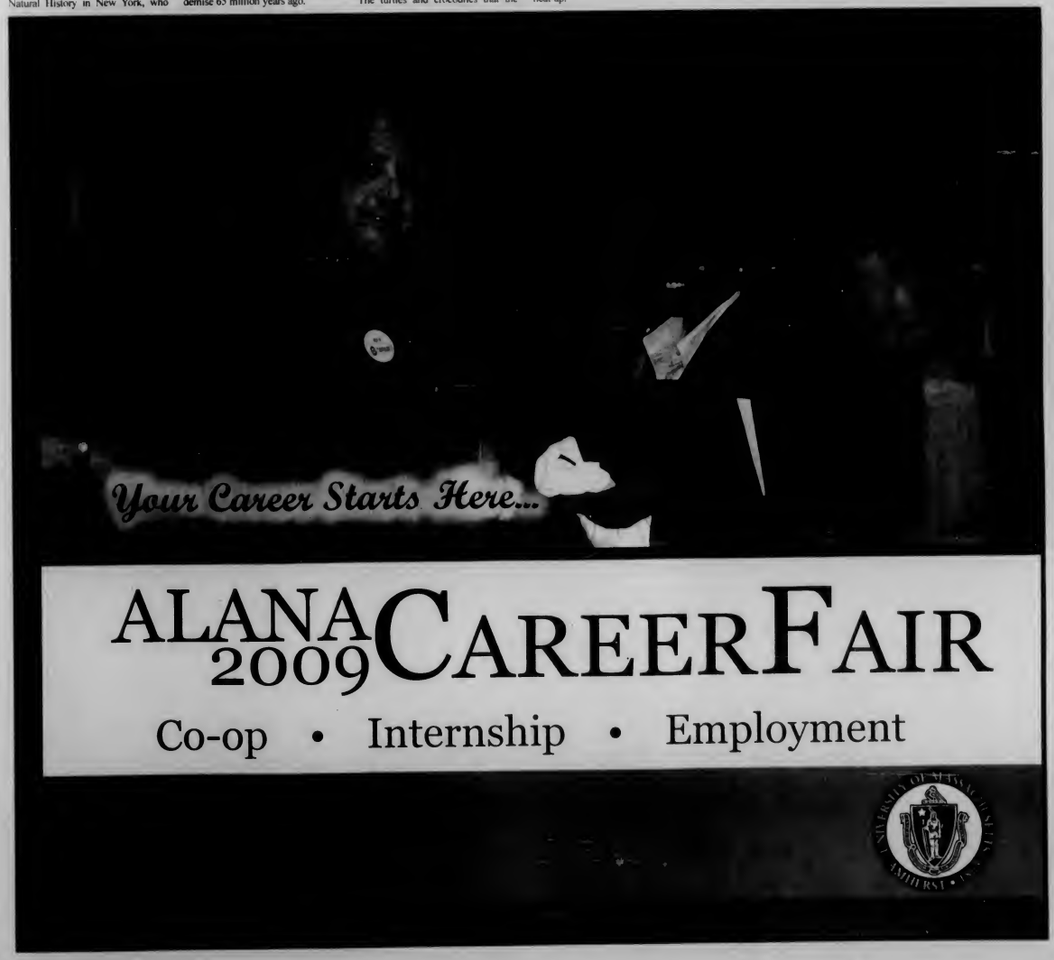
BY THOMAS H. MAUGH II
LOS ANGELES TIMES

COLUMBIA — It was the mother of all snakes, a behemoth as long as a school bus and as heavy as a Volkswagen Beetle, that ruled the Amazon rainforest for 2 million years before slithering into non-existence.



Now this monster has resurfaced in fossils taken from an open-pit coal mine in Colombia, a startling example of growth gone wild.

Modern boas and anacondas, which average less than 20 feet in length and reach a maximum of 30 feet, have been known to swallow Chihuahuas, cats and other small pets, but this prehistoric monster snacked on giant turtles and primitive crocodiles.

"This is amazing. It challenges everything we know about how big a snake can be," said herpetologist Jack Conrad of the American Museum of Natural History in New York, who

Students and staff were not allowed back into the library until 4 p.m. after the library was evacuated just before 1 p.m.

A high bar set for Latin honors

Just as the fall semester was coming to a close, the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate voted to change the qualifications for high Latin honors upon recommendation from Chancellor Robert Holub.

Formerly, the successful completion of the Commonwealth College honors curriculum was the only way to attain magna and summa cum laude, in addition to maintaining a 3.8 and 3.5 GPA, respectively. The University's new policy will confer Latin honors to students whose GPAs rank among the top of their college's graduating class.

The top 5 percent will receive summa, the top 10 magna and the top 25 cum laude.

We at The Collegian understand that each system maintains merit in terms of conferring the honor. We appreciate the value of going beyond one's normal coursework through a challenging curriculum. But we also understand that the honors program is not appropriate for every student and may unfairly prevent some students from obtaining high honors.

What we don't agree with are the reasons precipitating the change.

Holub posited the change as a way to reward excellence in Commonwealth College by eliminating an incentive for super-A's. He reasoned that with fewer students, the school could do a better job educating the more who appreciate the intrinsic value of an honors education. Furthermore, the college will be less rewarded when it experiences an inequitable reduction in state funding next fiscal year.

Perhaps this is a logical conclusion since there are a number of students who have joined the honors program with the sole intention of receiving high Latin honors. But we believe it's irresponsible to make such a sweeping change with unforeseen consequences on the heels of a budget crisis.

Similarly, the argument that the change is consistent with the policy of the University's "peer institutions" is unconvincing. It's even less persuasive when you consider the colleges cited were the University of Buffalo, Rutgers and Connecticut in a Dec. 12 article on "In the Loop," the University's official propaganda website.

With Holub's rhetoric perpetually being constructed around the phrase "premier research university," shouldn't we be comparing ourselves to schools like Cal-Berkeley or Michigan?

Many consider the honors program to be unattainable, as a number of students pursue other valid interests besides focusing solely on academics.

This argument has merit, but it may come as a shock to some students as to what GPA level will be required to attain summa and magna cum laude when the University registrar releases the CVs counting the much college in the coming months.

According to the GPA averages of the Last three graduating classes at College of Humanities and Fine Arts graduate school, the equivalent of a 3.9 GPA to obtain summa, for example. In each college, it's likely that a higher GPA will be required to earn summa and magna than what's required in the old system.

Consequently high Latin honors may be more accessible in theory, but your GPA will need to be in the stratosphere to qualify.

Goodbye and good riddance, Guantanamo

Eric Magazu

Two weeks ago, President Barack Obama signed an executive order that has set into motion the closure of the military detention center at the Guantánamo Bay Naval Base. President Obama intends within a year for all of the current detainees to have had their cases resolved in some form and that Guantánamo be closed. President Obama's order is morally justified and brings the United States into line not just with our own Constitution and American ideals, but restores the universal ideals of truth and justice, and begins to show signs of a new, more humble approach to foreign policy.

Since former President George W. Bush began the war on terror shortly after the airplane attacks on the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001, America has increasingly relied on tactics that call into question our own commitment to certain universal ideals. It is a common moral argument that a person or a nation should not delve to the depths of their enemies. Using this standard, it is dubious whether America's past actions would be justifiable under such an 'eye for an eye' standard, let alone realizing that an 'eye for an eye' is not the true standard that reflects justice and mercy.

Mercy always has the potential to be misapplied and result in more harm than good. Being mindful with naivety can lead to permitting injustice against the innocent, as we know that releasing a dangerous person into the public can mean that innocents might be harmed. In these cases, strict justice is indeed showing mercy. However, when mercy is dispensed with grace, it can lead to the restoration of lost lives. Strict justice does not allow much leeway for wrong-doing, but mercy allows people to have a margin of error.

In a country with the power and influence of the U.S., it is this correct form of mercy that the world needs. The powerful are the ones that are most able to display mercy, because mercy brings glory to the giver and redemption to the receiver.

America's past policy at Guantánamo did not even reach this level. In this scenario, we are merely looking at whether we have applied our own principles with consistency. The U.S. Constitution provides safeguards for the rights of individuals, and the Geneva Conventions provide surety during wartime. By classifying a whole range of people as enemy combatants, former President Bush circumvented the normal avenues for the resolution of criminal cases.

Returning to our traditional approach of being a humble nation that offers hope to the world.

The argument can be made that these cases are not appropriate for civilian courts. If this is true, military courts-martial can be used in their stead, but, one way or another, justice needs to be made manifest for these individuals and a final determination made as to their status. Leaving several hundred people in indefinite detainment is not consistent with our Constitution.

While there have always been detractors, America has traditionally been admired in the world for upholding certain ideals. America offers hope to many throughout the world. In the past, this goodwill extended yet further because America was considered a great power without being imperial or throwing its weight around. America always took its time before being roused to any military response.

In the current situation, it appears that we have used our power to push our way around in the world, especially in the Middle East. This has turned many admirers into critics. As a first principle, Americans should never bend its ideals to the critiques of the elites of foreign nations, but in the present case we only have our own values upon which to look.

President Obama has conditioned his executive order to ensure that the national security interests of the U.S. will not be compromised. He has proposed that the current cases be reviewed, and that prisoners either be returned to their home countries or tried in either a civilian or military court.

Returning to our traditional approach of being a humble nation that offers hope to the world, and not imposing our will on people that are not convinced, will itself go a long way towards restoring goodwill for the United States in the international arena.

President Obama would do well to stay firm on his commitment to close Guantánamo, withdraw American troops from Iraq, and disengage from excessive military intervention in foreign affairs.

Planning for the closing of the American military base at Guantánamo Bay is an important first step towards restoring America's image abroad. It not only heralds in a more traditional and humble approach to American foreign relations, but brings us back to our own first principles. This continues progress both domestically and internationally, and all Americans should eagerly encourage President Barack Obama in this effort.

The books you don't read

S.P. Sullivan

There's a stack of books on my desk that's taller than a Blue Wall sub is long – and approximately 67 times as expensive.

When the purgatorial period of add/drop comes to a close, the books – and the credit card debt – begin piling up. And after the initial shock and awe, and the question 'why in the hell these things are so expensive' is answered with a shrug and a call to mom and dad, another question arises: What do I have to read?

Not 'what's on the syllabus?' – that's in black and white. It's a nuanced art which many college students master better than their chosen field of study to navigate syllabi and figure out the bare minimum we can get away with.

As a student of anthropology, I'm interested in my contemporaries' 'bookways,' or how they make use of their textbooks once they've been screwed by the textbook industrial complex.

I had this hypothesis that I was working with for a while that there's an implicit contract between professors and students that says: 'this is too much reading. I know this. Only a small percentage of you will do all of it. But enough of you will read Book A and enough of you will read Book B and enough of you are prodigious-enough bullshitters that we'll be able to keep the conversation going all semester.'

So I asked around: What percentage of assigned readings, roughly, do you do each semester? Most of the answers were in the double-digits, but less than half were passing grades; one woman just answered, "Ha!"

Emboldened, I took my hypothesis to the two men responsible for my leaning tower of literature, Dickie Wallace, an adjunct professor from the anthropology department and Norman Sims, professor in the journalism department.

In retrospect, I wish I hadn't, because neither of them bought it, and now I have to do all the reading.

"I don't agree entirely with your thesis, which is that professors don't expect students to do all the reading," Sims said. "Realistically, I think we understand that not all books are read, but I don't know anyone who would make an assignment with that expectation."

So I asked around: What percentage of assigned readings, roughly, do you do each semester?

"I wouldn't say it's an implicit contract, but that it's an understanding among profs that they have to teach to the front of the room and the back of the room," Wallace told me in an interview on the first floor of the W.E.B. Du Bois library, beneath 20 some-odd floors of UMass students Facebooking, fornicating and lighting fires.

Oh, and doing their reading.

"But there's no way I can design tests and papers that include every chapter. I have an idealistic assumption that you'll want to do it all."

To wit: We know you don't, but we wish you would.

Sims also told me that readings today are nothing compared to what they once were.

"The rule-of-thumb used to be one book a week for, say, English classes," he said. "Today that might seem excessive to some students, but one of my classes this semester has a book every two weeks."

Sims, an expert on literary journalism, has a sizeable reading list of eight books for his class Literary Journalism in the Twentieth Century, not including the frequent hand-outs. But he knows his stuff.

"The thing about Norm," Joe Meloni, my managing editor, told me recently, "is that you do all his reading during the summer after his class, when you have time to."

In his own defense, Sims told me: "If you use this class in your story, be sure to mention that it's a four-credit honors course."

Sure thing, Norm.

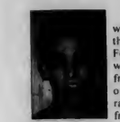
But Sims also told me that he avoids "it would be good for you to read this" books, because they're "frequently ignored, and they should be." Wallace also said he tries to "be explicit" about how the readings tie into course concepts.

"It's frustrating when students don't do the readings, don't see the connection, and sometimes end up being critical of the class afterward because they don't make that connection."

It's easy to bemoan the rising cost of textbooks as prohibitive, a barrier to entry for those cash-strapped scholars trying to get a quality education on a budget. Yet a lot of students, myself included, are too lazy or too busy or some sort of odd combination thereof to sit down and get their money's worth anyway. So we buy them, grudgingly, or don't, and hope ol' W.E.B. Du Bois has them on reserve on one of his lower floors for the week before the final.

Of course, that's all behind me.

But there's no implicit contract, like I once thought. So maybe that's how we lighten the self-guilt over ignoring our studies to sleep or party or chase stories for student newspapers, rather than do the very thing we put ourselves into debt to do, which some are not fortunate enough to do:



Read the goddamn book.

Cleanup on Beacon Hill

Nick Milano

A few weeks back, at a party with friends, we had MTV on in the background playing music. For some reason, however, MTV was rebroadcasting the concert from the Youth Ball on the night of President Obama's inauguration. A good amount of my friends were visibly upset, and all exclaimed, just about in unison. "I hate politics! I hate everything to do with politics and politicians."

My 16-year-old sister is the same way. While I am a political buff, having interned with Senator Kerry this past summer, she hates everything about it. And it's easy to understand why when looking at recent incidents.

What has happened in the Massachusetts House of Representatives was long overdue. Sal DiMasi finally acknowledged that it was no longer politically viable for him to keep his position as speaker of the House. After months of both rumors and hard facts that seemed to show a history of corruption and abuse of power, DiMasi at last relinquished his power. Despite his reelection to the speakership and firm support from his North End constituency, DiMasi realized the newspaper reports and investigations into the monetary link between him and Richard Vitale became too much to overcome to be a successful Speaker. It's a shame because Sal DiMasi is a champion of progressive interests whose resume speaks for itself.

When Governor Patrick announced that he wanted to consider bringing casinos to Massachusetts, the first and last obstacle that he just could not evade was DiMasi, a firm opponent of exploiting people's bad habits to raise state money. Governor Patrick promised that he would not use a quick fix to bring the state more income, but DiMasi realized that was what casinos were and used his power as Speaker to send the bill to committee for further study, in effect ending any chance of a real vote in the House.

He has also done more for progressive, liberal causes than any speaker in a long time. Working with former Republican Governor Mitt Romney, DiMasi wrote and helped pass statewide health care reform. The result is a mandatory health insurance law and punishments for those who to skirt the requirement to get insurance.

It's a shame because Sal DiMasi is a champion of progressive interests whose resume speaks for itself.

Even though Romney's politics might have suggested that he was against a personal mandate or using the free market even farther out of health care, DiMasi's bill made it through the Senate and was signed by Romney. Then, when Romney used his line item veto to knock down some provisions of the law, DiMasi rallied the House to the required two-thirds majority to override them. As a fervent supporter of health care reform, DiMasi got the bill he wanted. In just the first year after the reform, the number of uninsured people in Massachusetts dropped by one-half.

Other successes included his working with Governor Patrick to prevent the state from voting on whether or not to enact a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. His leadership ensured that the right to marry would remain a right for all people. DiMasi also helped to defeat former Governor Romney's attempt to bring back the death penalty to Massachusetts and the expansion of slot machines to dog tracks.

His successful leadership of the Massachusetts House of Representatives is what deserves to remembered for years down the line.

But apparently the power was too much for him to handle. It came out a couple of weeks ago that Richard Vitale, a friend of DiMasi's who was lobbying for ticket brokers paid DiMasi's in-law's legal debts. It came out that Vitale was lobbying for the ticket brokers without revealing his activities to the state, in violation of state law. Further, three of DiMasi's close friends, lobbyists on Beacon Hill all saw their fortunes rise unbelievably after DiMasi became speaker of the House.

Lastly, in what was the beginning of DiMasi's fall from power, it came out that a state contract was improperly awarded to a software company and that DiMasi worked hard to award the contract to the particular company.

While there have been court proceedings against Vitale, there have not been any such actions taken against DiMasi yet. But the rumors, the investigations the stories are more than enough. DiMasi was the most powerful politician in the state of Massachusetts who kept the state proud of its progressive standing. Now there may be a tack to the right, however, since his successor, Robert DeLeo, opposes abortion, is open to the idea of casinos in Massachusetts, voted for having slot machines at dog tracks and voted to bring the death penalty back to Massachusetts.

DiMasi was a successful speaker of the House who was carving a name out for himself in this great state's history. His unethical actions ruined all that. No wonder people cannot stand politics and politicians.

Another crowd rallies, and nothing gained

Dimitry Shapiro

It is the natural state of college campuses in a free society to be open to political dissent and demonstration. Our education is enriched by varying views from many spectra. At UMass, we have some of the most politically active groups of students in the country. Yet we need not forget the majority of students that are involved in majors other than those that are politically related, and often times have no strong opinion of issues.

These people are those who will really grow to become the 'Silent Majority': most of the time, Independents who rely on the facts presented to them either through research, media, or those that are politically involved. Those who are involved directly in politics are responsible for presenting to their peers the complete facts of any issue, and then being able to explain why they believe their side to be superior.

The leftists on this campus, through their immaturity, manage to discredit the work that the UDems and other democratic agents on campus are doing.

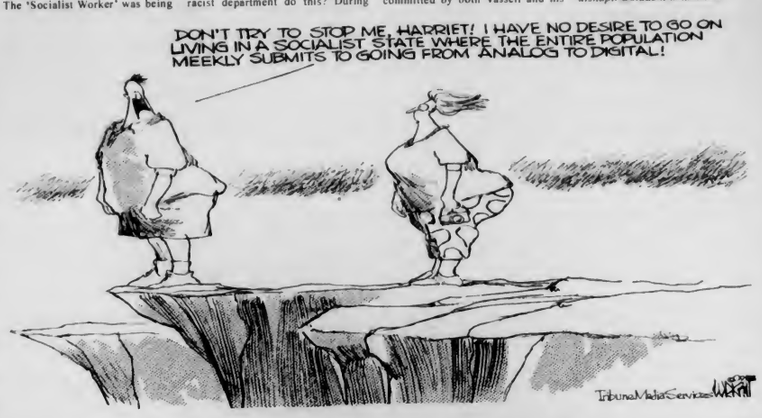
The recent actions of the Justice for Jason organization have been reproachable in the respect that they are not able to present all the proper information to the community. Though their bias is understood, deliberately restricting the facts should be unethical. Having been at the rally in front of the police station on Tuesday, it was evident that the crowd was the same rabble that we usually see protesting any and all things at the drop of a hat.

The 'Socialist Worker' was being peddled at rallies, next to protesters wearing 'Stop police brutality' coats, next to a sign that referred to Gaza. The connection between these issues and Justice for Jason is held together by only a small thread. The protesters are far-left underachievers that most of the campus community, which is Democratic, dislikes even more than it does Ed Cutting.

Many University Democrat Club members, who are my friends, told me they ignore these groups most of the time. The leftists on this campus, through their immaturity, manage to discredit the work that the UMass Democrats and other democratic agents on campus are doing.

So, why the coats about police brutality? To my knowledge, Jason Vassell was not attacked or brutalized by 'racist' police officers, just two drunk ,punks. The protesters amassed in front of the UMPD station calling for an investigation of Lt. Thrasher and the department on account of their 'racism.' As far as I know, the current Interim Chief is Officer Whitehead, who is African-American. Why would this racist department do this? During this rally, they blocked the road for a long time, preventing students from getting to their classes, and Auxiliary Services vehicles.



This group that is comprised of Justice for Jason, Radical Student Union, International Socialists, SGA and other fringe groups do not represent the ideas of the general population of UMass. Yet through the newspapers, they make it look that they represent everyone on campus. The Student Government Association (SGA) is expending a lot of effort in this venture, distracting themselves from their real job of representing students.

The International Socialists, always looking for their target market, were successfully selling the "Socialist Worker" for one dollar. Usually, it takes five to 10 cents to print one copy of a paper, you can pick up the Collegian for free, but the "Socialist" comes with a two thousand percent mark-up.

The real victim in this case becomes justice itself. The trust that our system was designed to dispense a punishment that fits the crimes committed by both Vassell and his assailants, yet Justice for Jason has stood in the way of this process from the very beginning. They stage demonstrations in front of court houses, in front of the DA's office and call-ins. Everyone is able to call the DA's office if needed, the actions of Justice for Jason will now make it much harder for reasonable people to contact Elizabeth Scheibel.

Lacking arguments, and bereft of facts, Justice for Jason uses emotional appeals to students that are not familiar with the facts. Collegian columnist Alana Goodman appeared on UVC-TV's Yak Back! last semester opposite professor Michael Thelwell, one of the leaders of the Justice for Jason movement. The professor's arguments did not match up and is now immortalized on YouTube. Alana asks the professor if he denied that Jason did anything that was written in the police report, and Thelwell replies that he personally talked to Jason and he was not able to even repeat that words that were said to him: he was that innocent. Of course Jason would not repeat those words. He is trying to defend himself. It is essential now that the moderate and silent students of this University stand up to all these groups that create a bad image for our campus. Most of us are interested to see how the justice system will handle the case and the important facts that will come out in court that are not covered by Justice for Jason and their media.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

GOODMAN TOO SOFT ON FACTS

Dear Editor,
RE: "Obama too soft on Iran;" Alana Goodman, February 2

Editorials are meant to display an author's opinions, but like any other article they should be factual. Alana Goodman has consistently traded in journalistic integrity for "facts" that are convenient to her opinion.

In her article "Obama to Soft on Iran" (Wed, Feb 4) Goodman claims that Jimmy Carter met unconditionally with Kim Jong Il. In fact, Kim Jong Il did not take office until 1994.

Carter had a meeting with Kim Il-sung (the leader at the time, and the father of Kim Jong Il) in 1994, in which the latter agreed to halt his nuclear program.

However, Kim Il-sung died one month later.

Additionally, it is misleading to claim that the hostages were released by Iran because of Ronald Reagan's 'hawkish'ness, while not including the fact that Reagan provided that same Iranian government with weapons.

Thanks,
Melissa Eliot

SPARK LOGIN LAME

Dear Editor,

Why, in God's name, do I have to click through three different links to finally arrive at the Spark log-in page?

From the UMass home page, click on "Spark/UMass Online."

From there, click on the Yellow "Log in to Spark."

From there, click on "Go to SPARK Log in page."

From there, you may finally log in.

By the way, you can't book mark the log in page. You must engage in the charade every damn time you have to access Spark. Brilliant.

A system such as this would make me hesitant to study computer science at this university. Though I understand that OIT is not linked with the actual CS department, OIT is a public representative of computer literacy at the campus.

Annoyed and Frustrated,
Doug Huddy

IT'S HOW YOU SAY IT

The Collegian board declares in Monday's editorial that "you have every right to express your opinion," and it is correct to state that this right exists regardless of the popularity of the opinion expressed.

It is also right to warn that personal attacks degrade public discourse and render it "childish," but it did not fully level the charge of responsibility:

With freedom of expression comes an unwritten duty to express responsibly, without resorting to hateful generalizations and insinuations. "The irony of the situation" is not, as the board writes, that progressives criticize conservatives; the irony is that the board then directly contradicts itself (and ignores the hateful tone that some of the columnists it defends have used to express their opinions).)

The board states that when sharing your opinion "you have to take as much as you give. If you support gay marriage or any other issue and take the time to express it, then you open yourself to criticism and opposing viewpoints."

Well put. Conservative views are just as open to criticism as liberal ones, and any view that is expressed through hateful rhetoric or manipulation of facts should be subjected to all the more criticism.

Seasonality of cinema too predictable

Kevin Koczwara

With the Oscars over the horizon (Feb. 22) the movie industry has gone into another late winter slumber with regards to its new releases. Each weekend it seems another halfhearted action movie or romantic comedy is sent out to theatres across the country with hopes that crowds will flock there due to weather. It is a sad state when the top box-office films are "Paul Blart: Mall Cop" and others in that vein.

It happens almost every year – Oscar contenders flood the cinemas in the fall. So many big-name contenders enter into theatres each week that the laymen or even film fanatic cannot keep up. Each week another critically acclaimed, Oscar-buzzed film screens to welcoming crowds.

Summer is the time for fun, high-budget, full-throttle blockbusters on rainy days and cool nights. It's a great marketing campaign that attracts the crowd they wish to please. It's a tried and true way of going about business in the heat of summer fun.

Then there are the late winter and early spring movies. After the Oscar contenders are announced it goes all down hill for the film lover. The studios hope to clump in as many low-shelf, low-priority films as they can into the cinemas at this time to buy them time for the next big rush of films. It is the time of Matthew McConaughey and Kate Hudson and poor horror flicks.

Why can't Halloween be the time of the year for these cheesy horror films?

Instead of spreading out the wealth and figuring ad-campaigns for each Oscar contendgr, the studios have discovered that putting them closer to Awards season reaps results, at least in the trophy case.

But to spread out these movies may prove to garner some greater recognition in the box-offices. In a time when viewers have the choice to see a movie like "Bride Wars" or "Rachel Getting Married," it is a hope that the public will, after reading reviews, see that the latter is a better film and has holds to higher cinematic standards.

If films are distributed and campaigned equally, it is then left to the public to decide where their money goes. Maybe "Rachel Getting Married" may have brought in more at the box-office had it not been competing with other highly-acclaimed films. We may never know, but isn't it worth a shot?

The summer blockbuster hasn't changed since its introduction with "Jaws" because it works so well. People in the summer don't need a film that brings them down, such as a rated-R thriller or drama, because they want to do things on vacation as a family and with children or friends. Also, the major crowd is teenagers who need something to do on a rainy day or a weekday night. This set works too well for everyone involved. Adults don't need to go to see movies in the summer and children want to.

But every February looks alike, and it is not pretty. It is a sad season for film fans, known as "The February Flop." Why can't the big and small studios see that the current state is not fair for their fans – the avid film lovers?

As the Oscar ratings slump to all-time lows, what should matter to the studios is putting out their best products to the public over the course of an entire year, not a few months of great movies at the backend. It is what they owe us after the film distribution prices have gone up, in turn creating higher ticket prices. In this slouching economy it is time to pinch pennies, and time for the studios to create a fair system for their viewers to see the best movies throughout the year.

3D 'Valentine' scores with gore

Remake of original 'My Bloody Valentine' promises carnage

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

It's been nearly 30 years since Harry Warden first swung his pickax through the sleepy town of Valentine Bluffs, cutting the land's teen population down a few notches on a quest for a piece of slasher movie infamy.

Back in 1981, the original "My Bloody Valentine" cashed in with audiences hungry for a "Friday the 13th" substitute. Now, in 2009, the remake of the film is doing much of the same thing – cashing in with audiences early before the horror market dries up for anything not called "Friday the 13th."

Fortunately, the remake of "My Bloody Valentine" has something extra to offer: it's in 3D. And unlike last year's butchered remake of the classic slasher movie "Prom Night," this is one remake that does its source material proud.

A carnival ride of carnage waits with "My Bloody Valentine 3D," where the town of Harmony (renamed for the remake), has been host to multiple massacres over the years.

Somehow they all involve Harry Warden. After a gas explosion trapped him and four other men deep within the town's mines on Valentine's Day, Warden went off the deep end, hacking his cohorts up into little bits in order to stay alive.

In the original film, cramped conditions and forced cannibalism are what help tip Warden over the edge. But in "My Bloody Valentine 3D," he kills in order to keep the oxygen supply all to himself.

Apart from this adjustment, not much has changed for Warden between each film. He's still wheezing it up from inside his gas mask, with such obviousness that it's a wonder he can even sneak up on anyone. Pulled from the mine wreckage alive but comatose, he slumbers for a year before, like clockwork, stirring on Valentine's Day to slice and dice again.

"My Bloody Valentine 3D" opens on a bloody rampage – first in the hospital, and then back at the mines, where some local teens are having a party. Yet before we know it, the police have arrived and Harry Warden has vanished into the innermost caverns of the mine. Does that mean the movie's over? Hardly. The real horror begins about a decade later.

Kerr Smith, formerly of "Dawson's Creek" fame, stars as Axel. Ten years ago, he and his friends were lucky to make it out of the Valentine's Day massacre alive. Since then, they've found less hazardous ways to pass the time. Axel is a sheriff now, while old girlfriend Irene (Betsy Rue) has become a kind of truck stop for men passing through the area.

And then there's Tom (Jensen

Only woe for 'Frost/Nixon' is film's pacing

By Morgan Meagher
Collegian Staff

Given the current political climate of hope and change, it seems an awkward time to release a film about the most scandal-plagued president of the 20th century.

"Frost/Nixon" centers on Nixon's first interviews after his resignation, conducted over the course of several weeks with British talk-show host David Frost (Michael Sheen).

The film presents a strangely touching portrait of the disgraced former president, wrapped in a slick drama. Aglow with all the glorious Technicolor wonder of the 1970s, the film boasts several incredible performances but suffers from awkward pacing and too much dull back-story.

Ron Howard's latest is currently raking in nominations for best director, screenplay and picture, but the real reason to watch "Frost/Nixon" is Frank Langella's blustery, sharp, sad portrayal of Richard Milhous Nixon.

The film progresses much like the interviews themselves – only at the end does it really get good. The first half of the film plods along as Frost tries to get Nixon and his handlers to sign on for the interviews, then struggles to get the funding. The real drama comes from the battle of wits between Nixon and Frost. The real story is Nixon himself. The rest is just fluff.

On his way to Los Angeles, Frost meets Caroline Cushing (Rebecca Hall) and decides to bring her along for the ride. For the remainder of the film she tags along with Frost, living with him, going to meet Nixon with him and attending the taping sessions. Although she is an almost constant presence, all the audience learns about Miss Cushing is that she previously resided in Monte Carlo. Within the context of the film she seems little more than a device to showcase Frost's slick playboy skills.

Peter Morgan's screenplay does its best to draw parallels between Frost and Nixon. Both are seeking vindication through the interview. Nixon, of course, wants to clear his besmirched name, while Frost is determined to make up for his American talk show being cancelled.

The characters themselves could not be more different. Frost is a foppish dandy, charming and handsome and a great performer, as his associates frequently remark. However, he is not a journalist, and soon enough he discovers that he is in way over his head, as Nixon dominates every one of their early interactions.

One of the more interesting aspects of the film is Frost's struggle to change this dynamic. He charges blindly into the interviews, fully

'Doubt' does it

Seymour Hoffman and Streep steal the show with suspense

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

When you hear that a film can be categorized as a drama, suspense and mystery, what cinematic qualities come to mind? You might say that it's probably full of violence, blood, drugs or even sex. Using these facets, this type of film is portrayed quite easily.

It's uncommon for a film to consider itself within one or all of the aforementioned genres without showing nudity, drug use or some form of violence. It seems completely implausible to create what is, essentially, a thriller with a single swear, no violence, no nudity or sex and no drugs. Yet it seems even more absurd that this film would be effective in keeping its audience interested and entertained from beginning to end.

Believe it or not, such a film exists in the form of John Patrick Shanley's "Doubt." Originally written as a play, "Doubt" was a hit on Broadway and won a variety of Tony Awards including Best Play, in addition to winning the Pulitzer Prize for Drama in 2005. Shanley adapted his performance into a screenplay, and put his own name on the back of the director's chair.

The story is set in 1964 in the Bronx. Sister Aloysius, played by Meryl Streep ("The Deer Hunter," "The Devil Wears Prada"), is the very traditional, stern principal of St. Nicholas Church School. She has the school running efficiently and has complete authority until her only superior, Father Brendan Flynn, played by Phillip Seymour Hoffman ("The Savages," "Capote"), begins to have what may be too close of a relationship with Donald Miller, the first black student in the school.

Sister James, played by Amy Adams ("Enchanted"), is the young, docile and naïve teacher who begins to notice peculiar behavior in both the boy and Father Flynn. When it seems as though things are getting worse by the day, she approaches the daunting Sister Aloysius with her suspicions.

"Doubt" is without question one of the best films of the year. Its strength is within the performances of Streep, Hoffman and Adams. Not only are their roles extremely convincing, but they are fascinating as well. Hoffman as Father Flynn is compelling and a hundred percent credible. Coming from someone who went to Catholic school their whole life, the way he interacts with the boys in the school and the way they look up to him is right on. He wins them over and through that, wins the audience over too.

Streep is absolutely terrifying as Sister Aloysius. Again, coming from first-hand experience, there is not a single woman in the world who could have played this part as true to life as Streep. When she speaks, the audience listens and straightens their backs in their seats. Streep has an intonation in this film that demands respect and discipline. In turn, her attitude conveys a tough, conservative and horribly stubborn principal that the film works itself around to create its gripping plot.

The scenes where these two interact

Slasher film just in time for Valentine's

Ackles) who skipped town shortly after the massacre. No one's really sure what happened to him, until he reappears days before Valentine's Day, gulping pills and making eyes at his ex (Jaime King), who has since moved on to greener pastures (read: Axel).

Aside from the blood and guts, the best thing about the movie may be Rue, who stripped down naked for her big chase scene. As she runs around on-screen, all the while flashing the camera a full view of her unmentionables, your sides are sure to ache and throb with laughter.

In a nod to fans, Tom Atkins also joins the cast of "My Bloody Valentine 3D" as the town's former sheriff. Now in his seventies, Atkins has graduated to roles more somber than the ones he had in "Creepshow" (1982) and "Halloween III: Season of the Witch" (1982), respectively. But still, he's a towering legend, and he makes his presence known.

When murders begin anew in Harmony, the town starts to speculate. Could this be Warden, back from beyond the grave, or is it an imposter? The script, written by Todd Farmer and Zane Smith, plays off of this whodunit aspect, especially in the last act.

Certainly it's not hard to imagine Warden as some undead killing machine. In a genre made popular off the likes of Jason Voorhees, who rose from the watery depths of Crystal Lake so often he might as well have had gills, stranger things have happened.

Perhaps part of the appeal of torture-porn, the offspring of the slasher genre, is that there are no all-powerful killing machines. Rather than attack their prey with inexplicable brute force, killers of the torture-porn variety come armed with inexplicable traps and schemes. It's a good thing, though. Jigsaw doesn't exactly come across as the clobbering sort.

"My Bloody Valentine 3D" is a resurrection of those older gems. The film stays true to the stock tenets of the slasher genre – lots of blood, lots of sex, and lots of screaming – while also turning them on their side. Think the jerk with the snide attitude will be one of the first to get it? Think again.

Any other innovations related to "My Bloody Valentine 3D" are more to do with its fun use of 3D technology than anything else. Director Patrick Lussier, who cut his teeth editing Wes Craven films, is never short of creative ways to fling things at the audience – from pickaxes to human jaws and eyeballs.

Who knew gore could look this icky with cheesy 3D? You can tell times must be tough when studios start dusting off this gimmick, which is as cheap an audience ploy these days as it was fifty years ago. But if any upcoming 3D films are as fun to watch as this one, there could be worse things to grumble about.

Langella plays a sad "Nixon"

confident that he can get the best of Nixon. His motives are clear; Frost is in it for the glory. He assembles a crack team of researches to dredge up anything and everything about Nixon, then proceeds to ignore their advice.

The team consists of his producer and sidekick, John Birt (Matthew Macfadyen), journalist Bob Zelnick, portrayed by Oliver Platt, and finally author James Reston, Jr. (Sam Rockwell), who provides the inevitable liberal bias. Reston joins the team because of his righteous political fury over Nixon's many wrongdoings.

Although Reston undoubtedly represents the feelings of most of a generation, he comes across as an obnoxious twerp. Most of his screen time is devoted to tirades against Nixon. But when he finally meets the man, Reston lacks the courage to not shake Nixon's hand as he'd promised. He is reduced to a meek little boy in awe of Nixon's impressive presence, as is Frost. The implication is that the rest of America would act the same. It is just one of many scenes that read like either a love letter or an apology to Nixon.

A multitude of interview snippets with the secondary characters, ostensibly meant to provide further insight into the interviews, serve only to wreck the pacing of the film. Most of the clips simply say aloud what the audience is already thinking. The few interesting asides feature Nixon's chief of staff, quintessential yes-man Jack Brennan. Kevin Bacon plays Brennan to perfection, infusing the role with smarminess and the blind loyalty of the dumbest lapdog.

As his team prepares for the interviews, Frost takes little notice, opting instead to cram the night before the interviews are due to start. His comeuppance comes the next morning, when Tricky Dick shuts Frost down with his absurdly long and rambling response to the very first question. It might be easy to relate to Frost's desperate all-nighter, but it is nearly impossible to feel any pity for the man as the full force of his folly hits him.

This then, is the root of this film's problem. All but the two main characters lack the development to become real people for the audience, and the pathos of watching Frost drown in his own ambition is overshadowed by his subsequent transformation from naïve to haughty. Instead, the audience may find itself rooting for Nixon, the archetypal lying, cheating, slimy politician. Sheen spends most of his screen time with either a smirk or a bewildered look on his face, but the two-dimensionality lies not with the actor but with the character and the screenplay. Nixon is simply more interesting and more engaging. Langella coaxes this out of the role, playing the former President with nuance and passion.

Who could have guessed that over 30 years after the Watergate scandal, Americans would finally be siding with Nixon?

'Doubt' ripe with stirring performances, mystery

are the most memorable scenes in the movie. The power and the passion they put into their roles shine brilliantly in their clashes.

Amy Adams and Viola Davis also deliver unforgettable performances. Both were nominated for the Golden Globe for best supporting actress, and are nominated in the same category for the Academy Awards. Davis' role as Donald's mother is quite unique, only appearing in two scenes in the whole film. In one scene, she does not speak a single word and is only on the screen for about 10 seconds. She certainly used her screen time with as much quality as she possibly could for the amount of time she had.

The film as a whole was overwhelmingly successful, primarily due to the outstanding acting and innovative style it was done with. The one bit of the film that has been heralded as the only flaw is its ending. Without spoiling the film, the most that can be said is that it leaves you wanting more and almost seems incomplete. It can be interpreted in a number of ways, and Shanley has been very open about not revealing the question the film leaves you with. It certainly was not an accident, and in itself reflects the theme of the film.

"Doubt" may seem to drag at times for some, but most people should find it intriguing. Excuse the redundancy, but it is the textbook depiction of the characters in the film that make it make it so illustrious.

A-10 opponents improve conference

Washington, Dayton, Temple, La Salle and in last Rhode Island.

While UMass is clearly the class of the A-10, a conference that is often looked at as a weak conference, the other teams in the league are doing things to better the leagues reputation. With many of the teams in the conference improving their non-conference schedules, it helps boost UMass' RPI and strengthen the conference.

"All conference schools with the exception of two have improved their non-conference schedules and RPI," Sortino said. "The bottom keeps pushing the top up instead of dragging it down, which I think is great."

UMass is a target for the rest of the conference. The other coaches have no problem getting their teams motivated to play UMass because knocking off the Minutewomen would be the biggest win of the season for most of the teams.

"We've got a bull's eye on our butt, eyes, back, heels, face, nose. You can't turn your head because it is coming at you no matter which way you go," Sortino said. "When we play the weakest teams in the region, and or a weaker team in the conference, it's their biggest game on their schedule. If they are in the game in the 3rd or 4th inning, it is like they are in the national championship."

Conversely, Sortino needs to find ways to constantly get her team ready to play and to not look past their next opponent.

"I have to get them motivated to play everybody and it is hard in the intangibles to maintain that mentality," Sortino said.

But with a team as experienced as this one, Sortino is confident that they will be able to maintain the right mentality throughout the season. With many of the players reaching a Super Regional or being five outs away from the College World Series but not reaching their ultimate goal, the team has a determination to get them through the long season.

"That is where I think our leadership and the understanding of not getting there is really going to hopefully help this team," Sortino said. "Because it is going to be in the intangible areas that we need to be better."

Outfield depth a question

continue to baffle the competition.

Besides Balschmiter, the Minutewomen have another solid pitcher in Bailey Sanders. The junior went 11-5 last year with an impressive 1.50 ERA while holding opponents batting average to .178.

Sara Plourde, a freshman at UMass, will be expected to use her tools in her first season as a Minutewoman.

"She can throw the ball in the mid '60's, she's got movement, she's a great hitter and she's a fine athlete," Sortino said. "But she's never pitched in college. She's going to have to learn how to distribute her pitches better – that's a journey for freshmen to make anyway."

INFIELDERS/CATCHERS

Calling the pitches from behind the plate will again be Jessica Serio. The junior led the Minutewomen with a .365 batting average and 18 multi-hit games. Serio picked off nine batters last season and started all 55 games behind the plate for UMass.

Backing up Serio, should the time arise, would be Meghan Carta. Carta, a sophomore, played in five games last season, making one start.

Third baseman Whitney Mollica will no doubt be one of the team's leaders this year. The granddaughter of baseball icon Don Zimmer batted .329, had 32 runs batted in and scored 25 runs. The senior is also solid defensively in the field, leading the Minutewomen with 125 assists.

Another veteran infielder, Sarah Reeves, will be counted on to contribute. The junior started all 55 games for the Minutemen last year, finishing with a .287 batting average and knocking in 38 runs. Reeves also hit 10 home runs.

Kyllie Magill is another freshman that Sortino will look to have an impact this season.

"She could find herself in a very active role," Sortino said. "She's really improved herself offensively since the fall season. She's a lefty, we have a bunch of lefties, so I think that will give us a nice offensive spread."

OUTFIELDERS

The outfield is probably the only question mark for the Minutewomen this season. Only one player started all 55 games for the Minutewomen last season, Samantha Salato. The senior hit .264, hit a career-high seven home runs and knocked in 32 runs.

Sortino will likely choose from a mix of Jill Andrews, Davina Hernandez and three incoming freshman to fill the remaining two outfield positions.

One of the freshmen, Katie Bettencourt, came to UMass with a strong bat, which Sortino could throw into the lineup.

Junior Whitney Williams started in 52 games last season and had 33 runs and 24 RBIs. UMass plays five games this weekend in Florida.

"She could see some pinch hitting appearances," Sortino said.

Sortino could also use freshman Jordan Storro's flexibility to help the team in the infield, outfield and on the base paths.

"She's fast, hopefully she'll be able to steal some bases for us this season," Sortino said. "[The freshmen] have not held us back one minute of one day of any part of the season, they just jump in and we keep going."

Yet to reach potential

Minutemen, they jumped ahead by a four-goal margin in the game against NU before their third period mental collapse.

UMass was finally able to get their power play on the board, going 2-for-2 with the man advantage. The Minutemen followed up their two solid periods of play with one of riled up emotions, which caused them to forget to play defense.

Cahoon said it best in the press conference after the game.

"The third period became disjointed," Cahoon said. "Our net-front team defense was absolutely deplorable."

"Paul played great. Paul I thought gave us a really solid effort, those goals that got in the third period were just a reflection of poor net-front defense. They end up throwing three in the net that he doesn't deserve to give up," Cahoon said.

"[Paul's] the person I feel the worst for."

With the amount of remaining games left in the season dwindling and the Minutemen fighting for a Hockey East playoff birth, playing 40-minute games isn't an option.

With Boston College coming up this Friday and UMass-Lowell Saturday, look for the Minutemen to start being more aggressive – forcing passes, shooting more on power plays and having the defense jump in on the offensive attack.

The Minutemen have extremely talented players within their roster. But, with their record as evidence, UMass is certainly not playing to its full potential.

"I think we've had periods where we have been really good," Cahoon said. "We've had a couple of games where we have played really well. That's the challenge of our staff: to try to get this team to play at its highest level, to sustain it and be able to do it for a while. That's still a work in progress."

Sophomore James Marcou is second in Hockey East scoring with 31 points from eight goals and 23 assists. The Minutemen will play Boston College at Conte Forum and host UMass-Lowell on Saturday.

Junior Justin Braun has six goals and eight assists this season and typically plays the point on the UMass power play.

In-state rivalries bring competition

"BC will be looking to redeem itself because they didn't play well in the public's eye," Cahoon said. "[The two points UMass could earn with a win on Friday] could really close the gap and put a lot of pressure on [the Eagles]."

Friday's game will be one of offensive power, with two of Hockey East's leading point earners taking the ice. Sophomore James Marcou is second in Hockey East with eight goals and 23 assists (31 points) and the Eagle's Brock Bradford is third with 17 goals, 12 assists (29 points).

The Minutemen are 1-1 against the Eagles this season after a home-and-home series on Nov. 21 and 22. UMass lost 2-0 in Boston, but won the next night, 4-3, in overtime.

UMass will host UMass-Lowell on Saturday at 7 p.m.

"Saturday it's the same scenario [as Friday]," Cahoon said. "It's a team we need to go by."

Not only does Saturday's game bring a chance for the Minutemen to gain ground in earning home ice for the conference tournament, but Saturday's game is the Alumni Cup – something the state has set up between two Division 1 institutions in the state system.

"The winner of this series gets the benefit of winning this Alumni Cup," said Cahoon. "So you're playing for something."

This season, the Minutemen are 1-1 with UMass-Lowell. They lost to the Riverhawks 2-0 (Nov. 15) and beat them 4-3 (Jan. 17).

Morris adds 19

Havens, who will be a junior with two years of eligibility remaining, is the only transfer on the list. The other 18 players will be freshman, and many of them will likely be redshirted.

Morris was pleased with the group that committed to play at UMass, especially considering the program got off to a bit of a late start.

"Being that it's my first class, and it came right in the middle of the [coaching] change and right during the peak of recruiting when kids are on the fence to where they're going to go, I am really pleased with everyone of these kids that we have on board," Morris said.

The announcement comes on the firs t day of signing, meaning that Morris' work is far from over.

"People forget that signing day is just the first day, not the last. Recruiting is a long process," Morris said. "There are a few more spots to fill. It's always going to be the best available on the board, we're going to stick to that philosophy – position comes second. We're trying to get the highest value first."

Havens (Concord, Calif.), is a 6-foot-3, 217-pound QB transfer from Diablo Valley College, where he averaged over 300 yards passing per game last season. Diablo Valley ranked second in the state in passing, and Havens was ranked as the 18th best signal caller by Scout.com.

Havens will battle against senior Scott Woodward and sophomores Scott Wallace, Spencer Whipple and Octavious Hawkins for the starting job.

"We had a void at the top with Liam Coen leaving and there wasn't a lot of playing time beyond that – Scott Woodward had gotten some snaps, but we felt a need to bring in some competition at the top of the depth chart," Morris said. "We're hoping Kyle can do that and give us a chance to continue at to play at a high level by creating internal competition."

Morris, who had eight kids from Massachusetts commit to play for him, talked about the type of student-athletes he was searching for to join the roster.

"I really wanted kids that were UMass-tough and that can play football at a very high level and that are willing to take on the challenges that UMass offers in the classroom, as well," Morris said.

In addition to Havens and Smith, who ran for a single-season Section 4 record 2,729 yards and scored 36 touchdowns, Morris also added some talent on offense. At the skill positions he signed running back Sean Unterkoefler (Reading, Pa.) and tight end Rob Blanchflower (Leominster, Mass.), and he added Adham Talaat (Springfield, Va.) and Vincent Westcarr (Miramar, Fla.) at offensive line.

Morris was busy signing defensive players, including three linebackers (Devin Lindsey, Perry McIntyre and Royce Terrell) in addition to the Brandt twins. Four defensive backs (Christian Birt, Ryan Carter, Mike Lee and Thad Cummings) were added to help the loss of graduated seniors Courtney Robinson and Sean Smalls. At the defensive line position where UMass struggled last season, Morris added Bill Nesselt, Kevin Byrne and Brandon Potvin (Worcester).

Morris will get a further look at his new recruits on April 3, when the Minutemen open up their spring football practice.

Harris' hot hand hoists UM

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Snapping a three-game losing streak can give a team a sense of humor.

"When Chris [Lowe] leaves I might slide over to point [guard] and lead the conference in assists," Ricky Harris joked after the Massachusetts men's basketball team beat Richmond, 80-71, Wednesday night at the Mullins Center.

"You guys are in trouble," Lowe added, shaking his head.

But for now, UMass (8-12, 3-4 Atlantic 10) likes Harris at shooting guard, especially when he has nights like Wednesday's performance. Harris came out of the gates sluggishly, scoring just three points in the first half on 1-of-4 shooting from the floor and 0-of-1 from 3-point distance.

| Richmond | 71 |

"[Harris] was a little bit frustrated and flustered in the first half, and I told him 'relax, just go play and it will come to you'," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said after the game.

Harris did just that as he shot 6-of-9 in the second half, 5-of-7 from 3-point range, and scored 21 more points to give him a game-high 24. Harris took over the game with the Minutemen up 54-49 with nine minutes left in regulation. Over the next 4 minutes, 23 seconds, UMass went on a 17-10 run, building a 12-point lead, in which Harris scored 13 of the Minutemen's 17 points.

The junior guard shot 4-for-4 (3-for-3 from 3-point range) during the stretch, including 2-for-2 from the foul line. He also added two steals.

"Ricky has done a good job of figuring out different ways to score other than just shooting all 3s," Kellogg said. "He's put the ball down some, he's getting to the lane and getting to the free-throw line. And once you start doing all those things then the 3s start falling."

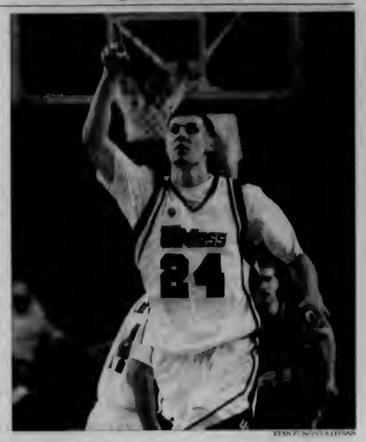
Harris wasn't the only one who put up sub-par numbers in the first half. Tony Gaffney, who found himself in early foul trouble with two personal fouls in the first 5:05 of the game, sat out the final 15 minutes of the first half. At that point, the forward had no points, one rebound and one block.

Despite two of the team's top three scorers managing just three combined points in the first half, the Minutemen found themselves knotted at 32 with the Spiders (11-11, 3-4 A-10) at the end of the first half.

"I loved the way that Tyrell Lynch, Matt Glass, Gary Correia and David Gibbs played in the first half to keep us in the game," Kellogg said of his bench. "I thought those guys did a great job with Gaffney being in foul trouble and Ricky Harris not really clicking offensively."

All four players to come of UMass' bench contributed, especially in the first half, giving the Minutemen 13 points. With Gaffney's presence missing down low, Lynch stepped up adding four points and five rebounds in 10 minutes in the first half.

The Spider's were led by guards David Gonzalvez and last years Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year, Kevin Anderson. Both gave Richmond 18 points, the only two players to score in double figures, with Gonzalvez reaching the 1,000 point mark for his career during the second half.



Kellogg was impressed with the defense of Anthony Gurley who was asked to defend the tough Gonzalvez all night. Gurley played the Spider's guard well, limiting him to just five points in the first half.

Snapping the team's three-game losing streak wasn't the only positive on the night; with 14:28 still remaining in the first half Lowe drove to the hoop with one of his signature moves – dribble right then a spin move - to beat his defender. When the shot fell, Lowe had registered his 1,000 and 1,001 career points in a UMass uniform.

Lowe became the 41st player in UMass history to accomplish the feat, joining Harris as the second player to reach the mark this season. The shot also made Lowe the first ever in UMass history to score 1,000 points and register 600 assists.

Lowe did all this on a night where he had his third double-double of the season, on 13 points and 10 assists. The 10 assists now gives him 610 for his career, 23 shy of tying Carl Smith's career record of 633.

Consistency still a struggle

It would seem that, after knocking off Northeastern, the No. 3 team in the country, back on Jan. 30 by a score of 6-4, the Massachusetts hockey team would be able to handle a team that is below them in the Hockey East standings.

Last Sunday afternoon, or Super Bowl Sunday as it was known to many of you, the Minutemen (11-12-3, 6-8-3 Hockey East) surrendered the game-winning goal with less than a minute to go in regulation, falling to Maine 2-1.

After their brilliant performance the previous night at the Mullins Center, save for the third period, the game in Orono, Maine would seem like a cakewalk for the Minutemen.

Paul Dainton again kept UMass in the game stopping 27 shots. The sophomore netminder stopped 13 of the 14 shots he faced in the third period. Much like the game against the Huskies, the Minutemen seemed to fall apart in the third period.

UMass was outshot 14-6 in the final period, eventually giving up the game-winner with 26.5 seconds remaining in the game. For the game, the Black Bears held a 63-33 advantage in faceoffs.

"I think that's part of our challenge, to play at our best and we think we should win those games," UMass coach Don Cahoon said on the season's roller coaster of game outcomes.

"We need to tighten things up late in the game. That's where I think everyone has to play a role in that, coaches included."

Luckily enough for the

Every team is fighting for home ice during the Hockey East tournament, especially now that the season is nearing its last couple of weeks.

Boston College and UMass-Lowell are tied for fifth (18 points) and just one point away from that fourth place home ice spot. The Massachusetts hockey team sits three points below (15 points) from earning the home ice advantage.

This weekend the Minutemen travel to No. 12 Boston College (11-9-4, 7-7-4 Hockey East) on Friday and host UMass-Lowell (12-12-0, 9-8-0 Hockey East) on Saturday for the Alumni Cup.

UMass (11-12-3, 6-8-3 Hockey East) enters this weekend after beating No. 3 Northeastern, 6-4, last Friday and losing to Maine, 2-1, on Sunday.

After struggling for most of January on the power play, the Minutemen went 3-for-7 in the last two games; previously the Minutemen were 1-for-21 in the four games prior – seven of their last 12 goals being scored while using special teams.

"I think they worked real hard trying conceptually to come up with ideas to try to get pucks through to the net, screens and tips and getting numbers to the net," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I think it started the second game in Vermont (1-1 OT, Jan 24.) where we really worked hard to get the power-play goal based on finding a way to penetrate their defense and I think it's carried over and we'll see if we can keep developing that."

On Friday at 7 p.m. UMass will play Boston College. The Eagles are coming off a 6-1 loss to Northeastern on Monday in the nationally televised 57th Annual Beanpot Tournament.

Veteran leadership anchors '09 team

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Perhaps it's too much to be ranked No. 24 in the nation by the ESPN.com/USA Softball Preseason Poll, to have one of the nation's elite pitchers in Brandice Balschmiter being counted on to make the competition look bemused and also picked to win the Atlantic 10.

It would be for any normal squad, but not the Massachusetts softball team.

Heading into the season, the Minutewomen have 14 players that have game experience returning to the roster. UMass boasts a very deep team this year with six freshman, two sophomores, seven juniors and five seniors. Coach Elaine Sortino expects a lot of her team, which is nothing new. But this year she is looking for the freshmen to have more of an impact.

The Minutewomen have many leaders within the team and Sortino knows that will play a big role in the team's success this season.

"We have great leadership," Sortino said. "You need to have great leadership to have a great team. We return a team that is primarily juniors and seniors in starting positions.

"They've been [to the NCAA Tournament]. They've felt the pain of coming so close and not advancing."

Pitching

Without a doubt one of the most important aspects of the Minutewomen is Balschmiter. For three years, the senior has dominated her position, which stands about 43 feet away from her lone concentration in the game: the batter.

Last year, Balschmiter finished with a 31-8 record and a miniscule 0.66 earned run average. She threw 33 complete games, 18 of which were shutouts. This year, Balschmiter, who was recently added to the USA Today Preseason Player of the Year Watch List, looks to return to the mound to

BRIAN TELLEFSEN/COLLEGIAN

Junior Bailey Sanders is a strength for the Minutewomen on the mound. Last season she went 11-5 with a 1.50 ERA.

New season, same result?

Challenging schedule provides test, preview for post-season

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Ranked No. 24 in the nation, 18 NCAA Tournament appearances – including 14 in a row – 20 Atlantic 10 conference Championships and a coach who holds a 1,017-431-5 career record; that's a pretty good resume.

But none of it means anything until the Massachusetts softball team reaches its goal.

"Our goal is to get to the College World Series and that is hard to do," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said.

The group that Sortino returns this year is an experienced squad that has been five outs away from a College World Series before, but has not made the ultimate goal. To do so, this year's Minutewomen, will need to weather a tough non-conference schedule that features some of the top programs in the country and an improving A-10 conference.

Non-conference schedule

While the Minutewomen have breezed through their conference schedule the past couple of years, winning 38 consecutive A-10 games, Sortino and the Minutewomen have one of the toughest non-conference schedules in the nation to help boost their RPI.

"I think the schedule is good," Sortino said. "It is certainly going to give us the opportunity to prove our worthiness."

UMass will have the opportunity to prove themselves as they face off against five of the nations top six teams in the first month of their schedule. The Minutewomen will open the season this Friday in the FAU "Kick-off" Classic in Boca Raton, Fla. While in the Sunshine State, UMass will play five games including one on Sunday against No. 5 Michigan.

Their toughest challenge will come two weeks later when they play in the Cathedral City Classic in California and face four Top 25 teams in three days. UMass will first play North Carolina State and No. 13 Tennessee on Feb. 20, followed by No. 4 UCLA on Feb. 21, and finish out the weekend with two games on the 22nd against defending national champion No. 6 Oklahoma and No. 3 Arizona State.

The non-conference schedule doesn't let up as the Minutewomen head to Columbus, Ga. the following weekend for the NFCA Leadoff Classic. In Columbus, UMass will play another five games in three days, with two against ranked foes, No. 23 Georgia and No. 2 Alabama.

The outcome of some of UMass' non-conference games can go a long way come the post-season.

"The non-conference schedule are the games that are going to give us a seed in a regional tournament," Sortino said. "Hopefully from a two to a one seed."

The Minutewomen will play five games in the UCF Under Armour Showcase in Clearwater, Fla. from March 13-15 before they begin their conference schedule. In Clearwater, UMass take on Central Michigan, Southern Florida, Loyola Marymount, Jacksonville and Florida Gulf Coast.

UMass will play a few non-conference games mixed in with its A-10 schedule. The Minutewomen will play two with Boston College and Connecticut, and host Providence and Boston University.

"Because of who we are we don't sneak up on anybody," Sortino said. "When we play UCLA, Arizona State, they are not looking by us, trust me. And that is flattering, but we can't sneak up on anybody."

Atlantic 10 Play

After going undefeated the past two years in the conference and winning 38 consecutive games in the A-10, UMass was an obvious pick to win its fourth consecutive A-10 title by the leagues coaches. Despite only losing two players to graduation, Sortino knows that the conference is improving and it won't be easy for this year's Minutewomen.

"I think you're going to see a better Temple, I think you're going to see a better Rhode Island," Sortino said. "I think you're going to see a much better Charlotte, who was in the finals with us. Fordham is always knocking on the door."

The 49ers were tabbed to finish second in the conference after falling to the Minutewomen in last year's A-10 Championships. Following Charlotte in the preseason coaches poll was Fordham, Saint Louis and St. Bonaventure to round out the top five. Finishing out the bottom was Saint Joseph's, George

Making the grade, or not

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

Students complain about grades all the time.

And no wonder, the hours spent pouring over textbooks, staring blearily at the computer and typing out page after page all amount to one little letter grade.

However, the idea to eliminate the use of letter grades in colleges and universities has now been brought up by professors and administration as well.

Last Wednesday at the annual meeting of the Association of the American Colleges and Universities, academic administrators from all over the country strongly voiced their opinions on the issue and more are in favor of eradicating grades rather than keeping them.

Many administrators said that grades have become "meaningless". When asked about the grading concept at the meeting, one professor stated that "grades create a facade of coherence." Another professor added, "grades are the death of composition."

Kathleen O'Brien, Senior Vice President for Academic Affairs at Alverno College, said that there may be an arrangement of ideas taking place that could remove the concept of grading across the country.

O'Brien noted that several of the nation's most prestigious law schools have moved away from traditional letter grades, citing that grades were destroying intellectual curiosity among the students.

O'Brien added that the growing use of e-portfolios have dramatized the potential for tools other than grades to convey what students have learned.

Other concerns with letter grades, according to O'Brien, include to potential for grade inflation to take away from the reliability of grades and the concern of consistency with grading as more students are taking courses at multiple colleges, including colleges overseas.

Maribeth Clark, Provost of the New College of Florida, offers a system in which students must work out a contract with a faculty adviser each semester.

The contract outlines which courses should be taught and how success will be measured. Professors contribute to a record of the student's success, without using grades.

According to Clark, at New College, dislike of the traditional student transcript is so great that the college does not even send them out. Students are in charge of sending out their own records when applying to graduate school.

At Fairhaven College, students don't receive grades either. They participate in a two-way evaluation process with professors for every course, and for their major and degree programs. The students evaluate their own work first, then their professors follow with their own evaluation and then the two have a much involved discussion. Many assignments also feature self-evaluation, as students complete a paper and also write about what they learned from the process of writing the paper or how the assignment did or did not work for them.

UMass, Seoul researchers find insecticide resistant bed bugs

By Sean McDonough
Collegian Staff

The phrase "don't let the bed bugs bite" has had little meaning to this generation, but there may be a reason to take that warning seriously again.

Bed bugs had been nearly eliminated as a problem but researchers from the University of Massachusetts and Korea's Seoul National University have discovered colonies that have formed a resistance to the insecticides once used to kill them.

"There are bed bug populations in New York City that have had mutations in their nervous system that makes them resistant to the insecticide we use to control them called pyrethroids," said senior researcher of the project John Clark.

Clark said that pyrethroids were safe to use because they come from a natural plant, so it is not harmful to humans, making them "the prime choice" for bed bug removal.

In populations that have not had the mutation, the pyrethroid holds the voltage sensitive sodium channels in the nervous system open, leading to an overstimulation of the nervous system which causes convulsions and death for the bed bugs.

Clark said that in the mutated populations of bed bugs "the specific nucleic acid changes amino acid substitutions no longer allow pyrethroids to bind to the sodium channels." In other words, the pesticide no longer kills the bugs.

"The implication is that there are an increasing number of bed bug infestations and we don't have any good means to control them," Clark said. "None of the alternatives are as safe as pyrethroids."

So what can you do to protect yourself from bed bugs?

Clark said that when checking in to a hotel it is a good idea to look for dark spots on the mattress and bed board. If there are dark spots they could be blood stains from bed bugs feeding. Upon such a discovery it is a good idea to tell the hotel manager about the problem and request a new room.

Before bringing your belongings home you should check them for bed bugs so you don't risk bringing the infestation back with you.

SOM offers head start

By Claire Bruchuk
Collegian Correspondent

In an economy currently laden with budget cuts, layoffs, and a rising unemployment rate, Isenberg School of Management's Chase Career Center at the University of Massachusetts is attempting to give UMass students the tools necessary to succeed in today's job market.

The race for jobs now begins freshman year with the building of student resumes, according to Amy Apicerno, a career advisor at the Chase Career Center.

Apicerno explained that the goals for first-year students are primarily exploring the job market and becoming familiar with the different options available to them. First-year students have the freedom of exploring different job opportunities, making mistakes and changing their minds before they need to rely on a paid position.

To that end, the School of Management (SOM) is encouraging first-year students to get involved in the internship process as early as possible. In addition to advising, some Isenberg programs are specifically designed to acclimate first-year students to the process of job searching.

Freshman are also exposed to pre-professional job options early. First-year students at Isenberg are also kept on track by weekly emails, lists of Isenberg RSOs and advising hours.

Attending a special workshop called 'Freshmen Aboard' is also a requirement for Isenberg freshmen. The session, led by Apicerno, lets students know about the resources offered by Isenberg.

One such resource offered to all Isenberg students is the E-recruiting website. Every new student at Isenberg is required to sign up for an E-recruiting account before the end of their first semester. Students create a profile that highlights their work and leadership experience. Posted on the website are numerous externships, internships, and other opportunities that students can apply for. This feature allows students to see exactly what kinds of skills employers are looking for and how to go about acquiring those skills.

SOM's Chase Career Center is working to better prepare freshman and sophomore UMass students with résumé building and early internships.

Another new opportunity offered specifically to freshmen and sophomores is Isenberg's Exploring Careers through Experiential Learning, or "ExCEL". ExCEL is entering its second semester this spring after a successful pilot program last fall. Students must apply for this program and are expected to attend individual meetings with a Chase Career Center advisor and participate in group meetings. ExCEL offers workshops on professional dress codes, time management, networking, and resume writing.

ExCEL also has an employment component that matches students with prospective employers. Businesses can send representatives to ExCEL in order to search through freshman and sophomore classes for students who show the specific talents a company may be looking for. In turn, students get to foster networking connections with these representatives and practice interviewing skills with real employers.

For UMass students who are not in the SOM, UMass Career Services offers E-recruiting to all UMass students interested in creating an account, and help with resumes and interviews as well.

In addition, Apicerno reminds students that while pre-professional work adds many layers to a resume, involvement in student clubs and leadership organizations are equally important; a resume must not only be full of work experience, it must also be well-rounded.

Professor to research, treat osteoporosis

By Domenic Poli

A University of Massachusetts food scientist has received a two-year, $407,000 grant from the National Center for Complementary and Alternative Medicine to improve osteoporosis treatment and prevention.

Dr. Yeonhwa Park, an assistant food science professor who holds the F.J. Francis Endowed Chair at UMass, will use the grant money to determine if a compound called conjugated linoleic acid, or CLA, can boost dietary calcium's efficiency and cause bone marrow stem cells To form new bone when taken as a supplement with calcium.

"One of the things I am working on with this grant is looking for particular activities on bone health," she said. "[The grant] is going to really help us to build more knowledge to get a better opportunity [to cure osteoporosis] in the future."

She applied for the grant in 2007 and learned in the summer of 2008 that she would be the recipient.

Park, 42, began working with CLA as a graduate student at the University of Wisconsin in 1990.

There she discovered that the compound can reduce body fat in laboratory animals, and she now believes CLA can help those with osteoporosis, a disease of decreased bone mass that can lead to an increased risk in fractures.

The grant enables Park, who earned her doctorate in food science from Wisconsin in 1996, to hire one postdoctoral student and one graduate student to assist her with the testing. She said they will use mice that have had their ovaries removed to induce menopause, the time when bone mass deteriorates.

They will also test a laboratory tissue model using bone marrow stem cells.

Eric Decker, head of the UMass Department of Food Science, said the grant is a big step in the direction of creating foods that can benefit health and wellness.

"What it means is that Dr. Parks' research is very timely and very important to be able to get grants like this and, also, it really signals that we need, as a country and as a health profession, to look at preventive medicine approaches to solving health issues," he said.

UMass scientist Dr. Yeonhwa Park is studying the compound CLE.

"[Park is] really the pioneer on a lot of the original CLA work," he added.

CLA was discovered in the 1980s in ruminant animals like sheep and cows. Park, who was born in Korea and earned her bachelor's and master's degrees in pharmacy from the Seoul National University, said that the compound is available as a dietary supplement but that not much is known about its relationship with calcium and bone density.

According to the National Osteoporosis Foundation's website, 10 million Americans have the disease and nearly 34 million more are estimated to have low bone mass, putting them in danger of developing it.

The website also said that 80 percent of those affected are women and that it can strike at any age.

ALANA holds 'Success Dinner'

Kicks off Black History Month

By Vanessa Andrade
Collegian Correspondent

Staff, students and faculty came together Monday evening in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center to kick off Black History month with the first annual "Traditions of Success Dinner."

The Office of Programs & Services for ALANA Students (OPSAS), hosted the event and hopes to make it a yearly occurrence at UMass.

"We are gathering the multicultural community for a new tradition in which we are going to create a journal, and we are going to ask members of the African and Pan-hellic African community to scribe about their experience at UMass, so we may have it 25-30 years from now to remember and have for posterity," said Director of OPSAS Jacqui Pin.

Several members of the UMass multicultural community, including SGA president Malcolm Chu, Sid Ferriera, Doris Clemmons and associate vice chancellor Byron Bullock all signed the Registry Journal for posterity.

Debyii Sababu Thomas, assistant professor at the Howard University School of Communications, also delivered an inspirational speech to heighten the spirits of the people in attendance at the dinner.

"We need to unite together and be a part of that team called greatness," she said. "Bringing home the message that Black History – and history in general – does not write itself."

Restricting trade, restricting capitalism

Jon Peterson

It's a common practice in politics to tax things that you want there to be less of. That is why "sin taxes" were created, as a means to make things that politicians say are bad for you – such as alcohol and tobacco – less appealing to buy.

These are classic cases of government affecting regular supply and demand. When things have a higher price attached to them, there is less of a demand for them. And taking it oppositely, if similar goods somewhere nearby have a lower price, people are more willing to go out of their way to buy them.

People want as much as they can get of everything they desire – whether it is alcohol, tobacco or whatever makes them happy.

Free markets and cheap goods make many people happy, so people are willing to go out of their way to buy things that are over the border in sales tax-free New Hampshire if it means they will save some money.

That's why liquor and firework stores are so conveniently located right across the border and on the highway. People don't mind going out of their way to get a good deal.

States like New Hampshire leave Massachusetts politicians two options if they want to spur growth and retain jobs in their economies: lower or get rid of the taxes that are making people go to other states to buy – or attempt to further punish people who try to get the good deals.

The latter is the issue in the current Massachusetts Supreme Court case between Massachusetts Department of Revenue and Town Fair Tires. People go over the border to buy tires because they can save on the sales tax, or wait until one of the tax-free holidays.

The thing about tax-free holidays is that they can't be regular or people would simply refrain from buying products until a specific time of the year. Thus, they haven't been on a set date when we've had them, but only on special occasions.

Currently, businesses that have shops in both New Hampshire and Massachusetts have to charge sales taxes on Massachusetts residents who buy over the Internet and from mail catalogs. Goods that are ordered from Massachusetts but are picked up in New Hampshire also have to collect taxes.

Purchases that have been made entirely in New Hampshire have never been taxed like this before though, and the ways in which this case could be extended to any goods or services that Massachusetts citizens want to buy is alarming – to say the least.

> Massachusetts is 46th of the 50 states in terms of fertility because tens of thousands of people leave each year, due in no small part to these restrictions to trade.

This principle was applied in 1930 during the Great Depression. The Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act restricted trade to American goods so we would only buy goods from others in the country.

Over 1,000 economists wrote a letter to the president before he signed the bill into law, saying that "The proponents of higher tariffs claim that the increase in rates will give work to the idle. This is not true. We cannot increase employment by restricting trade."

This act caused other governments to put tariffs onto the US, and unemployment rose as a result from 9 percent in 1930 to 25 percent two years later, further spurning on the Great Depression. Economists warned that restricting trade would have more bad consequences than good coming indirectly from what the bill had been meant to do.

Barack Obama's stimulus bill even gained scorn and threats of foreign embargos on the U.S. with its "Buy American" clause, which would restrict infrastructure projects to buying U.S. made steel, iron and other products.

EU Ambassador John Bruton went so far as to say "We regard this legislation as setting a very dangerous precedent at a time when the world is facing a global economic crisis."

And today, while Massachusetts residents may not have to think about the EU cutting off trade with them personally, they do think about why they aren't simply moving somewhere that has less tax.

Massachusetts is 46th of the 50 states in terms of fertility because tens of thousands of people leave each year, due in no small part to these restrictions to trade. Only 64 percent of the people who were born in Massachusetts who are alive are now still living in the state according to a Northeastern University study done in 2008 and we rank as 48th overall in terms of losing residents to other states.

People don't want to live in Massachusetts as much as they want to leave it.

Winston Churchhill said that "The inherent vice of capitalism is the unequal sharing of blessings; the inherent virtue of socialism is the equal sharing of misery," and our state's philosophy of keeping everyone's taxes at equally high levels is only making other states seem more appealing.

Everybody wants their children to have the best education possible, to have the best home and the best quality of life possible and these are simply easier to find in other places. So when I hear of my state keeping me from buying in better places because of their failed philosophies, I can only think that they have been taxing my patience for far too long.

Weakened minds and the media's tough punch

The economy. Everybody's talking about it, has been talking about it and will keep talking about it. But as the months pass, it becomes more like a point of departure for sinister columnists and critics in the popular media.

Evan Haddad

In short, the reformed economy underlying everyone's vision of future America – future world – is a press jackpot.

Ironically, as the situation progresses many people still do not realize that they must take account of themselves and live more responsibly. If the said change is to come, it must start with understanding that in the twenty-first century, global consequences do result from the actions of individuals.

It's a double edged sword. It sharpens the institution, but endangers us when in the wrong hands. In the American mind, a wealthy country translates into a sort of cultural integrity – one which every night good citizens are now told crumbles beneath us.

That makes sense because whenever you turn on the television or the radio "experts" speak in one and the same breath of the spending in Washington and our definitively crooked times.

Flipping through the channels while eating dinner, you see ex-senator Rod Blagojevitch, the hip-hop Obama-Pepsi kids and re-runs of "Cops" reinforcing the general notion of an unstable situation in the Union. Every evening on the 6 o'clock news, the nations "top analysts" inform viewers that something must be done about the crisis at hand.

At the top of the hour – every hour – the news starts breaking and you would be a fool to miss it. It is great, too, that these analysts always have answers ready for the day's big problem – because I certainly don't.

I wonder sometimes if we learned anything from the sixties.

Another tumultuous week for the country and Americans needed some soothing words from the Commander in Chief. This past Saturday, I thought I would tune in to our president's weekly address with hopes of hearing the right words from the man who now presides over the world stage.

So when the hour came, I fumbled with the tuner on my radio – as I imagined people did when they piped in Roosevelt's crackly broadcasts during World War times.

> It does not cease to amaze me that the fickle nature of the media repeatedly dupes many ingenious American people – especially younger ones.

After a few moments I was able to recognize the pert voice of President Obama and his succinct comment: "No one bill, no matter how comprehensive, can cure what ails our economy."

My reaction was mixed. We have heard all these words before, from different mouths and faces. Of course, the president faces the altruistic, yet sticky, task of shielding the public from this alarming reality.

But one thing appears true, however: There are no fingers to point anymore and Obama seems to be responsibly holding the reins.

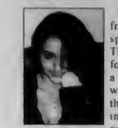
In general, people tire of hearing about the political games and misnomers. New officers come and go, but it is the people who receive the media bombardment day after day, year after year. Being called upon to judge those faces on the screen is tiring.

As a result, I fear that the media now occupies an overly significant place in the A of popular opinions. This is most likely because people are exhausted from following such intense politics. In a way, they are vulnerable.

However, it does not cease to amaze me that the fickle nature of the media repeatedly dupes many ingenious American people – especially younger ones. Perhaps it is an inevitable result of being an immense, but isolated nation.

Maybe it's a lack of true "inter-cultural" experiences (though I have never put much stock in that theory), or simply the result of our childhood impressions. But everything which is said on TV channels in the forties is not true by default. Even our beloved local news snatches up and exploits what is trendy.

That is, politically and culturally "fashionable." Could you ever believe that it would become chic to use expressions like, "A flawed policy," "change," freedom"?



Nietzsche once remarked something to the effect of, "What you call a thing is more important than what it is." What he meant was, essentially – the name sticks and that's all that matters.

To my mind, this is an especially relevant concept these days. For when engaged by the media's influence, the first question we inevitably confront is: "Good or Evil?"

Do well, do work but don't do everything

Leigh Greaney

The morning dew is still fresh on the blades of the spring semester's start. This is a time of renewal for so many students. It's a time to finally get the wheels rolling – to join that club you've been telling yourself would look great on your resume but that you could never get yourself to attend.

You make big plans. The same plans you've been making, except this time – you're going to follow through. You're going to actually pay off your debt by applying for that bartending job downtown. You're going to learn to speak Korean and UPS will be delivering the Rosetta Stone package any day now.

Along with all your grand plans at getting down to business, you're going to rock your GPA. You're getting a 4.0 this semester and finally the Dean will send you a certificate telling you how he's honored to have you on his "list." Your parents will send you a you're-such-a-brilliant-child-check for some extra spending cash to be spent on celebrating your hard work with a little hard alcohol.

> You can't have a 4.0, a well paying job, an internship, campus involvement, time to eat and sleep, a little fun now and then and time to learn Korean.

You've signed up for 15 credits worth of classes, pushing hard toward your desired 120 graduating requirements. After the first Monday to Friday span of classes, you're on the verge of tears. You've been in class as many hours as you've spent reading.

You look forward to eating and sleeping more than you have ever before. The Rosetta Stone is collecting dust underneath your bed. You still haven't made it to the club meeting. You're as jobless as you are poor and you have six voicemails on your phone from your mother asking why you've gone missing in action for the past week.

You've already had four quizzes and three books to read in the second week of school – none of which are attributing gallantly to your 4.0 finish line. In the same class time that you're handed back your try-better-next-time-quiz, you get the idea of how vital and internship is pounded over your head by your professor.

Internship? How are you supposed to find the time for that between studying, reading, going to class and at least getting six hours of sleep? Even if you're planning on getting one in the summer, there's still a huge issue – internships are often unpaid and you can barely afford to feed yourself; let alone put enough gas in your car to even get to the place where you're interning.

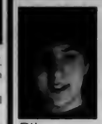
It's all a double-edged sword. It's all extremely stressful. It's all college.

It's high goals with low success rates for people who attempt to have the best of everything. You can't have a 4.0, a well-paying job, an internship, campus involvement, time to eat and sleep, a little fun now and then and time to learn Korean.

It's impossible. It's impossible unless, of course, you have a twin without a social security number and identity who lives as your double – leading the same life for you and splitting the work. Assuming this isn't your situation, I think there's still a solution.

The only way to remedy this sullied school situation is balance. Prioritize your time. Decide what is most important to you. What are you here at UMass for? In the pit of your academic soul, what sings?

If it's getting that 4.0, forget the debt and live poor for a while. Scrounge the dining halls for scraps and avoid going to bars – which subsequently all are a black hole for currency. Live in your books and go to office hours, shocking your professors into shoveling out those A's.



If it's making money, make it. Gain the experience in the work force that will bolster your resume. When you leave college, you might only have a 3.0 or so, but you'll have some black and white evidence that you're a hard worker. Maybe, if you're extra lucky – you can find a paid internship and have the best of both resume worlds.

If you think college is meant to be the best, most free time of your life – a time free of adult obligations and debt doldrums, then use this time to do that. Join that on-campus club and make some friends. Go watch your money spin into bar-tornados that leave you dizzy and smiling. Show all your friends how you can say the equivalent to "I have perma-smile" in Korean on your way back from the bar – compliments of the newly dusted off Rosetta Stone.

Whatever yellow brick road you decide to follow this semester, make sure it does the most important thing it can do – make you happy and make you proud of what you've accomplished. Stress is a part of life, but so is feeling good. You create your life, so create well and don't hesitate to aim high.

An international race for space

Eli Gottlieb

Here are two words I never thought I would say to the nation of Iran: mazal tov!

At least according to The New York Times, they've managed to launch their very first satellite into space, a data-transmission number called "Omid" (the Farsi word for "hope"). From the reports I've read, Omid has reached low-Earth orbit and managed to transmit a message from the Iranian President, Mahmoud "Inflammatory S.O.B." Ahmadinejad.

For this Iran needed mechanical engineers, physicists, electrical engineers, computer scientists, aeronautical engineers and chemists. I think at this point we can honestly say that Iran is not a country to underestimate.

In other words, welcome back to the "Leading Civilizations Club," Iran – currently consisting of the USA, India, Britain, China, Israel, Japan, France and, now, you. The Soviet Union was in there, but nobody really knows any longer what, exactly, modern Russia can do. Unfortunately the USA and friends mainly just want to worry about whether this means you can build intercontinental ballistic missiles yet, but everyone knows that American intelligence isn't.

> Trying to build a functioning colony in as harsh a place as the moon or a space station would require that we advance ecology, biology, genetics and engineering by leaps and bounds.

This really means that we can add another country to the list of nations we really ought to be trading with – or at least being nice to. Hell, you guys even have democracy, of a weirdly theocratic kind. Hey, the Republican Party is nearly as theocratic as the Islamic Revolution anyway.

No, seriously guys, it's time to start getting over this whole weird thing the West has about considering the Iranians some sort of primitive society. They've put a satellite in the sky, which means they've got enough scientific and engineering infrastructure to do just about anything a First World nation can do. Also, they have oil money, which will let them do it.

My advice? Let's have a good, old-fashioned space race.

In fact, since Iran has credited their successful launch to the help of Allah, we can make a three-way bet with them: whether Jesus, the Jewish God (whose name I'm not allowed to print in a newspaper) or Allah can get another man on the moon first.

Better yet, who can plant a fully functioning, ecologically self-sustaining colony on the moon first? Countries will get bonus points for uncovering any possible living things on Mars – which for some reason has methane in its atmosphere – and for meeting Doctor Who.

Extermination by Daleks will result in an early loss, but will definitely teach the unfortunate victim precisely why you shouldn't threaten to wipe other countries off the map.

A new space race would have many serious, tangible benefits, however.

It would give a kick-start to science and engineering industries across the globe that have sort of been coasting on the miniaturization of the transistor and various "green" technologies for a while instead of inventing anything really new.

For example, let's finally get electric cars. After all, we'll need those fossil fuels to send off our spaceships. We can use all this sophisticated computing technology we've developed since the Apollo missions to perform engineering simulations orders of magnitude more accurately. We can finally put the kind of analysts performed for every new model of Ford into something that will really advance humanity.

We can finally get to work on a theory of quantum gravity that will allow humanity to know what happens at the very smallest and very largest scales of space and energy. Trying to build a functioning colony in as harsh a place as the moon or a space station would require that we advance ecology, biology, genetics and engineering by leaps and bounds.

Of course, all this new work would generate, well, work. People would have to be educated and paid to do it. That creates a lot of jobs and the need to educate all these new scientists and engineers creates even more. The resulting ethical and political debates will employ Congresscritters, think-tank men and newspaper columnists.

I guess I'm being a bit optimistic, though. Knowing this world, this can probably just result in World War III breaking out as the U.S. antagonizes Iran, Iran antagonizes Israel, Israel antagonizes everyone, Iran tries to convert Barack Obama to Islam, the European Union starts getting worried about their oil supplies, the satellite turns out to be running Windows (so it crashes... into Los Angeles) and nobody gives me or my friends here at the University of Massachusetts nice jobs.

Thus, the world's next superpower will be India, because they were smart enough not to get involved in wars over natural resources with religious fanatics. Then, and only then, will the aliens show up and kill us all.

Ready, set, go.

NEW ORLEANS' HOT 8 BRASS BAND COMES TO UMASS' STOCKBRIDGE HALL TONIGHT

Robert Barber and Mary Pearson of the Brooklyn, N.Y.-based High Places incorporate a style of songwriting often referred to as "exquisite corpse." The band produces rather lively and playful music despite the morbid title.

The liveliest of corpses

High Places to assemble 'exquisite corpse' in NoHo

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

Chances are, you've helped make an exquisite corpse. The term "exquisite corpse," first used by French surrealists in the early half of the 20th century, has endured much variation over many decades, today posing as a simple though wildly entertaining party game.

Initially, the term described a game played where one player composes a sentence on a sheet of paper and passes it along to the next player who would, in turn, write the next sentence in the series with only partial knowledge of the one preceding. This process yields a communal product made up of purely individual parts, and was quickly transformed into a drawing game (usually a somewhat human form) with the same general themes of compiled individuality and blindness.

Fast forward to the 21st century and one finds that the exquisite corpse has seen yet another permutation, this time into sound. Brooklyn, N.Y.'s High Places craft what is often referred to as an "exquisite corpse" style of songwriting, exchanging concepts and bouncing ideas until the desired outcome is reached. The duo will perform Friday night at Pearl Street's clubroom with Soft Circle and Eric Hnatow.

While High Places' songs may be described as corpses, they're in fact quite lively and playful, more like Frankenstein's curious patchwork monster. Layers build upon layers, as visual artist Robert Barber's beats and percussion meet with bassoon buff Mary Pearson's effortless and sprightly vocals. Oftentimes the result is oddly tropical, with mallet percussion, rattles, bells, and household objects providing the danceable backbone to the atmospheric parts of their compositions, which usually happen to be some form of percussion as well, such as processes steel drum sounds and various shakers.

High Places have not been at it for very long, however, so the sample size is fairly limited. They got their start with a six-song demo recorded in 2006, followed by a number of 7-inch singles and appearances on compilations. Many of these singles and compilation cuts were assembled into an Emusic.com-only ten-track collection aptly titled "03/07-09/07," which is the span during which the recordings were released.

After much buzz and hype, High Places found themselves signed to Chicago imprint Thrill Jockey, which re-released "03/07-09/07" on CD last July. The label also released their first self-titled full-length last September.

The record garnered critical praise, and the two found themselves on National Public Radios's "Song of the Day" in November with one of their best tracks "Head

Augusta Savage set to toast 'Gems'

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

When Nelson Stevens began studying art in college, he had a hard time convincing his professors that there was such a thing as "black art."

Stevens' work, however, is an expression of black identity, inspired by the blending of African and American cultures by the first slaves. Instead of wholly adopting the culture of their captors, they created a hybrid culture of their own, incorporating both African and American elements.

The importance of African-American identity is evident in Stevens' work, which blends color and medium in a way similar to that first blending of culture.

Stevens obtained his Bachelor's of Fine Arts in Painting and Art Education from Ohio University. He went on to Kent State University in Ohio to earn his Master's of Fine Arts in Studio Art and Art History.

While studying, Stevens became interested in Chicago's "Wall of Respect," an outdoor mural once located in the South Side of Chicago, Ill. Several artists from the Organization of Black American Culture painted the mural in 1967. Unfortunately, the building where it was painted suffered fire damage and was demolished in 1971.

Stevens found the work inspiring, as it focused on the theme of "Black Heroes" in a time when African Americans were hugely underrepresented in the popular media. This inspiration helped to spark his prolific career.

Over the next 30 years Stevens worked with a variety of materials, including canvas, doors, paper, and even album covers. A collection of various works from his career will be showcased in the exhibit "Gems in the Valley: A Toast to Nelson Stevens" at the Augusta Savage Gallery on the University of Massachusetts campus beginning Feb. 9.

UMass is no stranger to Stevens' work, as he taught for the Art Department as well as the Department of Afro-American Studies here for over 30 years.

The style of the pieces on display employs bold colors and strong lines. Much of Stevens' work also depicts iconic black figures, both historical and contemporary, as homage to these people of important cultural influence.

One of Stevens' series, for example, includes such influential musicians as Miles Davis, Bob Marley, John Coltrane and Stevie Wonder. The goal in these and other works is not only to depict the people but also to capture the emotion of the music and the culture.

In addition to his productive career as a visual artist and professor, Stevens has also held jobs as a layout artist, assistant commercial artist and even a gallery lecturer at the Cleveland Museum of Art.

Stevens contributed much more to the African-American cultural movement than simply his own art. He was also a member of AFRICOBRA, a Chicago organization formed in 1968. The intention of the group was to provide the Black cultural revolution of the time with a visual element.

Fittingly, the organization was started at Chicago's "Wall of Respect" that so inspired Stevens.

The project for which Stevens is best known is his work, "Art in the Service of the Lord." The finished project was a Black Christian Fine Arts Calendar containing paintings that had been commissioned specifically from African-American artists.

"Art in the Service of the Lord" went on for four years, circulating 15,000 copies annually.

The Augusta Savage gallery's presentation of Stevens' work will include works that are still resonant today, even though some of them date to the 1970s. The pieces, which include works both on loan from collectors and from the Augusta Savage Gallery's permanent collections, retain relevancy because of Stevens' artist philosophy; he advocated that "art is for the sake of the people" rather than art for art's sake.

"Gems in the Valley: A Toast to Nelson Stevens" will run from Monday, Feb. 9 to Friday, March 13 at the Augusta Savage Gallery. The gallery is located in the New Africa House in Central Residential Area and is open to the public Monday and Tuesday from 1 p.m. to 7 p.m. and Wednesday through Friday from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m.

'Traces of the Trade' looks at Family's slave-trade roots

By Kate Olsen
Collegian Staff

A woman whose family has a rich history passed down through the generations – from nursery rhymes to a family mural – discovered those same established relatives were the largest slave-trading family in United States history.

Katrina Browne, a Boston native, documented her journey, following in her ancestors' footsteps in her 86-minute film "Traces of the Trade: A Story from the Deep North," shown at the University of Massachusetts on Wednesday. She and nine other descendants of the DeWolf family decided to follow their shocking history and take a journey along the Triangle Trade: Bristol, R.I. to Ghana to Cuba and back to Rhode Island.

"I had never made a film before," said Browne. "I didn't come at it as a filmmaker looking for a topic, I came at it ... as someone who was incredibly motivated to deal with [my family history]."

"I decided to make a film and deal with it publically ... because it felt like a much bigger story than just my family, the idea of the North's complicity in slavery – which most all of us didn't get taught – it just felt like, oh my god, it is so important to tell this story," Browne continued. "And the idea of doing it in this personal way, through my family, was based on this suspicion I had that for us white folks we do have this tangle of emotions that get in the way of dealing with this stuff."

The auditorium in Bartlett Hall held a crowd of about 100 interested UMass students and community members.

"[The film] seems like an interesting way to look at the idea of the people from the North who are generally thought of as being anti-slavery," said senior computer science and math major David Thompson. "It's a different perspective and it seems that it could be an interesting topic."

Although the goal of the film was partially a lesson in history, Browne intended it to be a spark for conversation.

"I think for students it might put a voice for black students on campus who may feel this way but don't know how to talk about what they feel," said Stephanie Campbell, a graduate student in public health and an assistant with the ALANA Health Outreach and Education program.

White privilege was a topic thoroughly delved into by audience members and Browne during the discussion.

"It's about damn time [these topics arose]," said one attendee.

The first DeWolf, Mark Antony, was said to have come to Bristol, R.I. as a sailor in 1744. In modern Rhode Island, "it seemed like the DeWolfs were the founding fathers," Browne narrated in the film. The DeWolfs bought the stained glass for the local Episcopal church, their mansion was turned into a museum in 1989 and the town seemed to worship James DeWolf, a U.S. senator and rumored to be the second-richest man in the U.S. at the time.

His mansion, Linden Place, was built with just one

Channeling the 'Big Easy' at Bowker

'Center Series' to feature Louisiana's Hot 8 Brass Band

By Elyse Wood
Collegian Correspondent

Tonight the infamous Hot 8 Brass Band brings downtown New Orleans rhythms and vibes to the University of Massachusetts' Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall as part of the "Center Series," a series put on throughout the academic year by the Fine Arts Center. Straight out of the 'Big Easy' the group blends jazz, funk and hip-hop, embodying the city's renowned music culture, especially the second line tradition.

"It's a good show that I think students can really enjoy," said Jorge Luis Gonzalez, a marketing assistant for the Fine Arts Center. "It resonates over a lot of eras."

Originally adapted from jazz funeral processions, the second line tradition consists of a first line of mourners – family members of the deceased – and a second line – the band that play as they all march. Dirges – more somber songs – are played during the procession, but the music joyfully picks up on the way back. Today these parades are also held for the purposes of celebrating this festive street music% enter the Hot 8 Brass Band, stage right.

Founded in 1995, it's been over a decade since these soulful players formed their group and began playing in these traditional parades. They have since then toured U.S. jazz festivals and around the world%including such places as the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival, Japan, Finland and France, to name a short few.

Known as a local New Orleans phenomenon off the bat, it wasn't until Hurricane Katrina that the band achieved national recognition for rallying survivors together through music. They've since been featured on numerous national broadcasting stations and in national papers, as well as Spike Lee's documentary "When the Levees Broke." The group has projected the festive city's survival spirit through the Finding Our Folk Tour which brings music to evacuees in shelters, displaced New Orleanians, and temporary trailer homes. The tour also raises awareness and funds for people still in need and going through the long process of rebuilding.

The Fine Arts Center is showcasing 17 programs in their Center Series this academic year. These programs range from dance companies to orchestras or world music.

"This is top-notch entertainment, it really doesn't get any better," said Gonzalez on the Center Series. "It's really an honor to the university."

Like those truly committed and passionate about their craft, the Hot 8 Brass Band has been known to play multiple gigs a day and maintain intense energy throughout. Three trumpets, two trombones, a tuba, a sax, a snare and a bass drum, each coupled with a smooth player, guarantee a show like no other.

There is a 10 a.m. matinee today, as well as the 8 p.m. evening show tonight. Admission is $25; $15 for students and those under 17.

High Places have enjoyed a recent surge in popularity due to large amounts of positive Internet buzz and press on National Public Radio.

Spins," from "03/07-09/07." NPR made a keen observation, explaining that while High Places are basically rooted in samples, their songs never sound processed since they make their own samples with relatively typical instruments, such as bass, guitar and banjo.

Though Pearson's vocals do not hold the entire project together, her hypnotic, angelic coo is surely a key element. She doesn't sound too refined, and she doesn't sound too amateur, but rather a happy medium whose pitch and tempo would best fit a nursery rhyme.

Though High Places only have one true album, they're already know to tour incessantly, including their current tour of the Northeast and Canada before shoving off for Australia at the end of February for some shows with Dan Deacon which run into March. They will then head to Europe for a week or so of Scandinavian dates at the end of March and beginning of April.

High Places have shared the stage with such notable acts as Deerhunter and No Age, two bands seemingly dependent on the phenomenon of buzz generated via online publications and blogging for whatever fame they accrue. High Places hasn't quite reached that level, but they're sure on their way.

High Places will perform at the Pearl Street Nightclub tonight, Feb. 6, at 9 p.m. with Soft Circle and Eric Hnatow. Tickets are $10 in advance and $13 at the door. The Pearl Street Nightclub is located at 10 Pearl St. in Northampton.

Browne examines family

year's worth of money accumulated from the slave trade.

The DeWolfs brought over 10,000 Africans to the U.S. and were idolized by the town for the jobs they created in Bristol. Ship makers, blacksmiths to make chains, barrel makers and many more thrived off the slave trade in Bristol, which bolstered the economy.

Upon learning this, Browne wrote to 200 DeWolf descendants – from siblings to seventh cousins – about the journey and invited them to join her. Out of that number, 140 didn't even respond. Some relatives were furious a film was made about their family history.

In the film, Browne wrestled with the subject concerning the ubiquity of slavery during the period.

According to Browne, the family got the townspeople to buy shares in their voyages, created their own bank and an insurance company "to cover the risk." In addition, since rum was the primary form of currency on the African coast, James DeWolf ran a distillery. They purchased ships from Rhode Island and Massachusetts builders, furthering the economy in those states. Rum was delivered to the African coast for slaves, who were brought to Cuba, where the DeWolfs ran plantations to supply sugar and molasses back to Bristol to create the rum.

After learning all this, and how complicit the North was in the slave trade, the argument of "that's just the way things were" became null and void with what she learned next.

The DeWolfs were trading slaves after the slave trade was deemed illegal.

They had secured a favor from Thomas Jefferson who placed a DeWolf cousin in charge of customs in Bristol, who always looked the other way when DeWolf ships came through.

The family members traveled to Ghana where they became the minority, were questioned about their heritage by African children and held family discussions with community members about topics of race.

The beautiful, African shoreline was littered with 70 fortresses where Africans were kept in terrible conditions before being sold to traders. In one fort depicted in the film, there were 15 rooms, 15 by 30 feet, which held over 1,000 Africans and countless cockroaches all over the walls.

In Havana, Cuba, the nine descendants visited the DeWolf plantations. Not only did eerie ruins of buildings and overgrown fields mark their visit, but also the reminder that the family may have still owned the Cuban plantations until 1875 – years after the Civil War.

Holly Fulton and her husband William Peebles, former Deerfield, Mass. residents, were present after the screening along with Browne to facilitate a discussion and answer questions. Most of the audience was concerned with the deeper questions the film raised about race and privilege.

"My initial reaction is why privileged, white people always – have to have this epiphany to realize that they are privileged," said Campbell. "I want to know what it feels like to be on the other side, to wake up one day and not think about the color of my skin or how anyone is going to react to me.

"But I'm going to do what I keep doing. I'm going to smile when people pretend I'm invisible and keep holding doors for others," she said.

Reliance on 3–point shot dangerous

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team has relied heavily on 3-pointers to keep them in games so far this season – with three different players focusing their offensive efforts from long range.

After going 0-for-3 from 3-point territory in the Minutewomen's 67-60 loss to Saint Louis last Saturday, freshman forward Kristina Danella rebounded from her 3-point performance, adding nine points while going 3-for-5 from behind-the-arc in Tuesday's win against Richmond.

Danella was able to get open looks against the Spiders, and is currently fifth in the Atlantic 10 in 3-point field goal percentage at 42.1 percent.

Back on Dec. 20, Danella shot 7-for-11 from the 3-point line in an 80-51 win over Northeastern.

Her seven 3-pointers matched the program's single-season record while accounting for half of the team's total 3-pointers (14), which broke the school record for most in a single game.

Another 3-point record was shattered back on Jan. 17, when Danella hit a trey against St. Bonaventure which gave the Minutewomen 118 3-pointers through 18 games, the most since the 2002-2003 campaign.

Along with Danella, senior guard Stefanie Gerardot and sophomore forward Cerie Mosgrove have also contributed behind the line for UMass.

Gerardot is fourth in the A-10 in scoring average with 15.4 points a game, along with being ninth in the A-10 in 3-point field goals made (39).

Mosgrove is ranked fourth in the A-10 in that same statistic, averaging two 3-pointers per game.

Because of UMass' lack of height and experience down-low, these three sharpshooters must continue to convert in order for the Minutewomen to be successful as the conference schedule comes to a close.

Young stepping up

Senior guard Sakera Young set a career-high in points (16) in a Jan. 24 loss (82-68) to Richmond. Fourteen of those points came in the second half, but it was not enough to get the Minutewomen the victory, as they dropped their fourth straight contest within the A-10 conference.

Young set a new career-high with 22 points in a 70-53 victory over Rhode Island on Tuesday, snapping UMass's five-game losing streak.

Going 8-for-11 from the field and converting 6-of-11 free throws, the game marked Young's first-career 20-point game. She also contributed with four steals and four assists.

Young's scoring breakout came at just the right time because it took pressure off of Gerardot to be the top scorer and main offensive threat for the Minutewomen. UMass is set to face a Dayton team Saturday that is capable of playing strong defense and blocking shots, so everyone will have to be involved.

Young is seventh in the A-10 in assists per game, averaging 3.4 while leading the Minutewomen in that category. She has also been securing the ball effectively, limiting turnovers and ranking ninth in the A-10 in assist-to-turnover ratio.

Improvement in rebounding

The Minutewomen are 10th in the A-10 in offensive rebounds and tied for eighth in defensive rebounds per game.

However, sophomore forward Teya Wright is seventh in the A-10, averaging 7.6 rebounds per game, and is second in offensive rebounds (3.18). And she's put up those numbers in fewer minutes than most, as constant foul trouble has limited her to just over 21 minutes per game.

FJ Stanley/Collegian

Forward Teya Wright leads the Minutewomen in rebounding this season, averaging 7.6 per game. The sophomore has been in foul trouble many times this year, fouling out twice.

Wright has created second-chance and put-back opportunities on the offensive side of the board, averaging 8.5 points per game on mostly close-range shots.

Along with her strong rebounding, Wright has played stellar defense, leading the team in steals with a 1.5 average and blocked shots (0.6).

But with her tenacious defense comes foul trouble, as Wright leads the team in fouls with 3.3 per game. She's had two foul outs so far this season.

Dixon, UMass face first conference foe

Boney in charge of stopping Rams, Liguori in early Atlantic 10 meeting

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

After rolling in its first match of the spring season, the Massachusetts tennis team will encounter its first Atlantic 10 conference opponent on Sunday when it hosts rival Fordham Sunday afternoon in Amherst.

Coming into the match, UMass (2-0) boasts an impressive 10-1 all-time record against the Rams (2-4).

In their last meeting, the Minutewomen defeated Fordham to pick up their first win of the 2008 spring season. UMass was propelled by its doubles teams, which took two of three matches to help the Minutewomen to a 5-2 win. Current No. 1 singles Candynce Boney, No. 3 Maude Lecluyse, No. 2 Kaitlyn Carpenter and No. 5 Laura Danai won at No. 3-6 singles respectively, securing the victory. Carpenter and Danai both defeated their opponents decisively, each by an overpowering 6-0, 6-0 score.

The Rams come into Amherst more experienced on the year having already played six matches in the young season. While Fordham's victories came at the expense of Marist and Queens (N.Y.), two of its four losses came at the hands of conference opponents, Rhode Island and Duquesne.

In their spring opener on Saturday, the Rams dropped their first match of the season when they fell to Duquesne by a 5-2 score. Fordham was swept by the Dukes in doubles play and managed to only pick up a victory in No. 1 and No. 4 singles.

Fordham has only one player with a winning record in singles, senior Dominique Liguori. Liguori is the stand-out in the Rams lineup, playing both the No. 1 singles and doubles. She will come into Sunday's match posting a perfect 10-0 record in singles play and an impressive 5-1 mark in doubles with teammate Martina Featherston.

UMass coach Judy Dixon realizes that the team will have their hands full with Liguori on Sunday.

"Fordham has a very good No. 1 singles player, who is one of the top players in the Atlantic 10 Conference," Dixon said. "She's a senior and also has a sectional ranking."

In addition to a perfect singles record, Liguori also has never lost in two career meetings against UMass. Yet, Dixon feels that if anyone can put a halt to Liguori's impressive streak, it's Boney.

"Boney played [Liguori] in a tournament at West Point to start the year off and was ahead of her in a third-set tiebreaker but couldn't hold on for the victory," Dixon said. "Boney pushed her the most out of anyone but eventually [Liguori] won the tournament."

Dixon also understands that the match won't be decided by how they handle Liguori, but by how the rest of the team performs.

"My expectation is that we will fight our hardest at No. 1 singles and No. 1 doubles, but in order to win the match we will have to fight at the other positions."

Track teams look to build on Boston Games effort

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Correspondent

Coming off another strong performance at the Boston Games, the Massachusetts men's track and field team looks to continue its turnaround from a disappointing 2008 indoor season at this weekend's Giegengack Invitational.

Last week the Minutemen finished second in a field of 13 teams at the Reggie Lewis Center. Tyler Cotto finished first in the 55 meter hurdles, solidifying his spot as one of the event's top competitors in the Atlantic 10. He is currently sixth in the A-10 with a time of 7.69 seconds and has already qualified for the IC4A Championships. To be successful, the Minutemen will also need Peter Fortunato and Josh Boone to perform well in the mile.

Fortunato delivered the eighth fastest time in the mile last week in Roxbury, with Boone right behind him at No. 9 for his time at the Terrier Invitational. The duo also finished back-to-back in last week's meet, with a third-place finish for Fortunato (4 minutes, 16.89 seconds) and fourth-place finish for Boone (4:19.61).

The team will also need a boost in the field and sprint events. UMass expects strong performances from sophomores Sean Busch and Darius Velez and junior Brian Miller. All three have already qualified for the IC4As. Busch holds the fourth-best mark in the A-10 for the pole vault, while Velez is tied for the same position in the 55 meter dash. Miller has been one of the best overall performers in the A-10 this season, qualifying for the IC4As in three events (55 meter dash, 200 meter dash and the high jump).

The women's team also gave a noteworthy performance last week in the Reebok Games, finishing in fifth place. Lisa Wilson paced the Minutewomen with a third-place finish in the shot put and seventh in the weight throw.

"Lisa Wilson has broken all of her personal records," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "She is having the best season of her life."

Wilson, along with teammates Stephanie Aguguo and Kristen Bakanowski, look to help deliver another high-scoring effort for the Minutewomen in the field events. Bakanowski, who finished third last week in Roxbury, is second in the A-10 in the pole vault with a distance of 12 ft., 3-1/2 inches. Aguguo, a sophomore, also finished third last week with a distance of 37-08.50. She is only a few centimeters away from reaching the ECAC qualifying mark of 38-04.75.

In the running events, Shiyi Zan could have a huge impact on the 3000m and 5000m. Zan has qualified for the ECAC Championships in both events and has gotten stronger as the season has progressed. The 1000m has also been a strong event for UMass thus far, as three Minutewomen (Gina Perno, Claire Pettit and Tarynn Trapp) have qualified for the event at the ECAC's.

"The team should be ready to perform at its best," LaFreniere said. "Last week we were still tired, but now we are finally recovered."

The Giegengack Invitational will begin Friday at 6 p.m. on the campus of Yale University. Friday's events include the weight throw, the high jump, long jump, 5000m run, 200m dash and the distance medley relay. The field events will resume Saturday at 9:30 a.m., with the running events continuing at 12:30 p.m.

Stopping Nivins crucial for UMass

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

After Wednesday's victory over Richmond, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg commented that his team has finally started to play with some consistency.

"We're playing some pretty good basketball right now, we've strung together a bunch of fairly good games where we've competed," Kellogg said. "The outcome hasn't always been great, but at the same token we've put ourselves in position to win every time out."

The question for UMass (8-12, 3-4 Atlantic 10) is whether or not it can maintain its level of play. Too often, the Minutemen have appeared to turn the corner only to falter in their next game.

UMass will find out whether its improvement is real or just a mirage when it hosts Saint Joseph's (13-8, 6-1 A-10) this Sunday at the Mullins Center.

The Hawks are on a hot streak having won eight of their last nine games and are currently third in the conference. A win Sunday would validate Kellogg and the team's belief that they are much better now both than they were earlier this season and than their record indicates.

The biggest matchup of the game will be in the frontcourt between UMass' Tony Gaffney and St. Joe's Ahmad Nivins. Gaffney is arguably the best all-around player on the Minutemen averaging 10.9 rebounds per game (ninth in the NCAA), 4.5 blocks per game (second in the NCAA) and 11.4 points per game. Gaffney and center Luke Bonner will have to contend with Hawks star forward-center Nivins. He scores 19.8 points per game, shoots 66.3 percent from the floor and grabs 11.9 rebounds per game (seventh in the NCAA).

As usual, UMass will rely on Ricky Harris to provide an offensive punch. Harris averages 19.1 points per game and has a true scorer's mentality.

"The biggest thing about him is he doesn't remember misses, he only remembers all his makes, so he's going to continue to shoot and continue to make plays," Kellogg said after the Richmond game.

Part of the reason for Harris' success is that he is becoming less one-dimensional offensively. He is still primarily a 3-point shooter, but he has worked to diversify his offense repertoire, making himself a difficult matchup for whoever is trying to guard him.

"Ricky's done a good job of figuring out different ways to score other than just shooting at 3-pointers," Kellogg said. "He's put the ball down some, he's getting to the lane, he's getting to the free-throw line and when you do all those things, suddenly the threes start falling."

Against Richmond, UMass shot a season-high 28 free throws, making 21. In that game, UMass did not settle for jump shots instead making it a point to attack the basket aggressively. The Minutemen have been working on individual drills during practice and want to continue to be assertive against the Hawks.

"The individual work has been fantastic for our guys," Kellogg said. "Practice has been very good – we're not going that long, but we're going hard and we are concentrating on individual skill development."

UMass guards Anthony Gurley, Chris Lowe and Harris will be assigned to defend the Hawks backcourt of Darrin Govens and Tasheed Carr, both of whom score 13.5 points per game. However, the UMass guards know that even if their man gets past them, Gaffney or Bonner will be there to defend the paint.

"Tony tells me before every game don't foul them, just let me block it," Harris said. "If he's not there I know nine out of 10 times Luke is going to be there to take the charge."

While St. Joe's has a better conference record than UMass, the Minutemen have beaten the only conference opponent that the Hawks have lost to. UMass beat Dayton, 75-62, on Jan. 10 while Dayton knocked off SJU, 69-58, on Feb. 1.

Chris Lowe became the 41st player in school history to eclipse the 1,000 point scoring mark Wednesday night in a win over Richmond. The Minutemen face Saint Joseph's Sunday.

BRIAN HEARN/COLLEGIAN

UMass lacrosse players celebrate a goal against Hobart last season. The Minutemen play an exhibition game against Army Saturday afternoon, a week before the regular season starts.

Final LAX tune–up on tap

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

With only an exhibition game and a week of practice left before the regular season begins, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella still has some questions left unanswered.

"We're still trying to find out who we are," Cannella said. "We're pretty much a very new team – from not only last year, but the fall. There are a couple jobs out there that still haven't been solidified – they may be by committee during the season the way it is now, unless somebody really steps up."

His team will get a chance to do just that, as Cannella expects over 30 players to see action in Saturday's exhibition against Army at Garber Field. It's the second and final exhibition on UMass' schedule before the regular season starts Feb. 14 in a home meeting against Sacred Heart.

UMass endured a tumultuous 2008. Before the season even began, eight players – including leading goal scorer Jim Connolly – were kicked off the team for their alleged roles in an off-campus incident. The Minutemen did their best to put it behind them, but finished the season at a disappointing 5-9, including a 3-4 mark in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference.

Two of the suspended players are back – Connolly and Ryan Marcus – but last season's second-leading goal scorer, Peter McNichols, is not because he is academically ineligible.

Cannella talked about how over the past few weeks he's learned his team has the leadership to take on anything.

"I knew we had really good leadership coming in with [senior goalkeeper] Doc Schneider, Tim Balise and Joe Reale. But I'm happy and a little surprised with how other guys have sort of accepted responsibility along with those guys," Cannella said. "If we can get leadership from top to bottom, with each class, then we'll have some success."

Army should provide a good test for the Minutemen. The Black Knights finished last season as regular season Patriot League Champions, ending the year at 9-6 (5-1 Patriot). But for the Minutemen, the exhibition is much more about fine-tuning their game than it is their opponent.

"We were able to score some goals and I thought we defended Drexel pretty well, but we were sloppy on both ends and we made some poor decisions," Cannella said of the first exhibition. "We're just trying to find the right combinations."

Despite the expected struggles in the first scrimmage, Cannella was encouraged with the resiliency his team exhibited.

"We went down in the scrimmage and our guys fought back. The guys didn't quit on each other, they didn't point any fingers, they just played through it and good things happened," Cannella said. "Our leadership stood up and made sure of that."

Road game could be friendly for UM

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

A trip "home" could be very beneficial for Stefanie Gerardot and the Massachusetts women's basketball team.

The Minutewomen will travel to the University of Dayton Arena tomorrow to take on the Flyers in Dayton, Ohio.

UMass (9-13, 2-5 Atlantic 10) hopes it will be a welcoming atmosphere for its three players from the Midwest: Gerardot (Fort Wayne, Ind.), Alesia Howard (Columbus, Ohio) and Emilie Teuscher (Miamisburg, Ohio).

The Minutewomen head into Saturday's contest coming off of a win (70-53 over Rhode Island) for the first time since Jan. 10, when they defeated Fordham.

Dayton (13-10, 2-5 A-10) goes eight players deep on its roster, including five freshmen, three of which start for the Flyers.

"We have a little bit more experience than they do," UMass assistant coach Jada Pierce said of the Minutewomen's personnel advantage. "But they've played some really tough competition this year. They've won some really good games against good teams outside of our conference.

"The toughest thing for us will be playing on the road," she added. "They play a little bit better at home than they do on the road so it'll be a challenge for us."

The Minutewomen are 6-2 when boasting a 20-point scorer and the stage is set for Gerardot to take over the game against a Dayton team that doesn't usually pester opposing guards who don't take the ball right to the basket. The Flyers are last in the A-10 in steals, causing an average of just five per game.

Dayton coach Jim Jabir will probably look to put Kristin Daugherty on Gerardot for the game. The 6-foot Daugherty is a bigger body than the 5-foot-10 Gerardot, but Gerardot is a better shooter, especially from 3-point range, where she outshoots Daugherty by more than 10 percent.

UMass shoots the ball from beyond-the-arc more than Dayton and is more accurate. The Flyers are 12th in the conference with a 30-percent shooting average from 3-point land, while the Minutewomen are sixth, shooting 34 percent.

Even though Dayton has productive guards, it also has a lot of talent in the post.

Freshman Justine Raterman is a lot like the Minutewomen's Kristina Danella. Both are big players, who are also gifted shooters. Each player shoots at least 35-percent from 3-point range but Danella's 32 scores from beyond-the-arc are two more than Raterman, who has started 11 more games for Dayton than Danella has for UMass.

Raterman has 16 blocks to her credit but the major presence down low for the Flyers is Casey Nance. One of the most productive freshmen in the conference, Nance leads the A-10 with 46 blocks and is sixth with 107 defensive rebounds. Averaging 6.2 points per game, Nance is mostly used as a body in the post and she's done well in that role so far this season.

Sophomore forward Teya Wright will take on Nance in the post and, according to Pierce, her recent inconsistencies are a thing of the past.

"We're going to be using her quickness as far as getting around the bigger post player. She's back," Pierce said of Wright, after her 16-point performance against Rhode Island. "She's ready to go and play as well as she did in the beginning of the year."

As little as Gerardot knows about the Flyers, their defense is one thing that she is well aware of.

"As far as I know about them as a team, they've competed with the top teams in the A-10 and they've just come up a little short every time," Gerardot said of the Flyers' consistency. "They're really feisty and they have textbook outside defense so their defense and intensity are going to be there."

Divers prepare for A–10s

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

The men and women of the Massachusetts diving teams will wrap up their respective seasons this Saturday as they head to West Point, N.Y., to compete in the Army Diving Invitational.

Last weekend was the swimmers' final competition before the Atlantic 10 Championships, but the divers get one more practice run.

Leading the men's diving team is freshman Jason Cook. The Amherst native has seen nothing but the top spots this year, and is hoping to continue his success heading into the A-10s.

Before Cook took to the board at UMass, there was no question of his potential. While in high school, he held the state diving record as well as the Western Massachusetts diving record, accomplishments that gave him the honor of being a three-time All-American Diver.

So far in his short time competing for the Minutemen, he has kept improving. In his first collegiate meet, Cook became the all-time record holder of the 3-meter dive, finishing at 311.90. If he can perform consistently as he has for the entire season, Cook shouldn't find a problem claiming a victory or two at the A-10s.

Representing the top diver for the women's team is senior Karen Upperco. Upperco, also a three-time All-American Diver, has become part of the heart and soul for the women's diving team. One way or another, she seems to find first-place finishes repeatedly.

Upperco has won numerous diving events and awards, two being her first-place finishes in A-10 Championships. Upperco has also recently set a 3-meter pool record (297.45) at Joseph Rogers Pool in Amherst.

Both divers will head into New York this weekend in hopes of winning their respective events, but will also have their eyes set on a bigger prize: The Atlantic 10 Championships are right around the corner, starting on Thursday, Feb. 13.

Bacteria destroy chemicals

By Shalini Jayarama
Collegian Staff

The civil and environmental engineering department at the University of Massachusetts is making headway on a bioreactor that would remove dangerous perchlorate contamination from water.

Perchlorate cannot be filtered out of water by conventional means, so the bioreactor uses bacteria that essentially breathe the perchlorate in order to filter it. Experiments taking place at the Massachusetts Military Reservation in Bourne, Mass. are currently testing the effectiveness of the device.

Robert McKeever, a senior engineering student at UMass has been working since summer 2008 on the construction and experimentation the bioreactor.

"The ground water" gets pumped up from the well...inside the bioreactor there's a layer of gravel which evenly disitributes flow [and] a large layer of a 3:1 sulfur pellet and crushed oyster shell mix, [which] is what the bacteria use as an electron donor and alkalinity source, respectively," McKeever said.

"By the time the water gets through where bacteria are congregated...[it] comes out of the bioreactor and [is] pushed through a unit of granulated activated carbon, [a] safety precaution incase all [of the perchlorate was not] removed," he continued.

What McKeever described as an "up-scaled bioreactor" was first built in the laboratory on a one-liter scale, but the official pilot experiments taking place at the MMR involve a 200-Liter bioreactor.

McKeever was hired to work on the project at the beginning of summer 2008. He later decided to turn his work on the project into his thesis, and will continue

Seniors try to land new jobs

By LaToya Murphy
Collegian Staff

The spring semester, usually an exciting time for graduating seniors, has recently become a bittersweet period due to the failing economy and lack of job prospects.

Many companies are no longer able to spend money pursuing first-time job seekers, which translates to fewer job openings and campus recruiters this year. Jobs that are available are being offered to those with more experience.

Employers are planning to increase the number of new graduates that they hire by 1.3 percent this year, according to a survey from the National Association of Colleges and Employers (NACE). That number is the lowest projected increase in seven years.

According to NACE, even times of strong economic growth, approximately 60 percent of college graduates return home from school unemployed. The average job search, which normally takes about 6 months, is expected to take at least 9 months this year.

However, this year many campuses are taking extra steps to help prepare their students for life after graduation by beefing up their normal calendar of events with more events targeted towards helping students overcome the hurdles of the job hunt.

The University of Massachusetts holds two career fairs and one internship and co-op fair annually which are designed to connect students with employers who are searching for candidates to fill positions in their workplaces. These fairs give students the opportunity to interact with and present their resumes to employers for review and possible hiring.

To help students prepare for the career fairs and their job search in general, Career Services has put together a series of workshops and resources for all UMass students including resume-writing help, interviewing skills tutorials and one-on-one counseling with a career counselor.

The first of these career fairs, the ALANA Career Fair, will

Vending machines to sell condoms

Vending machines at UNH will begin selling condoms.

By Dinah Gorelik
Collegian Staff

For those craving late night snacks, drinks and condoms, imagine not having to look any further than the nearest vending machine. Whether students judge this a convenience or an annoyance, it will soon be reality at the University of New Hampshire (UNH).

Initiated by UNH's Senate Health and Human Services Council, a resolution was recently passed for the selling of condoms in all residential hall vending machines, and the UNH Health Services plans to carry this out by the end of the semester.

Although a contract with the vending machine company had been made that required condoms in the vending machines, the condoms had disappeared over time, yet no one took notice of their absence.

"The Student Senate actually passed a similar resolution back in the fall of 2005," said Nick Wolf, speaker of the UNH Student Senate. "Condoms did become available in residence vending machines, but since that time the practice has fallen on the wayside."

"Currently, UNH Health Services provides free condoms to RAs [or resident assistants], many of whom make them available to their floors," continued Wolf. "This is not mandatory, however, and many times an RA will run out in the middle of the week. Some students may not feel comfortable getting them from their RAs. Putting condoms in the vending machines is meant to complement the existing program."

Julie Rocco, the Health and Human Services council chair, "My council's reasoning was: 'What if a student wants to have sex and the RA isn't in the building, has just run out of condoms, or the student doesn't feel comfortable asking the RA for a condom.' Having the condoms in the vending machines allows students to still practice safe sex in those situations."

This is particularly crucial since Health Services at Columbia University found that 20 to 25 percent of college students are infected with an STD.

"No matter what their sales are like, I intend to honor the student senate's request to put them back into the vending machines. It's part of the contract," said Rick MacDonald, assistant director of UNH Hospitality Services, according to the student newspaper at UNH, The New Hampshire.

Some hall directors at the University said that they have never seen condoms in the vending machines before even though UNH health services website writes that condoms can be found there.

"The Student Senate views this as a real health issue for its constituents, since college students are at a high risk for STDs. We plan on working with the staff of UNH Health

Institutionalized kids subject of research

By Matt Robare
Collegian Staff

The country of Bulgaria has a number on institutions called orphanages, but according to professor Robert Shilkret of Mount Holyoke College, only five percent of institutionalized children are without biological parents.

There are different kinds of institutions, some are for younger children and some are for adolescents, but these children are kicked out to fend for themselves when they turn eighteen Shilkret said, citing that a lack of education has produced a permanent underclass in Bulgaria.

Levels of care differ, too, said Shilkret. Some children are left permanently, with the parents rarely visiting them, some are only in the institution during the work week and live with their parents on the weekend and some parents use the institutions as daycare.

"To be admired is Galina Markova who is the real crusader," said Shilkret.

Doctor Markova conducted a study on three groups of mothers who institutionalized their children as part of her doctoral work at Smith College, of which Shilkret was the advisor.

The three groups of mothers were equally impoverished and institutionalized their children along the three levels of care. Doctor Markova herself translated the tests and techniques used in the study into Bulgarian.

They found exactly what they had predicted: the kind of care the mothers had placed their children into was psychological in origin.

Making use of attachment theory, which Shilkret described as the "single-most influential theory in developmental psychology in the past fifty years," they found that the mothers who essentially abandoned their children at the institutions showed

Minutemen lose late again

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

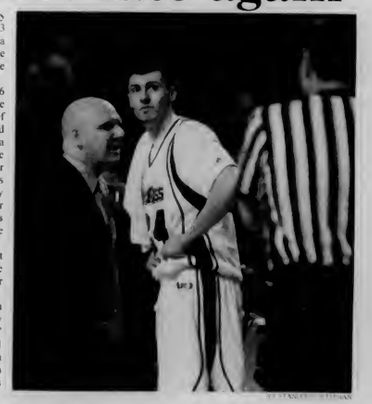
No matter how well the Massachusetts men's basketball team plays on a particular night, it always seems to change in the final few minutes of the game.

Sunday's contest against Saint Joseph's was no different.

The Minutemen fell to the Hawks, 68-64, Sunday afternoon at the Mullins Center, losing another late lead and melting down in the final minutes – dropping their seventh game decided five points or less this season.

St. Joe's 68
UMass 64

"It's nice to know we're finally showing we can play for 38 minutes, but if you can't play for 40 [minutes], there's no point in playing," UMass forward Tony Gaffney said after the game.



The Minutemen (8-13, 3-5 Atlantic 10), who led for much of the game, held a 53-48 lead with 7 minutes, 26 seconds to play after Anthony Gurley hit one of his four 3-pointers. But with Gaffney out of the game with foul trouble for an extended period, the Hawks quickly came back and went on a 15-3 run – taking the lead for good on a 20-footer by Ahmad Nivins at the 2:26 mark with the shot clock at one second.

Down by nine points with 16 seconds left, the Minutemen gave St. Joe's (14-8, 7-1 A-10) a brief scare in the final seconds. David Gibbs converted on a 3-point play to cut the lead to six, and after two missed free throws by the Hawks, Ricky Harris hit a 3-pointer with three seconds remaining to climb within three points.

But Darrin Govens hit his first free throw for SJU, extending the lead to four and sealing the win for the Hawks.

"I think we've been involved in as many close games as probably anyone in the country right now," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said. "I give St. Joe's credit, they've done a good job of figuring out ways to win down the stretch – something that's eluded us as a team right now."

to work on the project throughout the spring semester.

McKeever is working with a number of colleagues, including the principle investigators of the project, Dr. Sarina Ergas and Dr. Klaus Nüsslein, microbiology doctoral student Teresa Conneely, who is currently working on how to increase the bacterial population within the bioreactor, and masters student Amber Boles of the civil and environmental engineering Department.

"Ashish Sahu [a former research doctorate] conducted the initial bench scale experiments," McKeever said of the origin of the bioreactor project. "[He,] along with Dr. Ergas and Dr. Nüsslein, wrote for a grant... and now [the project is being] funded by the National Science Foundation."

The experiments will first test if the bacteria can biologically reduce the perchlorate contaminant in the water effectively on a larger scale, and then a feasibility study and cost analysis will be carried out.

"Other systems...like Ion Exchange...don't actually remove perchlorate...they concentrate perchlorate," McKeever said. The consequences entailed by such a system means that the concentrated perchlorate still needs to be separately disposed of.

"Using a biological system like this one," McKeever added, "[means] the perchlorate will be...no more."

Experiments at the MMR have currently been going on for about three months. McKeever does not know how long they will take to come to a final conclusion.

"I'm hoping to see results... within the next four months," McKeever said.

McKeever said after he graduates he hopes to continue his work on water treatment.

The ALANA career fair has 39 visiting employers on deck. ALANA students and the general student body, as well, are encouraged to attend.

On the following day, the Feb. 11, the Career Services office, located in 511 Goodell, is holding their annual Campus-Wide Career Fair from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the lower level of the Campus Center. This fair, which boasts visits from 77 different employers, is open to all students and majors.

The last in the series of fairs set for this week will take place on Thursday, Feb. 12. the Internship and Co-op Fair will be from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. This fair has 44 participating organizations lined up to mingle with students interested in scoring an internship or co-op for the summer.

Jeff Silver of the Field Experience Office in Career Services holds an introduction to internships and co-op workshops every Monday and Thursday from 3 to 4 p.m. in 508 Goodell.

the most insecure attachment style, the weekly-care mothers showed stronger attachment, and the daycare mothers showed the most secure attachment.

Markova and Shilkret believe that the institutions must be reformed or closed down entirely because of the importance of a parental figure in developing children. There is a great deal of controversy in Bulgaria about the future of the institutions; keeping them open costs the state a lot of money every year since they are full-time residential institutions where the children must be fed, clothed, warmed, and staff must be paid, but providing the services could cost more than keeping the institutions open, especially with few trained social workers in the country. In fact, one of Markova's current projects is establishing a doctoral program in social work at the New Bulgarian University in the capital of Sofia.

Currently Markova is designing a study of adults who were raised in the institutions as children. Shilkret said that they hope to do a study of children currently kept there. He also said that students from the five colleges can get involved by taking courses in developmental psychology, especially on attachment theory.

Opinions differ on condoms

Services and University Hospitality Services, which deals with the vending companies, to make sure condom availability in the machines begins by the end of the semester and continues into the future," said Wolf.

Yet other institutions harbored severe doubts to the selling of condoms in vending machines. Such was the case at the University of South Carolina where according the school's newspaper, The Daily Gamecock, the Residential Hall Association thought it would paint a negative picture of the school.

"Condoms, when used consistently and correctly, are a highly effective means of reducing one's risk of becoming infected with HIV and other STDs and of reducing the risk of unintended pregnancy," said William J. Bartosch, assistant Professor of Public Policy & Management in the Department of Public Health at the University of Massachusetts. "Public health professionals are generally supportive of their wide availability to sexually active individuals, and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) encourage their use."

University Health Services offers condoms at discount prices from their pharmacy, and they are given out at many peer health programs as well as at the Everywomen's Center.

At UMass, resident assistants (RA) are given a bag of approximately 50 condoms at a resource fair, which takes place before students arrive. It is assumed that having condoms is a responsibility of an RA.

In regards to selling condoms in vending machines, Cindy Hopf, an RA in Orchard Hill, thinks it is a good idea.

"Some people won't come to an RA because they are too shy or the RA might not be available. If you stick them on the door though, they will disappear."

Although many UMass students don't find fault with the availability and attainability of condoms, students range in opinions regarding selling condoms in vending machines.

"I wouldn't do that because it's only encouraging sex even more[r]" said UMass freshman Nithin Gopalsamy.

"I do not think this encourages more students to have sex, I just think it encourages students that are having sex to have safe sex no matter what the situation is."

On the other hand, "You can kill two birds with one stone," said freshman animal science major Rachel Orlowski, "You can get a soda and a condom."

Blue eyes confuse scientists

BY KAREN KAPLAN
LOS ANGELES TIMES

Blue eyes typically are associated with beauty, or perhaps Frank Sinatra. But to University of Wisconsin anthropologist John Hawks, they represent an evolutionary mystery.

For nearly all of human history, everyone in the world had brown eyes. Then, between 6,000 and 10,000 years ago, the first blue-eyed baby was born somewhere near the Black Sea.

For some reason, that baby's descendants gained a 5 percent evolutionary advantage over their brown-eyed competitors, and today the number of people with blue eyes tops half a billion.

"What does it mean?" said Hawks, who studies the forces that have shaped the human species for the last 6 million years.

Nobody knows. It is one of the unanswered questions about evolution that persist 200 years after the birth of Charles Darwin, whose birthday will be celebrated worldwide on Thursday.

Darwin amassed a lifetime of observations on plants and animals famously to conclude that all life on Earth evolved from simple organisms through a painstakingly slow process of tiny random changes and a continuous contest for survival of the fittest.

Although Darwin published his masterwork "On the Origin of Species" 150 years ago and died in 1882, studies on evolution continue apace. Much of that effort focuses on the species Darwin considered the pinnacle of the evolutionary process: Homo sapiens.

Until recently, conventional wisdom held that human beings had mastered their environment so thoroughly that the imperative to evolve had in many ways diminished.

"People thought that with technology and culture, there'd be no reason for physical things to make any difference," said Milford Wolpoff, a paleoanthropologist at the University of Michigan. "If you can ride a horse, it doesn't matter if you can run fast."

That turned out to be wrong. As it happens, the pace of evolution has been speeding up – not slowing down – in the 40,000 years since our ancestors fanned out from Ethiopia to populate the globe.

And in the 5,000 to 10,000 years since agriculture triggered the growth of large societies, the pace has accelerated to 100 times historical levels.

Hawks and other scientists quantified this in late 2007 by comparing more than 3 million genetic variants in the DNA of 269 people of African, European, Asian and Native American descent. They created sophisticated computer models to scour the As, Cs, Gs and Ts of the genome in search of telltale patterns that signal recent adoption of favorable genes.

Their methods rely on the fact that new mutations are not inherited alone, but are passed along in large DNA chunks. Over time, random changes make those chunks smaller. By comparing the length of those chunks in different people, scientists can estimate how long the beneficial mutation has been spreading through the gene pool.

The analysis turned up about 1,800 genes – 7 percent of the genome – that have been adopted widely in the last 40,000 years. Researchers using more conservative methods estimate the number at 300 to 500.

Humans are continuing to evolve in response to diseases, diet, climate and other factors. But technological advances have made natural selection "a much less potent force on us in the present than it was in the past," said Noah Rosenberg, a human geneticist at the University of Michigan.

Today, lactose-intolerant kids can compensate by drinking soy milk and eating a variety of readily available nutritious foods. People deficient in vitamin D can take a supplement. Modern medicines also might have reduced the pressure for the gene pool to create and spread mutations that would protect against new diseases.

But without a time machine, all science can do is make an educated guess as to where the human genome is heading, said Jerry Coyne, an evolutionary biologist at the University of Chicago.

"There are some things we're never going to know."

UMass way too shabby

Nick O'Malley

As most of the buildings and walkways on campus are framed by a miserable layer of snow, there's a growing sentiment about the campus' image: UMass looks like crap.

Even when this snow melts, though, in what I'm assuming will be July at this point, the ugly side of campus will still be able to rear its equally ugly head, which is ugly.

For just once, it would be nice to see UMass in a state where it just looks fully built and not constantly under renovation.

This isn't Fenway Park, this is a university. It does not need a new construction project every month.

Over the past few years, we've all been witnesses to the construction enigma that is New Dirt, which, in recent times, has slowed down. The bowl construction is less hideous, the science and studio arts buildings have been completed and the completely necessary sidewalks near Franklin are done.

Yet, that isn't enough.

As soon as the opportunity for the campus to look decent came, the construction of the new recreational center, which the student body was absolutely clamoring for instead of lower fees, began. When one eyesore goes away, a new one takes its place.

It's counter-productive, really. All of this construction is aimed towards improving the campus and its image in the long run, which is deemed an even trade-off with short term negative effects. However, if the school is constantly under construction, there is no long run; it will always look crummy.

Even without the new projects, there are still a host of other blemishes on the school's image.

For just once, it would be nice to see UMass in a state where it just looks fully built and not constantly under renovation.

Take the pathway through Morrill for example, it's just a staircase and has been closed for months. You can build the finest research center in all the land, but as long as a walkway remains closed for six months for what appears to be some broken stairs, it does not reflect well upon the University.

Incidentally, the new science building, which may play a key role in attracting top prospective students, is located on one of the worst roads most students have ever driven on. It doesn't matter how nice your campus looks if a visiting students comes to the school and busts his cars suspension in a pothole.

Of course, there is the legendary UMass landmark that is the campus pond. I could make the effort to make a joke about this body of "water," but any attempt at hyperbole could probably taken literally on some level.

I remember going on to the UMass website and seeing a photo of the bridge that crosses the pond in the soft light of an autumn twilight and the caption underneath telling how the bridge was "beautiful" and "world-renowned."

That thing's renowned alright, it's a grime-covered walkway that, when not blocked by ice and mud, is too narrow for two people to cross simultaneously. That bridge is one old guy away from being the UMass version of "The Bridge of Three" from Monty Python that hangs over a lethal cesspool of goose crap.

In the context of the school's budget disaster, these issues are manageable. However, when the school is taking enormous strides to bolster its image with grandiose new facilities, it does not make sense to leave so many other areas of campus in shambles.

Since Chancellor Holub took office last semester, the administration has constantly pushed for improving UMass' standing as a research institution and its overall reputation. The efforts to improve on the research end are plain to see. But as long as the campus is laden with chain-link fences and stagnant construction sites, the school will continue to be marred visually.

If a visiting student were to take a bus down the road and take a look at Amherst College, choosing the more prestigious looking school would be an easy pick. It's easy for UMass to look nice from a distant glance, Southwest towers standing triumphantly against an autumn backdrop. However, a closer look will show a much shabbier looking school.

UMass may look nice in the controlled photos on the website, but every school has those. If the administration is serious about bolstering the school's image, they're going to have to fix it up for its close-up.

Otherwise, UMass will still look like crap.

A lesson in the school of business

Paul Payer

We all make dozens of consumer decisions every day. Some are simple choices without significant repercussions, such as the deliberation between honey mustard and barbeque wings while on the phone with delivery at 2 a.m. Other decisions are more significant, and bear heavier impacts on those who make them. The most significant decision ever made by college students, though, involved which institution of higher education to attend.

Although this decision involved more thought and carried more importance, the basic process is not unlike consumer decisions students and other Americans make every day.

As the economy slumps further into seemingly irreversible national peril, retailers and advertisers struggle to grab the attention – and wallets – of consumers. Consumers, meanwhile, have little interest in purchasing a good or service unless it can appear to provide a necessary and cost-effective value.

Companies spend millions of dollars attempting to make that case, as evidenced by the willingness of advertisers to spend $3 million for a 30-second spot during the Super Bowl, even during a nationwide recession.

Defining a brand and marketing a product so that consumers are motivated to purchase or pursue it is not confined to the makers of light beer, Doritos and automobiles. Rather, college admissions boards across the country engage in multi-million dollar efforts to promote their institutions as a viable products for high school seniors, who carry with them tens of thousands of dollars to spend on tuition and bring high GPA and SAT marks to bolster that institution's national ranking and reputation.

Just as marketing agencies seeking to advertise beer and snack foods, colleges seek to define their product on their terms in a positive and desirable light. Millions of dollars are spent each year to produce brochures, schedule high school visits, conduct campus tours, advertise on radio and television and offer incentives to high-profile applicants.

On the other side of the equation, parents of high school seniors dole out hundreds to thousands of dollars on college admission advisors, campus visits, courses, books and application fees. The consumer decision in this case is both high-cost and high-stakes. Prospective students and their parents view the college selection process as a defining moment in their child's life and future.

A whole host of actors seek to capitalize on this market including U.S. News and World Report, whose annual publication of college rankings guide the aspirations of high school seniors across the country.

Colleges have always attempted to promote the public image of their institution, either to combat a low ranking or to reinforce an image of prestige and superiority.

The fight to maintain position or move up the list has become a major influence of college admission boards of the nation's colleges and universities. During the past few years, U.S. News and World Report has faced growing criticism over the methodology and formulation used to produce the rankings. Moreover, many view the presence and suggested importance of these rankings undermines the opportunity for students to select the best institution for their personal needs and ambitions.

Essentially, the process assigns hundreds of diverse institutions a single number to dominate the minds and decisions of potential applicants.

As a result, colleges now focus on recruiting students who will most favorably meet the methodology of college rankings rather than the environment and objectives of the institution. Preoccupation with rankings and reputation has impeded the ability for prospective students to make balanced and informed consumer choices. These concerns have always been shared by the general public, students and even amongst some college presidents and administrations. But the status quo has remained relatively stable.

Colleges have always attempted to promote the public image of their institution, either to combat a low ranking or to reinforce an image of prestige and superiority. State institutions such as the University of Massachusetts will have the additional task of convincing prospective students to attend an institution facing a $45 million shortfall, reductions in state assistance, declines in alumni contributions, budget cuts, increases in the cost of attendance and campus-wide hiring freezes.

Some may argue that these conditions may weaken the ability of UMass to attract a quality group of potential students. Take a walk by a GM or Chrysler dealership: Consumers normally do not desire to purchase a product in questionable financial standing.

UMass faces a significant challenge in maintaining a positive university image capable of attracting a competitive class of incoming freshman. As with any consumer good, UMass must stress the value it can offer prospective students. In an unstable economy, high school seniors and their families have become increasingly concerned with price-sensitive topics such as tuition and job prospects.

This perspective suggests that economic woes may afford UMass the opportunity to pick off students apprehensive about the cost of an education from a private college. Moreover, efforts to improve the University's image such as the ongoing crackdown on drinking and fun, along with efforts to reform Commonwealth College as a more personal and intellectual community, rather than simply an obstacle course towards Latin honors eligibility, will help attract quality candidates to the University.

That, of course, will result in a favorable judgment from U.S. News and World Report in its next publication of college rankings. But that's not what motivates those responsible for admissions at UMass, right?

Education more than showing up to class

Eric Magazu

Chancellor Robert Holub has been in contact with the campus community by e-mail many times over the past several months. The topic of these communications has been the campus budget situation. Recent economic news, and the resulting state budget reductions, have required University of Massachusetts administrators and Holub to review key areas of the campus budget for potential cost savings.

We can be confident that the Chancellor and his team will work to their best abilities to prioritize key budgetary needs and to maintain the highest standards of academic performance for the University. Towards this end, a reorganization of departments may be necessary. Various plans to this effect have been addressed in the Chancellor's ongoing e-mail messages and on the campus budget page on his website.

There is a deeper issue at hand here, and it puts the whole state of affairs into proper perspective. The concerns over monetary issues are truly secondary to the vision and mission of the University and how we students choose to take it upon ourselves to direct the focus of our education.

UMass offers a great deal for students – both within the structure of academic life and outside of it – if only we would make use of these opportunities.

Many of us are keenly aware of the numerous times we have disliked attending a particular lecture, outright skipped class or the times we have gone through the motions of fulfilling course requirements with the prospect of securing a good grade.

A better education comes only by way of a student's commitment to learn.

When we do such things, we undervalue the quality of the education we are receiving. In this scenario alone, we see the effects of where our tuition and fees has the potential to be better spent.

The opposite situation occurs as well.

There are many opportunities available on campus that we have the potential to incorporate into our education. Guest speakers, performances and student-run activities are available to us and have the power to supplement the material we learn in class. Some of these opportunities may even prove more valuable in our life education, especially if we enjoy the topic in which we have the chance to study outside of class.

In the present budget crisis, the area of the budget that may prove to have the best potential for cost savings is staff reductions. These cuts will certainly pose hardships on the families affected. We need to reflect on these situations and provide assistance wherever possible.

At the same time, we cannot allow these deeply human concerns to confuse us that having more faculty and staff necessarily means having a better education. A better education comes only by way of a student's commitment to learn.

The quality and reputation of our university relies upon the drive of the faculty, the motivation of the student body and the interaction between the two groups. This is precisely what makes the best colleges what they are and we need to foster an environment on campus that encourages this view.

As a starting point, faculty and students have to become aware of our purpose here at UMass. If the purpose is to attain a high-paying job or to attend a top law school after graduation, some student body members may be motivated by going through the hoops of a course and the material learned will be quickly forgotten. When professors sense this lack of motivation on behalf of students, their own desire to teach may diminish.

On the contrary, when an instructor senses a student is eager and excited to learn a certain subject, many times a truly good teacher will instruct such a student without any desire for any compensation whatsoever. The true compensation comes from enlightening such a bright young mind.

The purpose of our school, and of any university, must involve the search for truth. It is this search for truth that has been the foundation of almost all universities. The knowledge of the truth, and the application of the truth in knowing how we must live our lives, must be the end goal and the entire purpose of education.

UMass-Amherst has the potential to remain one of America's great universities. For this to occur, we must begin to realize the total dollar amount of the campus budget has little to do towards this end. The true path to greatness must be in the dedication and humility of our faculty and students, and by seeking the real purpose of education, which is the pursuit of all the things that are true.

Would God really bless America?

Chris Russell

Many were outraged by Rev. Jeremiah Wright's exclamations of "God damn America." Apparently, such people believe God would choose to bless America rather than damn it.

Would God really bless America? Evangelicals think so, as they claim America is a "Christian nation." Yet would a "Christian nation" allow millions of its own citizens to suffer through life without enough food, adequate housing or access to healthcare?

America is not a "Christian nation." It is – proudly – a capitalist nation where CEOs are paid millions of dollars when they are fired and working full-time at the minimum wage is not enough to live above the poverty line.

America's foreign policy history also proves it cannot be considered a "Christian nation." Consider how America obtained the Philippines as a colony at the turn of the 20th century. After three years of war, 20,000 Filipinos died in combat and over 200,000 civilians died from the violence, famine and disease that came with the war. Meanwhile, about 5,000 American soldiers died.

The purpose of all this carnage, you ask? So that America could obtain its first colony in Southeast Asia and thus increase its power and influence in that part of the world.

Once Amcrica attained superpower status, its foreign policy became evcn more aggressive. In 1953, America overthrew Iran's first democratically elected Prime Minister because he wished to nationalize his country's oil, which would have meant fewer profits for American oil companies. A pro-American government, headed by Muhammad Reza Shah, came to power after the coup and, not surprisingly, Iran's oil was not nationalized. Instead, the Shah ruled Iran with an iron fist. Political executions, censorship and an extreme disparity of wealth became an everyday part of Iranian life – all to protect the profits of American oil companies. Didn't you ever wonder why American hostages were taken during the Iranian revolution?

Vietnam – need I say more? Over two million Vietnamese civilians died because of the war. Ironically, America justified the war by claiming South Vietnam needed "protection" from the evils of North Vietnamese communism. Yet, did South Vietnam ask for this "protection?" No – considering an election was supposed to take place in 1956 to unite North and South Vietnam under a single government. However, America prevented it from happening because intelligence reports indicated the communist Ho Chi Minh would win. This eventually led to war between communist forces from both North and South Vietnam, and America and its South Vietnamese puppet government.

This war was not to "protect" anybody, but to serve American foreign policy goals, which were to prevent communist expansion at any cost.

Did anybody actually read the Ten Commandments before they proclaimed America a "Christian nation?"

Finally, there is Iraq. Bush sold the war to the American people by claiming that Iraq had WMDs and was linked to 9/11, two things that have since been proven untrue. It is now also clear Bush only used intelligence that made Iraq seem like a threat and ignored intelligence that said Iraq had no WMDs or links to terrorism. But I digress.

Now, what is left to justify the war? According to the book "Hubris," Washington Post columnist Charles Krauthammer wrote before the war: "Iraq will be the first act in the play of an America coming ashore in Arabia … It's not just about weapons of mass destruction or American credibility. It's about reforming the Arab world."

In Krauthammer's opinion "reforming the Arab world" was one of several justifications for invading Iraq. In other words, one of the reasons over 4,000 American soldiers and 100,000 Iraqi civilians died was so America could shape the Arab world to fit its values and interests.

Do you think people despise America because they "hate our freedoms," as Bush liked to claim, or because we treat civilians around the world as disposable pawns in our pursuit of power? Think about it.

Still, many argue that America has to have such an aggressive foreign policy to adequately defend its own citizens. This may or may not be true, but one thing is clear: It is not the "Christian" thing to do.

America exploits its neighbors in the world community instead of following the commandments banning murder, stealing and coveting thy neighbor's goods. Did anybody actually read the Ten Commandments before they proclaimed America a "Christian nation"?

All this would be bad news if God was deciding whether to damn us or bless us. I doubt God is interested in capitalism or cares if America preserves its status as a world superpower. He probably would care more about the number of homeless children than the growth of America's gross domestic product.

This does not stop people from saying "God bless America." However, saying anything else – even "God is ambivalent toward America" – would admit God does not agree with American policy. This is something people don't even want to think about because it raises an obvious question: what if God choose to damn America, rather than bless it?

Celebrating chocolate

Tasty treat recreated at Historic Deerfield

BY KATE OLESIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A diamond ring may not be in the budget this Valentine's Day, but there's always the next best thing – chocolate.

Historic Deerfield is holding its sixth-annual American Heritage Chocolate Celebration complete with chocolate desserts and entrees, demonstrations of how chocolate was made in colonial times and an educational experience on where chocolate comes from.

This year, the chocolate festival falls on Valentine's Day, this Saturday, Feb. 14, and priced like the date, $14 for adults, perfect for those looking for a low-budget activity on the infamous day of love.

Create a handmade card and mix your own hot chocolate for your Valentine in the History Workshop Building, or skip over to the Deerfield Inn for chocolate drinks, cocktails or fruit skewers dipped in chocolate for a sweet respite from classes.

For those looking to learn about the history behind chocolate, assistant professor of history at Amherst College, Rick Lopez, will give a talk titled "A Short History of Chocolate in Latin America." The region has a long history with the sweet treat.

At last year's festival, historian Amanda Lange discussed how the cacao tree originated in either the Amazon or the foothills of the Andes mountains in Venezuela. There are 20 different species of cacao trees, but only three are used for consumption. The trees can live for 100 years but are only economically productive for about 60 years.

While a general history of cacao is a staple of the festival, learning some little known facts about the delicacy is also Historic Deerfield's goal.

Chris Fox the curator of collections at Fort Ticonderoga will speak about the way the military used chocolate in the 18th century – a new and interesting twist to the festivities.

Another new addition is the exhibition "Stimulating Beverages: Tea, Coffee and Chocolate Wares at Historic Deerfield" which will examine the part caffeine played in early New England drinks. Beverage wares will be on exhibit

The process of heating cacao nibs over an open hearth takes two hours to complete as Susan McLellan Plaisted (left) and her assistant demonstrate at last year's Chocolate Celebration.

The Sierra Grille offers an extensive beer and wine selection with 21 draught beers, 15 bottled beers and 37 different wines.

Grille has range of beverages

Sierra Grille combines an inexpensive menu and class

BY JENNIFER TURNER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON – The Five College area is full of bars and restaurants, some more generic than others, but all with their own unique character. In a neighborhood that takes pride in its individuality and creativity, The Sierra Grille in Northampton stands out as one of the best.

The Sierra Grille opened its doors in 2006 and is now one of the most popular places to go, for dining or drinks, in Northampton. On top of their outstanding and expansive food menu, Sierra Grille offers a wide range of both beer and wine.

The beer selection changes frequently and there are 21 draught and 15 bottled beers to choose from. However, don't plan on finding Bud Light or Coors here, Sierra Grille only offers well-crafted, artisan beers.

The wine list is even more impressive, with 37 wines offered by the glass – 19 white and 18 red. All of these wines can be ordered in a "sample size" 2-ounce glass for $1.75-$3.50. These samples are a perfect way to try a wine you may have not had before, since you are able to taste before committing to a large glass.

The samples are a great way to go for an evening of wine tasting. Instead of settling on one large glass, pick out a few wines you have never tried and enjoy sampling the differences. You may find your new favorite.

Don't miss the Sierra Cantabria Tinto Rioja, a delicious Spanish red wine made from the Tempranillo grape, and the Terra Sauvignon Blanc, a crisp and citrusy Chilean white wine.

With all these choices, you may seem a little overwhelmed when you sit down at The Sierra Grille, but fear not. The bartenders are more than willing to help in your decision making process, and they really know their stuff.

It's obvious that the bartenders love helping people find their new favorite, whether it's beer, wine or food.

"Our offerings and our service reflect the fact that everybody seems to feel rewarded by people trying out new things and discovering something new that they like," bartender Matt Ford said. "So we are geared towards facilitating that, with the sample size wine glasses … and the number of small food items we have under $10."

The small food items are one of the things that make The Sierra Grille one of my favorite places to go. With many tapas or "bite-sized" food options, it's possible to try out many different flavors and styles of cuisine in one sitting.

With such a variety of foods to pick from, it is hard to select a favorite from the menu. However, make sure to try one of the cheese trays, either the ever-changing Artisanal or the Standard – featuring Gruyere, Smoked Cheddar, and Chevre spread. Both trays come with crackers, fruit and other seasonal items. They are a perfect accompaniment to the wine samples.

As for the staff recommendations on food, Ford says, "Our wings and fries are better than anywhere else in town."

The wings are cured, smoked in-house and then roasted to order. They are never fried. It gives them a unique flavor in a town with too many greasy fried chicken wings. The Belgian-style twice-fried fries have a delicious crispy texture and are

Passion Pit pulsates in NoHo

Variety of sounds, instruments in tour finale at Iron Horse

BY ADRIENNE WICKHAM-GOBERT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON – Hundreds of fans were packed into the Iron Horse on Saturday night, all singing and dancing; the room pulsated to the blaring beat of synthesizers as Cale Parks and Paper Route opened for Passion Pit in the finale of the tour.

Passion Pit, hailing from Boston, is a new, upbeat band that has been captivating indie listeners and dance music advocates alike. They categorize themselves in the electronic genre, however they draw inspiration from various hip-hop and funk artists with influences from pop idol Randy Newman and synth extraordinaire Giorgio Moroder.

Their debut EP "Chunk of Change," released in Sept. 2008, includes their hit single , "Sleepyhead," which is on one of the Urban Outfitters mixes. The EP was originally put together as a Valentine's Day present for the lead singer Michael Angelako's girlfriend. He ended up giving his album to friends, family and fellow students at Emerson College.

Not long after, Angelako was signed to Frenchkiss Records and his brainchild expanded to five members, in order to perform live. Since their founding, it has been a whirlwind for Passion Pit. They've opened for bands such as Death Cab for Cutie, Girl Talk and These New Puritans. Passion Pit also won the WFNX/Boston Phoenix Best Music Poll as the Best New Local Act of 2008.

Their music will make you dance, though you can try to resist the urge.

Musically it's comparable to workings of MGMT. While vocally they give off a vibe similar to The Darkness while their samples are similar to those used by Kanye West and Peaches. With inspirations like these it's hard to go wrong.

Cale Parks opened the Northampton show. This solo act, from Brooklyn, N.Y. resembles bands such as The Knife and The Postal Service. He was impressive through his ability to multitask by using multiple feedback loops while drumming away on snare drums, cymbals, manipulating synthesizers and singing. Fans threw their hands in the air and danced to his upbeat songs as he put on an exceptional performance.

Following Parks was the band Paper Route from Nashville, Tenn. The four members, Chad Howat, JT Daly, Andy Smith and Gavin McDonald, came out in button-down collared shirts and, after an extended sound check, the band kicked off their set with the song "American Clouds."

They worked the crowd, everyone was clapping along to their music.

Smith announced, "You guys are best crowd by far that we've ever had. We mean that."

Watching this band is an experience, the musicians are multi-talented in their ability to play numerous instruments with each member playing synthesizers, keyboard, guitar and bass, among others, while also incorporating unexpected instruments into their set – at one point, a synthesizer/bass player pulled out an accordion while Howat, the keyboardist/bassist, started playing a xylophone and another member played sleigh bells.

Additionally, vocalist Daly had exquisite stage presence while he jumped around, making sure to captivate the audience at all times.

Passion Pit was welcomed by hundreds of enthusiastic fans and put on a euphorically upbeat show. Certainly filled to capacity, the Iron Horse was teeming with fans from wall to wall.

Angelakos greeted fans by hoping onto his piano bench and excitedly asking the crowd, "Is it okay if we play some songs for you tonight?"

His fervor was received and less than halfway into the first song a pit broke out and nearly every person in the audience was dancing.

By the second song the crowd was filled with energy, but after Angelakos stepped off the stage to sing in the pit the audience was ecstatic. Throughout their set, Angelakos made humorous comments to the crowd.

At one point he talked about their new album, joking, "Our album's gonna be called 'Manners' it comes out in May…at least, I hope it will." Their repertoire included a medley of songs from their EP and their new, upcoming album.

The crowd's energy reached its peak when Passion Pit played their single, "Sleepyhead," a song that uses synths and hip hop samples. As the band played their final song, "Smile Upon Me," the crowd sang along. The song illustrated their signature euphoric and blissfully melancholic sound. Fans screamed, begging for an encore for a few minutes before Angelako came out again to play a solo, acoustic piece.

The chemistry between the touring groups was present when Parks, the opening act, returned to the stage and accompanied Passion Pit on the snare.

As fans cleared out of the Iron Horse, Paper Route and Cale Parks came down to the floor to greet fans. The Northampton show deemed to be more of a dance party than your typical concert.

Passion Pit is kicking off their Europe tour in a week and a half. They'll be playing all over England, Ireland, France before returning to the United States in early March to play in several states and Canadian cities and Passion Pit will be releasing its full album in late spring, it won't disappoint.

Melted cheeses make delicious goodies

BY AMY SCATTERGOOD
LOS ANGELES TIMES

LOS ANGELES – Sometimes when I make a grilled cheese sandwich, I deliberately load the bread with far more cheese than it can handle, knowing full well that as the sandwich cooks, the cheddar or Emmentaler will spill over the sides and undergo its beautiful alchemy in the hot pan, transformed into a crisp, golden filigree. Sure, the sandwich is good, but it's pretty much an afterthought.

You might not go to such extremes; you might get your melted cheese fix in another, less orchestrated way. Perhaps wresting the dome of caramelized mozzarella from the top of a pizza. Or liberating the crunchy layer of grated Parmesan or Fontina from atop a baking dish of pasta.

But the joys of melted cheese don't have to be stolen. Melted, grilled or baked cheese is a terrific dish in its own right, justly celebrated in many cuisines, where crispy discs of melted Parmigiano-Reggiano or Monterey Jack or caramelized slabs of halloumi (a Cypriot sheep's milk cheese) are served, gasp, right out in the open, even given center stage.

Walk into Jimmy Shaw's Loteria Grill in Hollywood and you can order a plate of "chicharrones de queso," a burnished sculpture of grilled shredded Monterey Jack. Think Richard Serra's idea of cheese. Served with a napkin of warm house-made corn tortillas and bowls of salsa verde and guacamole, you break up the cheese and fold it into a tortilla, like a taco. The result is terrific, satisfying and unexpected, like a quesadilla in reverse, with the cheese crisped instead of the tortilla.

Monterey Jack, a bland and often innocuous cheese, is transformed utterly by a few minutes on Shaw's flattop grill – or, at home, in a nonstick pan – into a richly flavorful treat, nutty and crispy as a potato chip or as the fried pork rinds the name recalls.

Pair the chicharrones with any sauce you have on hand, or make a tart, crunchy salsa with tomatillos, radishes, cilantro and cucumbers – and a healthy dose of jalapenos. You might never eat quesadillas again.

(Shaw likes to melt cheese. In addition to the chicharrones, he has two other melted cheese dishes on his menu: "queso fundido," a mixture of Monterey Jack and Muenster that he puts under a broiler until it's gooey and caramelized, then serves with warm tortillas; and "queso panela," a seared rectangle of panela, a Mexican cow's milk cheese, that comes topped with spoonfuls of nopales salad and salsa verde.)

In Italy, similar dishes of fried cheese are called "frico." The rustic treats are a specialty of Friuli, in northeastern Italy, and are made traditionally with grated Montasio, a cow's milk cheese. When made with Parmigiano-Reggiano, which is more readily available in the United States than Montasio, frico is nutty and cracker-like, with a satisfying saltiness that makes them terrific nosh food.

Eat them out of hand like chips (watch out, they're seriously addictive) or use them as an element in a dish. Top a fennel-apple slaw with a pretty frico, the salt and crunch of the cheese a perfect contrast with the pale, cool reprieve of the salad. Break up a frico and use it like croutons, or place a delicate disk beside a bowl of soup.

With some cheeses, you don't even need to find your grater. Hard, salty cheeses such as halloumi, kasseri and some types of feta are perfect for grilling just the way they are. The interior of the cheese softens while the outside caramelizes, and after a few minutes you'll have a terrific snack.

Claudia Roden, in her updated classic "The New Book of Middle Eastern Food," writes of how fried cheese is a common street food, served in Cairo, Egypt, cafes in hot pans straight from the fire, with a bit of bread and a squeeze of lemon.

Try tossing other things into the skillet along with the cheese, like the sliced pears and spiced dates in Ana Sortun's recipe, from her cookbook "Spice: Flavors of the Eastern Mediterranean." Sortun uses halloumi, a terrific "grilling cheese" that's mild and salty at once.

Cooking cheese is a very simple procedure, but there are a few important tips, the most important of which is what kind of pan to use. Nonstick pans work the best. The cheese won't stick to the skillet, and you won't have to use any extra oil or coat the cheese with flour, as some recipes call for. Just be sure to use a wooden or plastic spatula to lift or turn the cheese, because you don't want to scratch the pan's coating.

History lesson on savory chocolates

like an English creamware chocolate stand and a copper chocolate pot with an original, wooden chocolate mill. The exhibition will continue through August.

Deerfield experts will demonstrate how the colonialists created those wares. In colonial Deerfield, chocolate was an expensive delicacy purchased from importers in Boston. It was so revered, colonists crafted silver pots exclusively for chocolate. At Saturday's celebration, silversmith Steve Smithers will demonstrate the creation of those pots.

Also returning this year will be Susan McLellan Plaisted who will present a traditional open-hearth cacao roasting. Plaisted, director of foodways at Pennsbury Manor, roasted the cacao nibs over an open hearth – a process that takes two hours to complete.

American Heritage chocolate is produced by Mars, Inc. the snackfood company responsible for M&Ms, Snickers and Twix. The American Heritage line is a recipe from the time of the Revolutionary War – a recreation of early American chocolate, according to their website.

*The American Heritage Chocolate Celebration will be held from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Saturday, Feb. 14. Tickets are $14 for adults, $5 for youth ages 6-11 and under 6 are free. Chocolate entrees, desserts and drinks in the Tavern will be served from 11:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. Food tickets are additional and cash only. GRILLE from page 5 served with a homemade ketchup and garlic aïoli. They are a perfect choice for snacking at any time.

With so many good things to say about Sierra Grille, is it possible that there is still something else to praise them for? Yes.

They have a late night bar menu full of small items and amazing Panini sandwiches (the Duck Confit Panini is a can't-miss) that are available until midnight.

I'm not just talking about bar food here, but real food – perfectly crafted and rife with creativity.

Sierra Grille is also vegetarian-friendly, with a separate grill used for all the vegetarian food items.

The atmosphere in Sierra Grille is laid-back and inviting. There are no televisions and the music is kept low enough to be able to enjoy conversation.

It is a perfect environment to sit and relax with friends, and Ford agrees. "One of the things that makes this place pleasant and inviting is that it's one of the very few bars without a television in it, so its much more based on … conversation and interaction between people that know each other and between people that are just meeting for the first time."

Of course it isn't always quiet and serene – the Sierra Grille is a great venue for live music. They host rock bands every Thursday at 10 p.m. and live jazz every Monday at 9 p.m.

The Sierra Grille is located at 41 Strong Avenue in Northampton. For reservations call (413) 584-1150. More information can be found at the restaurant's website www.sierragrille.net.

Appetizing hors d'oeuvres

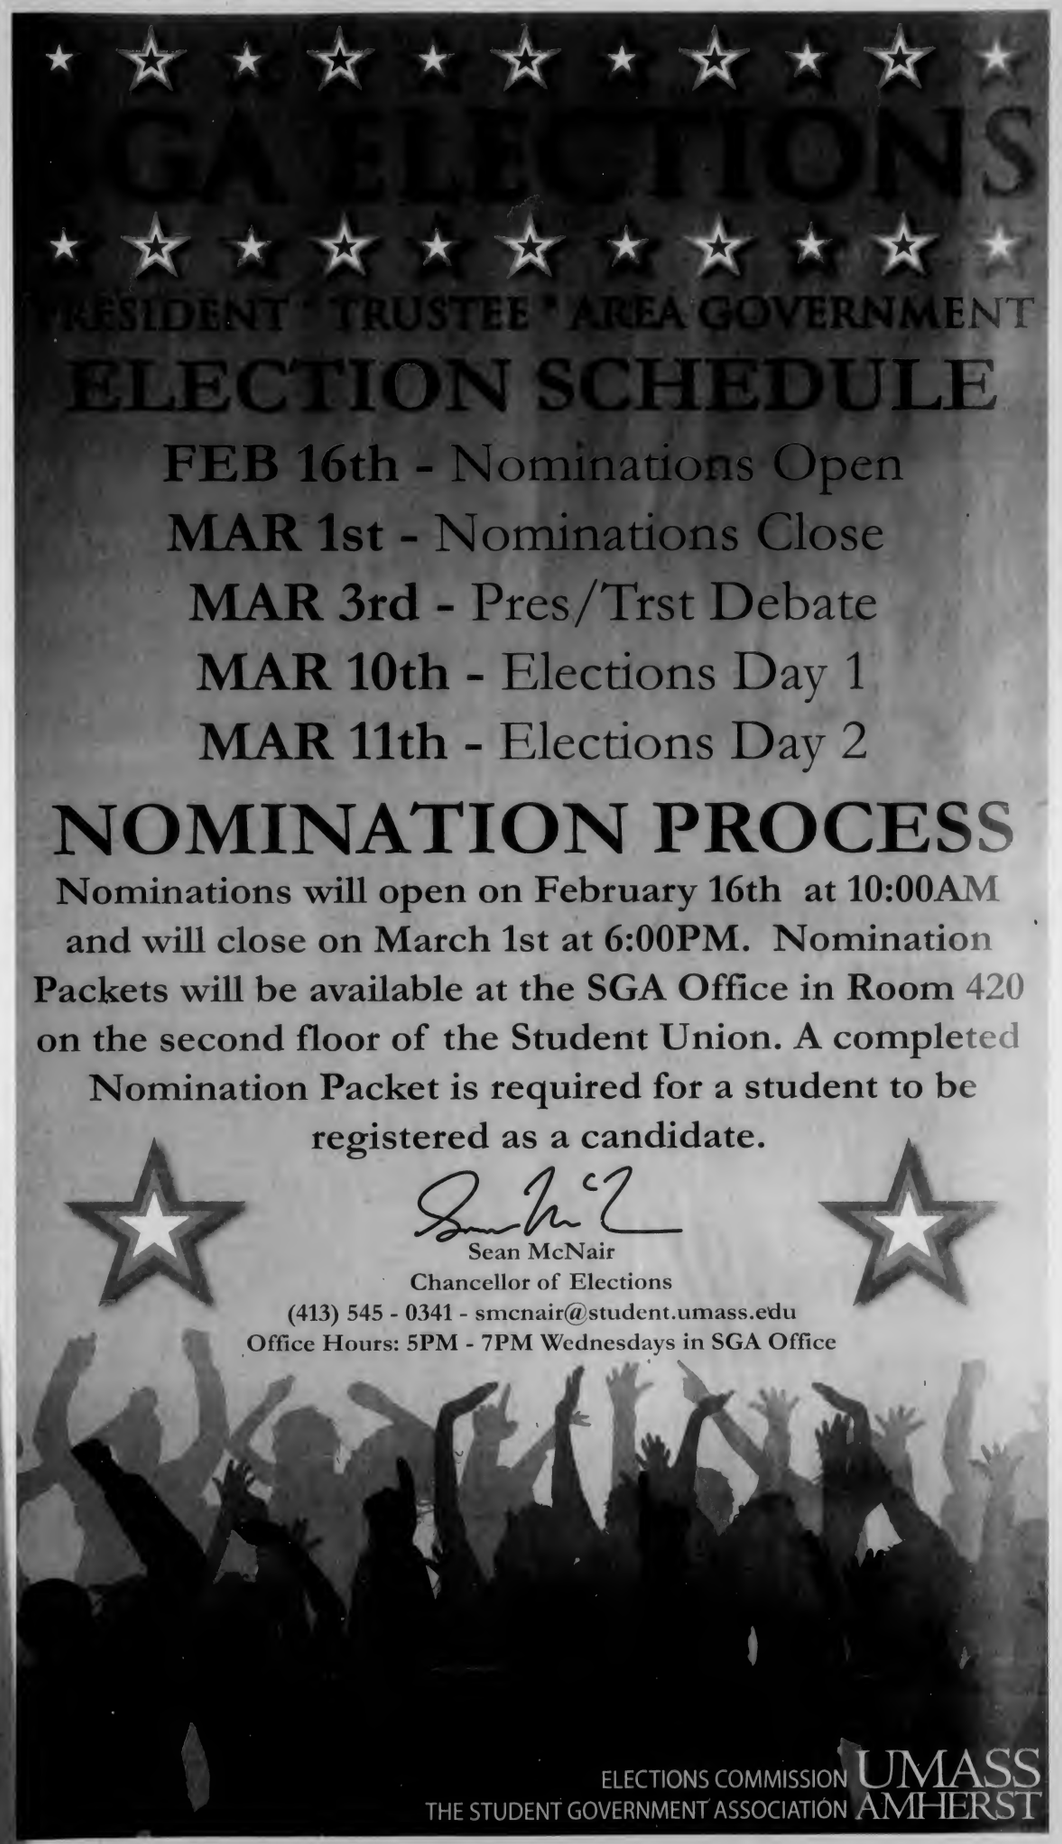
For the chicharrones, simply sprinkle the Monterey Jack onto the pan and cook over medium-low heat for about 7 to 8 minutes, spreading the cheese thinly across the pan as it melts. You don't even have to turn the cheese over – it will crisp, from the bottom up, into a lovely, golden disk. (Shaw sprinkles a bit of minced cilantro and cumin over the top at this point.) When the cheese is cooked, use a paper towel to blot up the oil it's released and then lift the cheese out of the pan with a spatula and make a free-form shape. Use a spatula or your fingers or – the cheese will be pretty hot – just drape the cheese over a rolling pin. You don't have to shape the cheese, of course, but it's fun and looks impressive.

You can make frico in a pan too, but getting them as thin as you want them is far more easily accomplished in the oven. Spread mounds of about 1 tablespoons each of finely grated Parmesan into circles on a lightly greased sheet of parchment. After about 8 minutes in a hot oven, they'll be done. Carefully lift the warm frico from the parchment and cool on a rack. The beautiful golden disks are delicate, but they're not as fragile as they look, and you can store them at room temperature in an airtight container for about a week.

Cooking halloumi is just as easy: brown slices of the cheese in a non-stick pan, turn them over and brown the other side. If you want a simple snack, just stop there and serve the cheese with some toasted bread and a squeeze of lemon. Sortun goes a step further, finishing off the halloumi in the oven with caramelized pears and spiced dates quickly cooked in a separate pan. After a few minutes in the oven to blend the flavors and further soften the cheese, take the pan out of the oven, pour in a little ouzo (an anise-flavored Greek liqueur) and set it aflame. (This is a really fun party trick, but be careful when you light this, or anything else, on fire in the kitchen.) The brief flambe burns off the alcohol, adds a glorious sweet note that complements the salt of the cheese, and gives one last bit of caramelization to the dish.

Of course, you can still sneak the extra toasted cheese from your grilled cheese sandwiches – but once you get the hang of cooking cheese on its own, you might not need to.



Throughout the world melted and fried cheeses are a popular food, making delicious snacks and meals in nearly every culture.

Minutemen falter late

The Minutemen have now lost nine games by eight points or less this season. But St. Joe's coach Phil Martelli had words of encouragement for UMass' first-year coach.

"I think Derek Kellogg is the right guy here," Martelli said. "I am amazed at how calm he is for a young, head coach. I know what this means and what it means to the community. I think this league is a jumble, I think Xavier is the best team and I think [teams] two-through-12 [can beat each other] anytime, any day, anywhere. And UMass certainly fits right in that mix."

Without Gaffney from the 11:21-5:15 mark, the Hawks were able to get to the paint with greater efficiency. Nivins, who both coaches said should be the A-10 Player of the Year after the game, finished with 21 points and 12 rebounds—including the go-ahead basket.

Harris and Gurley each had 18 points as the only two Minutemen to score in double figures. Point guard Chris Lowe finished with seven points and nine assists, while Gaffney just missed a double-double with eight points and 13 rebounds. Along with Nivins, Tasheed Carr (14 points), Govens (11) and Idris Hilliard (nine) led the way offensively for the Hawks.

UMass began the game hot from the floor, hitting its first three 3-pointers to take a 15-9 lead four minutes into the contest. Despite only committing seven turnovers on the afternoon, the Minutemen struggled offensively for the rest of the game, missing a number of close-range shots in the second half.

"We've been doing a ton of individual work in practice and we've shot 700 layups over the last three weeks, there's no excuse for missing layups," Kellogg said.

UMass resumes action on Wednesday night for a road tilt against St. Bonaventure (12-10, 3-6 A-10) in Olean, N.Y.

Game notes

During halftime, as part of its 100-years of UMass basketball celebration, UMass honored the legends of the 1990s, including Dana Dingle, Will Herndon, Lari Ketner, Edgar Padilla, Tyrone Weeks and Mike Williams. Marcus Camby, Carmelo Travieso, Lou Roe and John Calipari could not attend the ceremony. Calipari's daughter, Erin Calipari, who played on the UMass women's team from 2005-07, was there in his place.

Friday's 2-0 loss to Boston College in Chestnut Hill.

UMass didn't get one shot off on either of its final two power plays (one in the second and third periods) and finished with five shots on the man-advantage. Lowell didn't fare any better, going 0-for-6 a man up.

"That was an important victory for us against a very, very good team," MacDonald said. "Any team that can put up six [goals] against [No. 3] Northeastern and beat [Boston University] when they were No. 1 in the country is a really good team."

But since a 6-4 win over No. 3 Northeastern on Jan. 30, Cahoon has seen his offense fail to support Dainton, who has only allowed five goals in the past three games – all losses.

"Most of our problems in my mind, in terms of the number of games we've found a way to lose because we couldn't generate offense, are a result of what's going on between our ears," Cahoon said. "That's what our biggest issue is right now."

Game notes

Lowell took the season-series with the Minutemen two games to one. The road team won all three games. UMass lost for the first time this season when Dainton made 30 at least 30 saves. They were 4-0. … UMass was out-shot in every period. … It was the second career goal for Saunders, who has played in only five games this season. He last played on Nov. 28 against St. Lawrence. … Chase Langeraap was also credited with an assist on the goal by Saunders. … UMass fell to 10-5-1 when scoring the game's first goal.

Dayton's late run dooms UM

bers, Wright was on the court for 30 minutes, as she avoided foul trouble.

"[The Flyers] were switching, so the middle was wide open and our kids were able to get [Wright] the ball," Dacko said. "The big thing about Teya was, we were able to keep her in the game. Normally, she's only been playing about 20 minutes because she's gotten into foul trouble. So she was able to stay in the game and that allowed us to keep her on the floor and she gave us quality minutes."

Early on, UMass was able to hang with Dayton and had a slim lead four minutes into the game. But with a fastbreak 3-pointer, UD's Patrice Lalor put Dayton ahead. After a 22-10 Flyer run the Minutewomen responded immediately with a 13-2 run, capped off by a Danella 3-pointer to bring UMass within one.

That one-point deficit was as close as UMass would get for the remainder of the game.

When the Minutewomen went to the locker room down by three, it seemed as though they had momentum on their side. But with a Justine Raterman, 3-pointer capping off 12-4 run to open up the second half, Dayton forced UMass into catch up mode, a position they have often found themselves throughout the season.

"We came out and really competed hard the first half in spite of the ball not dropping outside of [Gerardot] and Danella," Dacko said. "We still missed a lot of open looks. So, instead of going into the locker room up 11 or 12, we're down three.

"Shooting 34 percent didn't help our cause. But we ran the offense very well and there was just a lid on the basket," she said.

But in true Minutewomen fashion, the team kicked their offense into another gear with a 16-8 run that began with UMass rattling off seven unanswered points.

That rally, however, would be as close as the Minutewomen would get for the rest of the game as Dayton shattered any chance of a comeback by closing out the last 10 minutes of the game with a 25-6 run.

"We weren't defending, we were putting them to the foul line, we were missing shots and free throws. And that's what happened in a matter of seven minutes," Dacko said. "When you look at it, they made 11 free throws from the seven minute mark on and that can't happen."

Minutewomen still unbeaten

By Steven Levine
Collegian Staff

The UMass tennis team remains undefeated after a convincing 6-1 win over Atlantic 10 rival Fordham on Sunday. The indoor tennis courts at the Hay Road Tennis Club set the stage for a dominant Minutewomen performance. The only loss of the day came at the hands of Dominique Liguori, an A-10 stud as well as Fordham's No. 1 player. Candynce Boney, one of UMass' top players, played well throughout the match but eventually fell 7-6(2), 6-3.

UMass (3-0) began doubles play with the number two team of Laura Danza and Tanisha Hodgson. This duo was the first to finish, defeating FU's number two team 8-1. The number three team, comprised of Kaitlyn Carpenter and Magdalena Ploch, finished minutes later in another 8-1 fashion. Full attention then turned to the number one teams, where a more difficult battle was being fought. UMass' Candynce Boney and Maude Lecluyse came back from a 2-5 deficit to even the match at six all. UM went on to take the match in a tiebreaker, 9-8, (7-4).

Singles play also went easily for UMass. Every match aside from the number one match was won rather effortlessly for the Minutewomen. At number two singles, Ploch defeated Featherston 6-0,6-2. At number three, UMass' Carpenter beat Sarah , 6-1, 6-3 and Lecluyse blanked Boyle, 6-0, 6-0 in the number four singles.

Hodgson easily defeated Carrol, 6-1, 6-3 at number five, while Lauren MacKay cruised past Silva 6-0, 6-0. The Minutewomens only loss of the day came at the number one match, where Liguori came out victorious over Boney (UM), 7-6(2), (6-3).

Coach Judy Dixon realized that Boney had a hard assignment on Sunday.

"We know Fordham is very strong at the top. If [Liguori] is not the best in the conference, she's the second best," said Dixon. "So we knew Candynce was going to have some trouble today. Candynce played her pretty tough I thought. She played a very good match up until the tiebreak. I think we need to get her forehand right and her confidence up."

UMass has an even harder assignment this Friday, when they square up against Temple, last year's A-10 champions. Coach Dixon believes it will be the hardest match yet, but that Temple better come ready to play.

"Temple is extremely strong. I would think that they're the pick again this year. The thing about Temple is that sometimes they come to play and sometimes they come and they're not quite ready to put the work in. Last year we went down there, and one Temple player forfeited, one didn't feel like playing and we beat them."

"In terms of practice, we have to be more aggressive. I want us to be dictating play more. That's our style. We have big, strong players who hit the ball hard and I want us to be forcing the issue."

The undefeated Minutewomen certainly have depth, but they still have a lot more to prove as the schedule becomes more difficult. UMass' next challenge will be Tuesday at Boston University on carpeted courts.

UMass drops to 8th in HEA

Minutemen 0-for-10 on power plays in weekend losses

By Eli Rosenwalke
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon didn't like what he saw from his team Saturday night against UMass-Lowell, but it was what he didn't see that ultimately cost his Minutemen the game.

After a prolonged scrum in front of goaltender Paul Dainton and the UMass net, Lowell's Mark Roebothan who appeared to be the only player that realized the puck was still live broke the tie with what proved to be the game-winning goal in Lowell's 2-1 win over the Minutemen in front of 4,892 fans at the Mullins Center.

| UML | 2 |
| UMass | 1 |
| BC | 2 |

Cahoon, who saw his team drop to eighth place in the Hockey East standings with the loss, was upset with his team following the game.

"Well, there's not much to say we had a good first period. And then in the second period we were outcompeted, out-chanced, out-shot, took some bad penalties and made the game difficult for ourselves," Cahoon said.

"And then low and behold, we give up a goal in the first minute of a period again," he continued. "That in itself is bad, but we still had 19 minutes to play in a game, and the thing I question is the conviction of the guys on the bench."

After 14 minutes of missed opportunities for both teams in the first period, the Minutemen (11-14-3, 6-10-3 HEA) broke through and took the lead when Shawn Saunders scored on a one-timer from Michael Tecomte past Lowell goaltender Nevin Hamilton (27 saves) in the 15th minute.

But for just the second time this season in 12 games when leading after the first period, the Minutemen couldn't hold on for the victory.

Patrick Cey's goal in the 13th minute of the second period tied the game for Lowell (13-13, 10-9 HEA), setting the stage for the game-winning goal that surprised nearly everyone.

"Being vertically challenged, I usually see the back of my players' helmets," Lowell coach Blaise MacDonald joked after the game, admitting he didn't see what happened in front of the net on Roebothan's goal. "What I did see was the referee Jeff Bunyon in terrific position right behind the net – so I didn't see the puck, but I saw a lot of activity so that means the puck is still alive."

BRIAN MCCLELLAN

UMass forward Scott Crowder races away from a UMass-Lowell defender in Saturday's 2-1 loss at the Mullins Center.

Dainton (32 saves) was unable to cover up the puck and the UMass defenseman on the ice – John Weissbecker and Topher Bevis – couldn't clear it, as Roebothan snuck it past Dainton for the score.

"I didn't see it. [Bunyon] said the puck was free. I didn't question that, I mean that's his call, he's there," Cahoon said. "I gotta believe that the puck was free and the kid put it in – but it's up to our two senior defensemen to clean house in that area. They are big, strong kids; they gotta be knocking people on their duffers in that situation.

"If it's a penalty, it's a penalty. But they gotta be cleaning house, the guy doesn't get to tap it home."

In keeping with the game's first 41 minutes, the Minutemen didn't have a lot of good scoring opportunities in the final 19 minutes of the contest. UMass' best chance may have came with 1 minute, 56 seconds remaining when James Marcou appeared to have a clear lane to the Lowell net when he was leveled in the open ice to kill the chance.

The Minutemen, who are now 3-7 in games decided by one goal, went 0-for-5 on the power play for the second consecutive night. They also went scoreless on five man-advantages in

UM learns in exhibition win

By Melissa Turtinen

Exhibition games test a team's readiness for the upcoming season. And with one week of practice left before the season opener, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team knows what they need to do, but is still trying to figure out who they are.

After defeating Army, 13-11 in five quarters, during Saturday afternoon's final exhibition, the Minutemen learned a lot about the kind of team they have.

Army, the defending Patriot League champions, gave UMass a test. They had a strong, patient offense that challenged the Minutemen's mental toughness defensively.

"[We got] the opportunity to be in a tight game and sort of persevere," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "They scored a couple [goals], and for us to be able to come back and score a couple and battle it out was good. We played a tough team, they out-groundballed us, so that's certainly something we've got to improve on. For the most part it was a great run for our guys."

The UMass offense, which gave a strong showing scoring 13 goals from a variety of players, is still an unknown part of its game.

"I think we know where we're going defensively, I'm not sure we know where we're going on the attack side yet," Cannella said. "There are some guys that will continue to battle it out, maybe over the first few games, as well."

But the Minutemen got a consistent effort from some of their mainstays in the lineup. Midfielders Bobby Hayes and Rory Pedrick had a strong presence on the field, both tallying two goals against Army. Pedrick, coming off of ACL surgery, scored on his first two shots of the game – UMass' first two goals.

Senior attack Jim Connolly, who was recently reinstated to the Minutemen after a year-long suspension, tallied two goals for UMass, his first on an extra-man advantage in the second quarter.

"There's a bunch of guys that we expect to be consistent each time out there and they were," Cannella said. "We need to get [Tim Balise] going a little bit, he had a few opportunities he usually finishes. It's just a matter of everybody trying to be consistent and making things happen for the team."

The sloppiness on offense is something UMass will work on all season.

"We threw the ball away a couple times on offense, but Army had a lot to do with that. They pressed out on our guys, we didn't really get into an offensive flow," Cannella said. "It's going to be there and it's going to be there all season long, just hopefully we can minimize the sloppiness the best we can."

UMass went 17-for-27 on faceoffs, winning the majority of them in the second half of the game. The Minutemen were 15-for-19 on clears, and 1-for-3 on the man advantage.

In the last week of practice before UMass' home and season opener against Sacred Heart on Feb. 14, the Minutemen will work on tightening up their game. They hope to improve on clearing the ball and getting in the rhythm of preparing for another team and go through practice with that focus.

"To tighten things up skill wise, you have to get rid of that sloppiness the best you can," Cannella said.

Rallies not enough vs. Dayton

Gerardot, Danella combine for 37 points in losing effort

For the first 30 minutes of Saturday's matchup against Dayton, the Massachusetts women's basketball team took every punch its Atlantic 10 foe could muster and kept rallying back. But with nine minutes, 38 seconds remaining in the second half and a mere two-point deficit, the Minutewomen's inconsistencies caught up with them and were victimized by a 25-6 run en route to an 86-65 loss.

| Dayton | 86 |

Despite UMass (9-14, 2-6 A-10) battling back for much of the game, the Flyers (14-10, 3-5 A-10) were much more consistent, outshooting the Minutewomen 46 to 34.3 percent.

The first half was primarily dictated by the play of senior Stefanie Gerardot and freshman Kristina Danella, who combined for 27 of the team's 38 points. Danella had a monstrous first half, going 6-of-8 from the field, including 4-of-6 from behind the arc.

While UMass relied on their two primary threats in the first half, Dayton took the opposite approach. Although none of the Flyers recorded double digits, all nine players that entered the game scored, lead by De'Sarae Chambers with nine points.

Putting the ball in Danella's hands, though, is exactly what UMass coach Marnie Dacko wants from her offense.

"I want her to shoot every time she's open because her 3-point shot is right on the money every time," Dacko said. "She looked for her shot and that was the best game I've seen her play in a while."

Although the Minutewomen offense was sporadic for much of the game, Saturday marked one of the best performances of the season for sophomore Teya Wright. In addition to putting up solid num-

Minutewomen start season 4-1

Balschmiter wins 3 at FAU 'Kickoff' Classic

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team got off to its best since 1987 (5-0) with their performance this weekend at the Florida Atlantic University "Kickoff" Classic.

The No. 24 Minutewomen went 1-1 on the first day of the tournament, losing to their host, but went 3-0 on Saturday and Sunday, to start the season 4-1. The weekend was highlighted with UMass' shutout victory on Sunday over No. 5 Michigan.

UMass 1 – No. 5 Michigan 0

Michigan rattled off four victories in the first two days and had hopes of leaving Florida with an unblemished 5-0 record.

But after Carly Normandin doubled down the right field line to open the game and Whitney Mollica singled up the middle two batters later to score Normandin, the Minutewomen scored the only run they would need. The rest was on the arm of Brandice Balschmiter, who pitched seven shutout innings to seal the 1-0 victory for the Minutewomen.

"We struck early and held and held. We weathered some storms in that game," Sortino said.

Balschmiter would give up only six hits and one walk and only face one real challenge in the game. After the Wolverine's first two batters got out in the bottom of the first, Michigan's Angela Findlay singled, followed by another single by Amanda Chidester that advanced Findlay to third. Findlay was the only Wolverine to reach third on the day.

BRIAN FITZGERALD/COLLEGIAN

UMass' Sarah Reeves hit a two-RBI single in the first inning against Pittsburgh on Saturday that turned out to be the game winning hit. Reeves had two hits on the day as the Minutewomen defeated the Panthers 2-1.

and she got no further, as Balschmiter got out of the jam on her way to her third victory of the weekend.

UMass 2 – Pittsburgh 1

UMass closed out the second day of the FAU "Kickoff" Classic with a 2-1 victory over Pittsburgh, thanks to the bat of Sarah Reeves. Again the Minutewomen struck early, on a two RBI single by Reeves, and UMass' pitching staff took care of the rest.

Bailey Sanders responded after a poor outing the first night against Florida Atlantic with a complete game performance where she gave up just one run on four hits and struck out four.

UMass 8 – Long Island 0

The Minutewomen exploded offensively in the opening game of the second day of the tournament to an 8-0 rout over Long Island. Every starting Minutewomen, besides Kyllie Magill, had at least one hit, with Michelle Libby leading the charge with three hits and two RBIs. Mollica also contributed with another three hits.

Balschmiter pitched another great game, her first of two shutouts on the weekend, giving up only four hits and striking out six. Sortino was impressed with the shutout because of the strength of LIU's line up.

"We just took it to [FIU] offensively and we shut them out," Sortino said. "I think that is saying something because they have six lefties in their line up that are nice hitters."

Florida Atlantic 6 – UMass 1

The only loss on the weekend for the Minutewomen came against the host of the tournament, Florida Atlantic, in its season opener.

After Sanders gave up a run in the top of the first, the Minutewomen responded with the tying run in the bottom of the second, but could not muster another score the rest of the game. Sanders would go on to give up six runs on 10 hits and three walks en route to the Minutewomen's first loss of the year.

UMass 8 – Maryland 3

It was not the opening the Minutewomen had envisioned but it was the right result, as UMass won its first game of the year despite having what Sortino called an off day.

"Everything was off," Sortino said. "In the opening day win against Maryland, it was just a spooky crazy first couple of pitches. Brandice was tripping over the mound and walking the first three batters."

Despite giving up three runs in the first two innings, Balschmiter settled down on her way to her first victory of the year. She got help from her offense too, as they broke open a 2-2 game in the second inning.

Jessica Serio led off the inning with a solo home run, and after Davina Hernandez grounded to third, Maryland's Kendra Knight walked three straight batters before Whitney Mollica hit a grand slam to make it a 7-2 game.

'Obama Effect' tested

By Claire Bronchuk
Collegian Staff

The recent election of President Barack Obama, the United States' first black president, may have an effect on the testing gap between black and white Americans, producing what researchers call the "Obama Effect."

Obama now takes his place in history not only as the country's 44th president but as a national role model for oppressed African-Americans. Some researchers are speculating that Obama's victory may have a direct effect on the confidence of African-Americans in specific areas, like education.

Last year, professors Sie Jin Ko from Northwestern University and David Marx of San Diego State University conducted an experiment to see if there was a connection between Obama's success in the political realm and the success of African-American test-takers.

Ko and Marx tested 84 black Americans and 388 white Americans four times during 2008. They chose their testing dates carefully: one week before the Democratic National Convention and one day after the convention, and one month before the national election and one day after it.

The test was composed of 20 questions. The scores from the two non-salient dates, before the convention and before the election, showed significant underperformance by the 84 black test-takers.

This kind of testing gap is similar to that typically found in SAT scores and MCAS testing.

President Barack Obama stands with his wife First Lady Michelle Obama at a press conference. Several researchers are testing whether the election of Obama has given African-Americans increased confidence.

The revealing part of the study came from the test administered immediately following the convention and the election. Test results for those days showed no discrepancy across race – the testing gap was completely eliminated.

Testing-gaps between white and black test-takers are typically attributed to internalized self-doubt due to stereotypes. It is known that black test-takers statistically perform poorly on standardized tests when compared to white test-takers.

In the press release, Marx explained that black test-takers may "feel that if they don't do well, they will perpetuate the negative stereotype and

Holub meets with senate

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert Holub addressed a crowd of approximately 100 faculty members Monday afternoon amid growing campus concern over the impending budget crisis and a proposed restructuring plan of the University's academic colleges.

With the recent announcement of a detailed reorganization and the establishment of a Task Force on Reorganization, Holub offered little new information at the general faculty meeting in the Student Union ballroom.

However, the chancellor again asked for the faculty's cooperation, terming his restructuring proposal as a "shift in priorities to support faculty and students."

He also reaffirmed his personal and professional commitment to the campus, in addition to reminding the audience that each decision he makes will be "what I believe to be in the best interest for the campus as a whole."

Despite the establishment of several task forces and calls from the faculty for transparency, some members of the UMass community remained unconvinced of Holub's effort to engage the faculty's opinion.

"The reservations of the faculty have been clearly expressed," said assistant biology professor Steven Brewer.

"We need to know what the goals of the reorganization are before we can determine the plan. The chancellor is pursuing faculty input as more of a rubber stamp rather than as a part of the development process."

Others expressed concern over the danger of a college restructure being precipitated by a budget crisis, and not solely by consideration of a long-term strategic plan.

Yet some were vocal in their support of Holub's plan, as chemical engineering professor William Conner described the reorganization as "greatly welcomed" and framed the potential annual savings as 20 faculty positions.

Holub did not present a detailed analysis of how any potential cost reductions would be realized, nor did he allude to the nature of any one-time expenses associated with restructuring.

However, his continued rhetoric indicates that much of the cost savings would be derived from the elimination of multiple upper-level management positions, including several academic deans.

In an e-mail to the University community last week, Holub estimated the annual savings to be between $1.3 and $1.5 million.

The faculty formally issued several motions to persuade the chancellor to be transparent and upfront with campus community in the coming months.

It also passed a resolution that the "Task Force on Reorganization shall be free to consider alternate reorganization plans, including no reorganization at all."

Another motion advised that each task force should be permitted enough time to develop a thorough and complete final report.

Newly enforced rules for 'Meter-feeders'

By Josh Walovitch
Collegian Staff

Beginning in March, Amherst will issue $10 tickets to vehicle owners that ignore the permitted two- and three-hour parking limits.

Additionally, the Public Transportation and Bicycle Committee propose a fee increase for on-street meters and a decerease for parking lot fees.

These new rules would be part of an effort to stop "meter-feeders" and provide an increase in parking turnover for customers.

Meter-feeding is the act of remaining in a spot longer than the permitted time by continuously feeding the meter when time runs out, which causes problems with parking turnover.

The town is using February to inform the community about the ticketing that will begin in March.

"I think people who work downtown should make arrangements to park off-street or in long-term parking lots because meter-feeding keeps casual shoppers away," said Belchertown resident B.S. Walker. "They are really spiting themselves by meter-feeding because in the processes they are denying potential customers."

Long-term parking is available behind the CVS Pharmacy on North Pleasant Street and in the Boltwood parking garage.

Alternative methods of getting around town include the ride sharing website ridebuzz.org and the PVTA bus systems.

"We're taking a bylaw that has been softly enforced, that will now be more strictly enforced," Town Manager Laurence R. Shaffer told the Select Board on Monday.

Food for Thought Books employee Erika Arthur doesn't find the parking situation or meter-feeders in downtown Amherst a problem. He suggests, however, that Amherst consider the elimination of all meters and cars in Amherst Center.

Amherst resident Adam Martinez agrees with Arthur and doesn't see a problem with meter-feeding or the current Amherst Center parking situation.

"I think if there was good investment in public transportation that it could make a lot more sense to not have cars in Amherst, and I love the idea," Martinez said.

Cars park in Amherst Center. Starting in March, violators of time limitations will be fined.

A car-free zone in Amherst Center would mean the community would rely mainly on public transportation, walking or biking to get around. A car-free zone could result in a reduction in greenhouse emissions, automobile accidents, traffic congestion and noise pollution.

Burlington, Vt., has a car-free zone with a pedestrianized main downtown shopping street that consists of four car-free blocks.

Burlington and Amherst are similar in regards to population as well, with both having around 35,000 residents.

"I think Amherst could do it [a car-free zone] since so many people walk and ride bikes as it is, and the PVTA is such a comprehensive bus system," said Rachael Falk, a sophomore psychology major at the University of Massachusetts.

Economic stimulus gives hope

Students wary, yet supportive

By Eric Tripoli
Collegian Staff

The extent of the economic crisis in the United States is unknown, yet its effects now appear to be broadening in size and scope, as a variety of other circumstances have come to light, despite the continued weakening of the system.

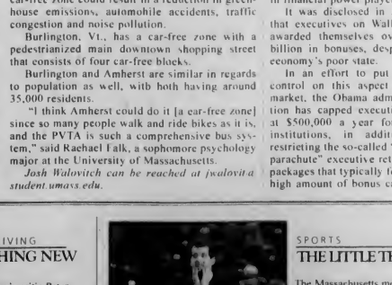
Bernard Madoff, an investor, was arrested shortly before Christmas this year for engineering and operating an epic Ponzi scheme – a fraudulent investment operation in which initial investors are paid with their own money or money from subsequent investors – that is estimated to have robbed victims of at least $50 billion.

"Madoff is clear evidence that markets need to be regulated to prevent outright fraud," said James Moore, a junior physics major at the University of Massachusetts.

From celebrities to charities, the fallout is continuing to empty investors' wallets as well as drain the public's faith in financial power players.

It was disclosed in January that executives on Wall Street awarded themselves over $18 billion in bonuses, despite the economy's poor state.

In an effort to put tighter control on this aspect of the market, the Obama administration has capped executive pay at $500,000 a year for many institutions, in addition to restricting the so-called "golden parachute" executive retirement packages that typically feature a high amount of bonus cash and stock options.



"The current crisis shows that the markets need to be guided or else they tend to be manic depressive," added Moore.

With unemployment soaring to 7.6 percent, much of the nation's hope rides on the new stimulus plan. As it stands, the cost is settling around $827 billion.

This money will be spread out over multiple areas and industries, from health care to education to improving the country's infrastructure by building roads, constructing bridges and creating more jobs.

The plan also contains massive tax breaks and credits across the board, totaling around $140 billion. This includes a $500

"Yes, online voting will get more votes because no one wants to go to where the polling place is. People don't even know where the place is usually or that there is even an election going on. OBAMA EFFECT from page 1 in turn, this worry makes them do worse."

The possible presence of the "Obama Effect" may also be found in areas outside of education. According the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the number of employed African-American teenagers has increased from 464,000 in November 2008, the month of the national election, to 502,000 in January 2009.

There is speculation that the "Obama Effect" could have encouraged more African-American teenagers to seek employment and could have decreased job discrimination against young blacks since Obama's election.

When asked about the "Obama Effect," students at the University of Massachusetts had differing opinions. Winnie Phung, a freshman business major, felt it could be possible.

When asked about the relationship between Obama's election and the test-takers' performances she said, "Obama's election may have something to do with it, with him as a role model."

The study raises some questions about the effects of role models on large groups of individuals. Jessica Ryter, a UMass freshman majoring in Social Thought and Political Economy had positive feelings about Obama's effect as a role model.

"It's a good thing that the black-white test score gap is shrinking, regardless of the cause. I could potentially see how Obama's success could have a positive impact on African-American test-takers," she said.

Freshman anthropology major Amanda Otto was cautious about the results of the study.

"It's a good thing, but it's still not addressing the institutional racism, the kind of racism built into the education and political system," she said.

Otto's comment is a reminder that a closing of the testing gap has yet to be proven on national, standardized exams.

Although the "Obama Effect" is easy to speculate on, it will take several months before precise data is available in larger quantities.

Website for road trips

By Ruth Kinney
Vanderbilt Hustler

A website designed by students at the Owen Graduate School of Vanderbilt University hopes to help students plan spring break and other road trips.

According to the graduate students who created it, My College Road Trip offers a unique perspective because college students write the material with other college students in mind.

"The best thing is that it narrows down the mass amount of information about cities or things to do in a particular destination to the things that college students care the most about," said Virginia Francis, Owen graduate student and vice president of brand management at MCRT.

Andrew Bouldin, founder and CEO of MCRT, said he came up with the idea of the Web site while he was driving home from a weekend road trip.

"I realized that there was no way to find out the coolest things for college students to do around my college on any given weekend," Bouldin said.

Once he got home, he said he began to search the Internet for quality travel information aimed at college students and could find nothing. All information on potential vacation destinations was written by parents and businessmen, he said. Bouldin found a group of fellow students who shared his irritation and MCRT was born.

Many Vanderbilt students contribute to the running of this online business. Involved are not only the Owen graduate students who launched the website, but also undergraduate students in Associate Professor of Managerial Studies Cherrie Clark's Advanced Marketing class.

"They are implementing a viral marketing project to promote the site," Francis said. "They are using online tools such as Facebook and blogs to promote the site to college students around the country."

Owen graduate students involved in the project will be able to use their experience in forming an online business toward their business degrees. This spring the students will all be doing independent study for the business so they can receive school credit for the work they put in.

MCRT is just one of the many businesses founded by Owen students while they are still enrolled in graduate school.

"The culture of the program at Owen is just wonderful," said Jim Bradford, dean of the Owen Graduate School of Management. "So many students run their own businesses while here at Owen. Just yesterday, I went to the screening of one of our student's films, which will premiere in New York in the next few weeks."

Bradford credits Owen's significant jump in the Financial Times' Business School rankings to the students' eagerness to start their own businesses.

The Owen Graduate School of Management jumped 20 places in the world rankings of the Financial Times and is now ranked the 56th best business school in the world.

It also jumped 15 spots in the U.S. business school rankings of the Financial Times' and is now ranked the 28th-best business school in the U.S.

But is it enough?

"I think the money has been going to all the wrong places. But I'm glad to see that they're putting more money into education," said David Urbanowski, a UMass junior majoring in biology.

This plan has received the most publicity in recent weeks and some are wondering if it will suffice and what the other options are, if any.

"As far as the $827 billion is concerned, yes, there should be other options. Creating new jobs is a big one, but also, keeping money in the country is important," said Rachel Schein, a UMass senior and psychology major.

In an unexpected move, President Barack Obama, realizing that this is a tough sell to the Congress and the American citizens, has recently left Washington in order to campaign in Indiana and Florida for his plan and bring it before the public in person.

UM student charged, held

Marcus Smith was arrested and charged with assault and battery.

A University of Massachusetts student allegedly stabbed an Amherst College student several times in the back and chest in an Amherst College dormitory early Sunday.

Marcus Smith, 21, of 5 Codman Park, Apt. 3, Roxbury, was arrested and charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (a knife), according to the Amherst Police Department.

The 20-year-old male victim was allegedly stabbed by Smith at Crossett.

Dormitory and police said they were notified at 1:04 a.m. Sunday.

The victim's name is not being released by police at this time, but officials said he was transported by ambulance to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield where he was listed as in fair condition and expected to survive.

Smith, a sociology major, was brought to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton where he was treated for a hand injury and released into police custody, officials said.

Smith is expected to be arraigned in the Eastern Hampshire District Court on Monday.

Since the alleged stabbing, he was being held at the Hampshire County House of Correction in lieu of $25,000 cash bail.

Intro to 'Love 101'

The 'Love 101' panel plans to focus its discussion on being in love while still remaining independent, and is sponsored by such organizations as Everywoman's Center and the Women of Color Leadership Network.

Some feel as though they can't have it all – the ability to follow their dreams, go out with others, or even take a vacation – especially while in a relationship.

Organizations at the University of Massachusetts hope to address these concerns Tuesday night in a seminar titled "Where's Love 101: Intimacy and Independence." Sponsored by the Everywoman's Center, University Health Services, the Women of Color Leadership Network and Student Legal Services, the event is the campus' third annual.

Especially in the realm of college, during key transitions in life, students may feel like they can't do everything – like be both independent and in love.

But the seminar hopes to show that many couples do face these kinds of issues, and sometimes, couples are able to work them out.

While last year's event addressed issues of conflict, this year's seminar will focus on balancing being in love and being independent.

In addition, the panel will include a diverse group of couples – one that has been together for two years, one for 20 years, as well as heterosexual and homosexual couples and racially diverse partners.

This year's event will include a number of topics many couples face in dealing with intimacy and independence.

Negotiating healthy balances, maintaining close and independent friendships, traveling and taking a vacation with your partner and developing mutual interests are just some of the subjects the panelists will discuss.

"Where's Love 101: Intimacy and Independence" will be held at 7 p.m. today in Campus Center room 904-906. The event is free and open to the public.

Obama travels U.S. to push stimulus

By Steven Thomma
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON – President Barack Obama traveled to the nation's heartland Monday, visiting a town with double-digit unemployment to put a human face on his urgent plea for more than $800 billion in new spending and tax cuts to jump-start the economy.

"We've had a good debate," he said in a town hall meeting in Elkhart, Ind. "Now it's time to act. That's why I am calling on Congress to pass this bill immediately. Folks here in Elkhart and across America need help right now, and they can't afford to keep on waiting for folks in Washington to get this done."

The trip to Elkhart, a blue-collar town of 53,000 that builds RVs and has seen its unemployment rate triple from 4.7 percent to more than 15 percent, was the first of Obama's several campaign-style stops this week meant to build grassroots pressure on the Congress to pass the proposed stimulus bill.

Obama will follow with his first prime-time news conference at 8 p.m. EST Monday, a town hall meeting Tuesday in Florida, and a visit to a heavy equipment plant Thursday in Illinois.

With more than 8,000 jobs lost in Elkhart alone, Obama worked to show that the suffering in the country is deeply personal and to explain how his proposed package would help people.

"We're talking about people who've lost their livelihood and don't know what will take its place," he said. "We're talking about parents who've lost their health care and lie awake nights praying the kids don't get sick. We're talking about families who've lost the home that was their foundation for their American dream, young people who put that college acceptance letter back in the envelope because they just can't afford it."

"That's what those numbers and statistics mean. That is the true measure of this economic crisis. Those are the stories I heard when I came here to Elkhart six months ago and that I have carried with me every day since."

Working to counter complaints that the proposal is filled with wasteful pork barrel spending, Obama outlined specifics on how they would help people in Indiana alone:

– An extra $100 a month in unemployment benefits for more than 450,000 Indiana workers.

– Extended unemployment benefits for another 89,000 who can't find jobs.

– Job training assistance for another 51,000.

– Tax cuts and credits of $500 per person or $1,000 per family for nearly 2.5 million people in the state.

– A $2,500 per student tax credit to help 76,000 families send their children to college.

– Spending on road projects, energy conservation and other programs to save or create nearly 80,000 jobs.

Mindful of the old adage that "all politics is local," Obama broke down the proposed infrastructure spending even farther. He suggested to applause that the bill would help "roads like U.S. 31 here in Indiana that Hoosiers count on," referring to the highway that links Indianapolis to South Bend, and said that "a new overpass downtown would make a big difference for businesses and families right here in Elkhart."

He put himself on the side of ordinary Americans, as though he, too, were watching with frustration at the political machinations in Washington, but still confident that something must be done.

"I'm not going to tell you that this bill is perfect. It's coming out of Washington, going through Congress," he said. "But it is the right size, the right scope ... it has the right priorities to create jobs that will jumpstart our economy and transform it for the 21st century."

A trendy, ugly plague

Leigh Greaney

Certain phenomena in this world are unable to be explained. On this campus, there is a phenomenon that is as unexplained as it is disturbing.

On my short walk from the library to the campus center, I saw 16 cases of it.

There is an illness at the University of Massachusetts and it runs rampant – seeming to affect only the ladies of campus. The method of determining whether or not a woman has caught this toxic plague is very simple – just look at her feet.

If the woman in question is wearing an over-priced slab of sheepskin as a boundary between her and the ground, then hope is lost. She's been infected.

Pop culture has slithered its way into her consciousness and convinced her to run with a pack of wolves known as UGG Australia. These wolves murder flocks of sheep on a daily basis.

Unlike the natural wolf that kills its woolen prey to survive, UGG Australia slaughters sheep to get rich off of selling footwear to easy-to-convince, middle to upper class, mainstream girls. These sheep from the Outback are killed by a method called "mulesing."

Basically, chunks of their flesh and their oh-so-desired skin are cut from their backside. No painkillers are used at all. They feel everything. People for Ethical Treatment of Animals would be displeased and reaching for buckets of red paint, to say the least.

Every year, millions and millions of carcasses are exported out of Australia. UGG sends theirs straight to China, where the boots are made. Apparently, UGG Australia boots are as authentic as those who wear them.

It's unfortunate that so many UMass girls fall into the advertising traps that they do. What ever happened to buying and wearing something because you like it? Shouldn't your clothing reflect something about yourself? Wearing UGG boots is the equivalent of saying, "I'm just like everybody else."

They look as generic as a boot can get – plain, grandmother-esque, round-tipped, and boring. The only noticeable difference is whether the girl wearing the boots decided to roll them down – exposing a white tuft of wool – or not. Calling them "cute" is laughable. There's nothing cute about an oversized boot that looks like it's meant for the moon.

The only thing more abominable than their price is their smell. The boot was invented by an Australian surfer who was hellbent on keeping his feet warm – his bare feet, that is. The boots are meant to be worn without socks, which translates to: these boots emanate ungodly odor.

There might not be anything worse than being in your last class of the day and sitting next to a girl wearing UGGs. If the stench of a hard day's work isn't enough, you're forced to sit through an hour of wool-strangled feet that make a diabetic foot smell floral.

Still, the stench is not as foul as the price tag. The price of the most generic looking boot, also known as "The Women's Classic Tall," costs $180.

Ironically, the boots that have a little more personality – maybe adding a button or two, a design, or different texture – are less expensive and go for $120.

What is that telling its customers? The less pizzazz, the more you pay – meaning the more uniform you are, the more chic you are?

Where is the diversity in that? Where is the excitement? There is none.

The UGG disease not only affects the unattractive appearance of a woman's feet but it infiltrates their mind, telling them that looking like a carbon-copy of the woman next to them is "fashionable."

I can see what the future will bring if a cure to this awful disease is ever discovered. The UGG boot wearer, now in recovery, is sitting in her living room with her daughter flipping through old photo albums, most likely Facebook albums. The daughter sees a picture of her mother at a party in Puffton Village sipping on a Smirinoff Ice.

Instead of laughing at her mother's embarrassing choice of alcohol, she starts laughing at her mother's feet. "Oh my god, eww! You wore those heinous things!" Turning red, the rehabilitated mother responds, "They were in."

So why not avoid an embarrassing encounter with your offspring?

Why not be original? Then that way, you can at least be a little more avant-garde with your justification for your fashion choice. Oddly enough, people notice you more when you go against the grain in the field of fashion.

Pop culture has slithered its way into her consciousness and convinced her to run with a pack of wolves known as UGG Australia.

No one is going to say, "Oh my god, where did you get those boots" when "UGG" is stamped across the back of your heel and the back of the heels of every girl walking past you. If you're paying $180 to be fashionable, wouldn't you want at least a little recognition for your hard-earned cash? It's not like you bought them because you "liked" them, personally.

If it's about being warm, buy a knockoff for a fraction of the price. If it's about the brand name, don't you think it's ironic that it's called UGG? Even the manufacturers know they're ugly.

The only way to remedy this UMass disease is to shed the idea that looking like everyone else is "cool." It's not. Be original. Wear what you like. Don't let the media decide what looks good on you.

Chances are that once that sinks in – UGG boots will be a thing of the past, along with jellies (unfortunately) and light up sneakers (even more unfortunate). So stop running with the UGG wolf pack. Maybe you'll even save a few sheep.

Capitalism for the sovereign

Greg Collins

The current recession highlights one of the common paradigms of economic thinking nowadays – a discipline known as "behavioral economics" – which goes like this: Capitalism assumes that people are rational actors. Capitalism assumes that people will objectively calculate cost-benefit transactions and that they will make the decision that optimizes the material benefits of such transactions.

Therefore, because behavioral economists claim that this is nonsense – no one behaves rationally all the time – government intervention is needed to correct irrational behavior, as evidenced today by the proposed stimulus bill.

Let's get the first misconception out of the way.

Capitalism, insofar as it "assumes" anything, does not operate under the assumption that people will always make rational decisions all of the time. The simple reality is that sometimes people act rationally and other times they don't.

Buying a pizza late on a Saturday – when you could just as easily wait to eat breakfast the next morning – would not be in your economic interest given the financial constraints of college students. Reading this column right now, instead of making money at a campus job, would not be in your economic interest.

But how do we really know what is in our rational, economic interest?

The Austrian economist Ludwig von Mises anticipated this question 50 years before behavioral economics became fashionable. He pointed out that it is nearly impossible to objectively define rational interest based on the innumerable preferences and particular circumstances of countless individuals.

If you recall, President Barack Obama showed this presumption of what I call a "rationality superiority complex" during his presidential campaign. He suggested that working-class people clung to their religion because of the stagnant economy.

Obama was implicitly suggesting that people that do not make as much money as he does were making the irrational decision to place more emphasis on their faith during hard times. Under similar reasoning, a poor churchgoer could say, "Obama clings to his money and graduate degrees."

The point is that if the merits of capitalism were based primarily on the assumption that people, more often than government, make rational decisions – however you define it – then this would justify capitalism in and of itself.

Is it rational to donate a huge portion of your money to charity when you could have acted in your self-interest by keeping the money? Is it irrational to work a blue-collar job and spend time with your family instead of working a white-collar job that pays more but may prevent you from being with the ones you love?

If it so difficult to determine our own rational interest by ourselves, then how much more difficult would it be for a government official – with hardly any knowledge of our lives, habits, customs, circumstances and fortunes – to define rational interest for ourselves?

The point is that if the merits of capitalism were based primarily on the assumption that people, more often than government, make rational decisions – however you define it – then this would justify capitalism in and of itself.

The stark contrast between the history of success of free markets – from the Industrial Revolution to today – and the failures of government programs from ancient times to today, demonstrates this clearly.

But capitalism is something more than a way to maximize the interests of rational actors. When Abraham Lincoln was arguing against slavery during the Lincoln-Douglas debates in 1858, he did not say slavery was wrong because it prevented blacks from calculating cost-benefit analyses in order to maximize their material well-being through rational inquiry and dispassionate logic.

That is, he did not argue for slaves to be freed under the Lockean, Jeffersonian reasoning that – "It's my life." This is the assumption of maximization of self-interest that critics of capitalism frequently complain about, and which Lincoln categorically rejected. He argued against slavery without thinking about whether people were or were not "rational actors."

Instead, Lincoln argued, "It's other people's lives." We have no right to restrict someone else's freedom, through violence, taxes or other forms of coercion, if we ourselves would not want to be subject to such coercion.

We should not take money from people without their consent if we ourselves would not want someone to take our money without our consent.

Lincoln argued against slavery because it was plain wrong to deny anyone freedoms we would not want denied to ourselves. This is because, in essence, we are all sovereign beings and we should not impinge on someone else's individual sovereignty.

Let it be made clear: instead of encouraging sellishness based on people's material interests, this thinking promotes selflessness based on people's moral senses of right and wrong.

This is not because man is a rational actor.

This is, however, because man is a sovereign actor.

The not-so-floral smell of unworthy and subsidized higher education

Jon Peterson

The Golden Age of the Netherlands came about and lasted almost the entirety of the 17th century. During that time, the Dutch were known among other things for their exceptional trading and business and their scientific advancements and the arts of the country.

The period was also notable for Tulip Mania, which marked three months from 1636 into 1637 in which tulips were responsible for one of the first and finest examples of an economic bubble bursting.

Tulips got their footing in the country when, in 1593, a statesman and ambassador of the Holy Roman Empire that was serving in Turkey sent a collection of the hardy flowers to a professor at Leiden University in the Netherlands.

The tulips' popularity soared soon after and their prices reflected their desirability. Where a top tulip then could fetch 2,500 florins in the time of the bubble, the same price could be given to 80,000 gallons of the day's beer, more than 40 fat swine or just under 17 years of work from a skilled laborer.

While the lower classes had their own tulips, the higher classes had access to fine bulbs that gave off great beauty. During the bubble, the tulip industry underwent changes to how they were expected to be responsible for buying them – by making the prices reflect options at which prices the tulips could be bought for at the purchase – depending on condition and other factors.But why were the prices so high during those months?

Firstly, it was because people were willing to pay that price. Secondly, it was because the sellers of the tulips had little reason to lower their prices. People thought the prices would remain steady, but they didn't.

Tulip prices skyrocketed in those few months, but during the following February, the prices fell dramatically – by about 99.999 percent.

The end result was that those who were getting screwed over were the people who didn't realize the value of the bulbs was changing and who bought tehem thinking the price change was natural and sustainable.

While many people see college and universities as highly desirable and a more or less normal thing by which to measure success in life – the truth could not be moving further, faster from reality.

This was not so and when the bubble burst the sellers of the tulips made out quite well for themselves, while those who had bought after contract changes had been made suffered.

A similar parallel is seen in public funding for higher education at all levels. While many people see college and universities as highly desirable and a more-or-less normal thing by which to measure success in life, the truth could not be moving further, faster from reality.

Whereas decades ago few entry-level positions among leading companies would require a college education for application, now more and more jobs hold a degree with certain GPAs that reflect the worth of the degrees – upwards of 3.5 for many top jobs – as being necessary for consideration.

And while many people now receive financial aid of some kind for school, it is not uncommon for them simply being subsidized with tax dollars that come from people less well off than they themselves are.

Economist Thomas Sowell has proposed that students may sign onto a contract with banks so they may get funding for college.

That way, their parents would not be put into enormous amounts of debt, and students who had good GPAs and histories – rich and poor – would receive funding for school while also creating a real value for loans, rather than just dumping the debt onto the taxpayers.

Going to college now has less to do with education and skills and substantially more with drinking and the opposite gender (which just adds to its desirability) than it was before public subsidies became ordinary and prices stopped reflecting real future value.

Thousands of students take – or are forced to take – classes that will give them no benefits in getting a job with general education requirements and other less directly applicable majors, such as my own – philosophy.

While many lawyers and truly dedicated thinkers are spawned from such programs, in general they have little applicability in generating real value to society like may come from engineers, scientists or chefs. Several top schools such as Brown University have totally done away with general education classes, except for specific major requirements.

Real worth would be given to classes, as students and their families would be more likely to pay their full price than if they were subsidized. Fewer jobs would require a college degree, and higher education could regain the value that it lost after politicians started deciding that our educations were so necessary that the least interested among us could take away from the value of the hard work we have done here.

We are in the hole, economically, and our state's schools need restructuring. The problem is whether we will let politicians decide the worth of our time or whether we should be allowed to do that ourselves. We are in an education bubble and if people keep insisting upon its being subsidized, it will indicate something far different than the dropping price of flowers.

British performer releases 2nd album

Today's launching reveals Allen's dramatic personal life

BY HALEY NAVARRO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the sophomore attempt at 2006's "Alright, Still," Lily Allen's new album, "It's Not Me, It's You," grabs your attention and keeps it.

With production help from The Bird and the Bee's Greg Kurstin, "It's Not Me, It's You," establishes Allen as more than a one-hit wonder. The "Smile" hit-maker gained buzz on the Internet with the social networking site MySpace.

With her second album, Allen made sure listeners were able to get some of her new music first. During the fall of 2008, she posted demos from her future album.

They were rough and have since been redone for the CD, but it gave fans an idea of what to expect for Allen's next venture. One demo she recorded, then-titled "I Don't Know" was later renamed "The Fear" and released as her first single.

Allen doesn't leave anything out in this album, talking about everything from bad sex to God to her father. After suffering a miscarriage and dealing with weight issues, Lily Allen has created a wonderful record to be proud of.

"Everyone's At It" opens the CD with Allen pondering the question, "I'm not trying to say that I'm smelling of roses / But when will we tire of putting s up our noses?" Though the song is an upbeat one, Allen tries to take a different look on today's somber world, which continues throughout the CD with "The Fear" and the rumored song for former President George W. Bush, "F You."

"The Fear" is about people's obsession with celebrity culture; about material goods and the things people do to get famous.

"I don't know how I'm meant to feel anymore," Allen coos over the backing track.

"Not Fair," which is sure to be a defining song for Allen, is about a guy that treats Allen really well, but is not very good in bed. "It's not fair / I think you're really mean / You're supposed to care / But you never make me scream." The best part of this song isn't necessarily the

'Tonight: Franz Ferdinand'

Third time's a charm for dance rockers newest album

BY PETER RIZZO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Tonight: Franz Ferdinand," the title that graces the band's third album may seem like an uninventive name for an album, though it is doubtful these Glasgow hipsters could have found a more fitting one.

Here, the quartet's songs drip with a palpable nighttime influence, channeling melodies, hellifting stories of grungy city hack alleys and time spent in the dark of matinees.

"Ulysses," the album's opening track bangs with enough enthusiasm to vie for the most intriguing song in the band's catalog, shaking hard enough to break any doubts that the three years spent between albums would soften the band's sense of determination.

Riding a thumping bass groove, lead singer Alex Kapranos whispers like some drifting panhandler agonizing in boredom before the groove spirals into a demented victory march complete with blues organ blasts and effect swirls. The only wisdom Kapranos conjures for the brooding groove's chorus is "I'm bored, I'm bored, let's get high."

After three albums, it is the band's musical arm that shows the most growth. Comprised of Bob Hardy on bass, Nick McCarthy on guitar and Paul Thomson on drums, the instruments shoulder most of the burden in fleshing out a new instrumental landscape for Kapranos' pop songs, which don't cover much new ground lyrically.

While The Killers' their main competition in the dance-rock genre remain elusive and mercurial, still too creatively charged to condense into a static style, Franz Ferdinand has opted for a different route. Here it revisits the blueprints and feverishly tinkers with its essence, becoming dirtier and creepier while incorporating a grittier live feel.

But above all, the album serves to declare that despite the changes, they are still Franz Ferdinand. The same band of Scottish art school dandies whose single "Take Me Out" brought dance-rock blasting onto the radio, onto video games like Guitar Hero and into the mainstream.

However, unlike its self-titled first album, and the sophomore return "You Could Have it so

Franz Ferdinand's third album, "Tonight: Franz Ferdinand," was released at the end of January. Despite changes in the band's sound it still produces a quality album reminiscent of its previous two.

The Hot 8 Brass Band from New Orleans, La., performed last Friday at the Bowker Auditorium. The band played a blend of jazz and funk, including traditional and contemporary rhythms.

Brass Band big hit

Performance represented New Orleans renowned music

BY ELYSE WENOS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Bowker Auditorium was filled with energy and soul Friday night, as the Hot 8 Brass Band rocked the house. The group mixed traditional jazz hits of the second-line tradition with its contemporary originals making for a diverse show.

The group, founded in New Orleans, La., blends jazz and funk – embodying the city's renowned music, especially the second-line tradition.

Originally adapted from jazz funeral processions, the second-line tradition consists of a first line of mourners – family members of the deceased – and the second line – the band that plays as they march. These parades are now generally held for the purposes of celebrating this festive street music.

Since Hurricane Katrina Gulf Coast in 2005, the band has been involved in the Finding Our Folks – a tour that brings music to displaced evacuees residing in shelters, other states and temporary homes. It also raises awareness and funds for people still affected by Katrina.

Before the evening began ushers dawning purple, yellow and green Mardi Gras masks handed out programs, trying to set the New Orleans mood. As the seats filled, one couldn't help but notice an overwhelming number of older people. Some students donned the seats here and there, but overall numbers were low and patrons seemed to be the main attendees. The hall was filled nonetheless.

Despite the low student turnout, one thing was for sure – the Hot 8 Brass Band knows how to jam.

The performance was filled with soulful harmonizing, powerful crescendos, and a great deal of stage presence, humor and constant improvisations. As one member, like the saxophone player for example, felt the moment and went off on a groove, the others accompanied and gave props, danced and/or encouraged audience participation. Every time a player had an impromptu solo, another member made sure to introduce and praise their bandmate.

The crowd often started clapping with the band's prompts, but stopped halfway through the song. But the group's persistence soon took precedence and, by the end, the majority of the audience was dancing in the aisles and marching in their own second line around the auditorium perimeter.

Sex Pistol out of work

BY GEOFF BOUCHER
LOS ANGELES TIMES

LOS ANGELES — It's come to this – a Sex Pistol drives a Prius. On a recent crisp afternoon, Steve Jones, the guitar architect of London punk in its primacy, zipped down Hollywood Boulevard in his shiny white hybrid Toyota, which is customized with a rooftop image of her majesty Queen Elizabeth, a safety pin jutting from her lip. And you thought punk rock was dead.

Even with the distraction of nubile young tourists strolling up the Walk of Fame, Jones was in a melancholy mood. You see, like so many people in America these days, the 53-year-old rock star turned radio DJ is looking for a job.

"It's weird not to have somewhere to go," Jones said. "And wherever I do go next won't be the same, I know that."

Jones joined the ranks of the unemployed on Jan. 17, when Indie 103.1, the scruffy but revered L.A. rock station, became a victim of a vicious downturn in advertising revenue. For five years, the Sex Pistol had been the gloriously unpolished voice of "Jonesy's Jukebox," an eccentric and unpredictable two-hour lunchtime show on which he played any obscure record he wanted, chatted up famous guests or just, well, whistled.

The show was rebroadcast in the late afternoon, and its pirate soul became the signature of a station that Rolling Stone, Esquire, Spin and other national magazines celebrated as the best commercial radio outlet in the nation.

"Indie, that was my radio station, so to speak," Jones said. "I think people are starting to really miss it and realize how special it was. And for me, taking the job, it got me out of a rut that I was always in. I'm pretty much an isolated person. I'd rather stay home and play video games. For me to go somewhere every day, it was the best thing for me as a human. It got me away from the madness in my head."

Many people miss Indie, which was eulogized far beyond the reach of its famously feeble signal. Bloggers who only had read about the station wrote tributes to it as a vinyl spirit in the Digital Age. When the station's corporate chiefs at Entravision abruptly switched the call name to El Gato 103 and began pumping regional Mexican music, rock fans of a certain age reacted the same way they did when Tower Records closed or CBGB was shuttered in New York.

"A lot of people were devastated; Indie was a community, and it was chaotic and unpredictable and had all this rare energy," said Mark Sovel, Indie's former music director.

Sovel has been working to revive the station as a broadcast concern (the station is still available online at indie1031.fm, but it's a shadow of what it was).

Those revival efforts have, so far, gone for naught, but they have led to some interesting conversations, such as Prince calling to offer his name and guitar in service of saving the station. "But it's not looking good," Sovel said, adding that Indie loyalists have more enthusiasm than business acumen and face a bleak marketplace: "We are not exactly 'business plan' kind of guys..."

There was a recorded message that played over and over the last day Indie was on the air that suggested the station, like some rock martyr, died defiantly because it wouldn't play pop hits by Britney Spears or Sean "Diddy" Combs.

"It's ridiculous; that was embarrassing," Jones said with a groan. "There was no one telling anybody what to do. Look, money's tight and advertisers ain't spending. The station never had great ratings, the signal was small, but we made money on commercials. And then we didn't, and that was because of the economy."

Indie might be in the ground for good, but Jones is likely to land on his feet. Calls have been coming in from traditional radio stations and satellite radio and Internet ventures. He canceled a trip to Hawaii last week to handle some new overtures, but he said he is proceeding cautiously.

"Wherever I go, I will still do my show the same; I wouldn't change it. I don't think I should, and I hope any of these people that are thinking of hiring me aren't going to try to mold me into something else," Jones said. "I'd be bored out of me brain. I'd last two weeks if they had me reading some nonsense. If you want someone to read a piece of paper, just hire someone else. There's loads of people that do that."

Jones is also leery of any post where his listeners couldn't tune in on a transistor radio. Local radio, like freeway asphalt, links communities in the mad sprawl of L.A.

"The thing I liked about Indie is you could really be in your town," Jones said. "It's live, and the people listening feel like they're part of one thing, a local thing. When you do satellite, you're in space. It could have been recorded a month ago."

There's also been some vague offers regarding a television show, perhaps something along the lines of the chat-and-perform format now being used by Elvis Costello. Jones chuckled: "And where do you think they got the idea from?"

"Jonesy's Jukebox," if you never heard it, had some of the pacing of Howard Stern's unhurried ramble but with the bleary voice of a rock survivor who, despite 2 1/2 decades of sobriety, still sounds hung over. His guests – among them Paul McCartney, Brian Wilson and Robert Plant – also responded to him as a showbiz peer.

Jones had plenty of war stories: Chrissie Hynde of the Pretenders, for example, dropped by to recount her 1970s sexual escapades with the Sex Pistol.

He won't say whom he has talked to about a new job, but he's decided to limit his choices to L.A. or New York. If a good fit doesn't present itself, Jones has talked about going on tour with Iggy Pop and the Stooges – the band's guitarist, Ron Asheton, died last month at age 60, and having an old friend take his place might help the hand soldier on.

Jones also says he doesn't really need to work (there's enough money in the bank after recent Pistols reunion tours), but he also dreads the idea of slipping into a hermit's life.

"I can't get enough of Call of Duty," he said. "I'm the oldest guy who plays on PlayStation. But 53 is the new 16."

When Jones really was 16, he was a juvenile delinquent of the first order. He was saved from a life of crime by rock 'n' roll – well, mostly saved. At one point, he did steal David Bowie's microphone and gear, equipment that went to good use when the Pistols made their searing debut in 1975.

The Pistols released just one album and imploded, but it was enough to eventually land the band in the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Jones moved west in 1982 after a year in New York, during which he sold his passport for dope money. He was homeless for a while and floating in a heroin haze. He cleaned up, looked around and realized he loved Southern California.

"I've lived here now longer than I lived in London," he said. "I really appreciate the place now. People would recognize my voice too, they would say, 'You're that guy on the radio.' I miss that."

Steve Jones, left, performed with Eddie Vedder during the Third Annual Hullabaloo concert on May 5, 2007. Jones lost his job on Jan. 17 when Indie 103.1 became a victim of weak advertising revenue.

Impromptu performances

The band was in constant communication with each other – giving cues and deciding progressions spontaneously. They played some jazz traditionals like "St. James Infirmary," "It's All Over Now" and "Sexual Healing," while mixing in some band originals like "Let Me Do My Thing." The first song seemed to have some awkward transitions and the trombone microphone was overpowering the rest of the group, but this was adjusted by the next song. Like the instrumentals, vocals were smooth and sometimes unplanned in akin to the sax player's tag line of the evening, "We' gonna keep the music movin' and you're body groovin!"

They ended the show with the "Saints Go Marching In," at one point getting the crowd so enthralled in the music that the band stopped and mocked playing and only the crowd's claps were sustaining the beat. There wasn't an intermission, but that was hardly noticeable because the music was so mesmerizing. The band has two CDs available online, both entitled "Rock with the Hot 8 Brass Band." One was released in 2005, the other in 2007. Other recordings include live compilations from the 2006 New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival.

Consistency in album

Much Better," albums that offered up only a mixed bag of hits and misses, its newest entry proves to be its most consistent album to date.

In most of the new songs, the band takes deliberate steps to avoid their conventional approach to song structure while maintaining their usual melodic grooves. This includes augmenting their typical guitar-heavy approach by incorporating more synthesizer hooks and backing vocals successfully into the mix.

While its second album offered only lackluster singles in the form of "Do You Want To" and "The Fallen," here you'd be hard-pressed to find a song that couldn't competently compete for radio airplay. "Ulysses," "Lucid Dreams," and "No You Girls" all hit with a punch that finds the band regaining the pop prowess that its sophomore material largely lacked.

Overall, the album offers not only great singles but also a depth of backtracks. Songs like "Live Alone" run with an undercurrent of 1980s new wave influences, while "Bite Hard" rides a fluttery piano intro into a romping chorus that could soundtrack a respectable dancehall brawl.

These subtle departures and flourishes in sound serve the band well, drawing out its eccentricities and musical prowess, one that culminates in the seven-minute reworking of its first single "Lucid Dreams." While the original radio version drew on the band's pop sensibilities and expectations, this new version spirals into long expanses of synth punctured by snarling guitars, even devolving into techno thumps that are sure to electrify any venue the band will make its way to on any subsequent tour.

And while devoid of any lyrical sense, "There is no nation of you, there is no nation of me," the tune demonstrates that Franz Ferdinand is a group of capable musicians whose creative exploits are likely to grow more interesting with time.

Allen shows maturity

subject matter, which is hilarious and relatable, but rather the music. The track can best be described as a country-pop song that Allen conquers with ease. And it's not one you can feel bad about liking, either.

"Back to the Start," seems like a grungier version of a track Kylie Minogue would use. Allen's accent comes through in all of her singing, but this track sounds especially British between her fast singing and the echoes of the song's title in the background.

Allen's voice is definitely not on the same level as a professional singer, or other pop singers in her same genre, but her voice is easy to listen to, easy to sing along to, and easy to enjoy. In a way, her voice almost matches her demeanor – its light and everything is pretty much on the surface to dissect.

"F You" is pretty self-explanatory when she begins her verse singing, "Look inside your tiny mind / Then look a bit harder." Though she's denied claims that this song is about Bush, it's evident in her lyrics.

"Him" further proves her point about the world we live in today, "And if there is some kind of God, Do you think he's pleased? / When he looks down on us, I wonder what he sees."

It's mostly taboo to talk about religion, but Allen isn't stating if there is one or not. She's taking all the possibilities into consideration and applying them to the mess that we've caused for ourselves.

What makes this such a strong album for Allen is the fact that there isn't a song on it that isn't good. It's true that some are better than others, but each is produced beautifully and well written.

Who knew Allen had a lot to say? She's come a long way from "When I see you cry / It makes me smile," and it's safe to say she's put herself out there for people to appreciate, and it will be a while before we hear the last of her.

"It's Not Me, It's You" will be released Tuesday by Capital Records.

In Franz Ferdinand's third album the group avoids structuring its lyrics like in previous albums, but still includes its usual melody. The group displays its musical talent in "Tonight: Franz Ferdinand."

Xavier, Charlotte dominating league play

Xavier's Ta'Shia Phillips and former Temple star Lady Comfort fight for the ball in a game last season. Phillips averages 13.3 points and 12 rebounds per game for the Musketeers, who are atop the Atlantic 10 standings.

St. Bonaventure holds steady in 3rd place

By Noah Steinberg-Distefano
Collegian Correspondent

With less than a month to go before the women's Atlantic 10 Tournament kicks off, Xavier (20-4, 8-0 A-10) and Charlotte (17-6, 8-1 A-10) have continued to distance themselves from the other teams in the conference.

The two teams have been red hot of late and continued their dominance last week, each posting 2-0 records. The Musketeers come into Wednesday's game against George Washington with an 11-game winning streak, while Charlotte has won seven games in a row.

A-10 Basketball

St. Bonaventure kept pace with George Washington for third place in the A-10 with a 2-0 week and a hard-fought 64-52 over Saint Joseph's on Sunday. Junior Dana Mitchell had 22 points in the win as the Bonnies improved to 17-6 overall and 6-2 in the conference.

Elsewhere in the division, the Minutewomen posted a 1-1 record, following up a convincing win against Rhode Island with a disappointing 86-65 loss at Dayton on Saturday. Kristina Danella led UMass with 20 points in the loss. With six games remaining before the start of the A-10 Tournament, UMass will have to improve upon its 2-6 conference record in order to secure a high seed in the tournament.

Players of the Week

Danielle Burgin of Charlotte and Brittany Ford of Saint Joseph's were honored as the A-10 Players of the Week. In two wins for the 49ers, Burgin nearly averaged a double-double with 14 points and 9.5 rebounds per game. Burgin recorded her fifth double-double of the season and 16th of her career with 14 points and 10 rebounds in the 49ers 62-55 win over Richmond last Tuesday. This is the second time this season that Burgin has received player of the week honors.

Ford also posted solid numbers on the week, averaging a double-double for the Hawks who pushed division-leading Xavier to the limit in a 42-41 loss on Jan. 28. Ford averaged 19 points and 9 rebounds per game on the week for Saint Joseph's, who followed up its one-point loss to Xavier with a victory over Rhode Island. In that game Ford scored 21 points and pulled down 10 rebounds. Ford continues her breakout season for the Hawks, averaging a career and team-best 13.5 points per contest.

RPI report

In the latest RPI report, the Atlantic 10 ranks seventh out of the 32 conferences in Women's college basketball. Seven of the 14 teams in the conference rank among the top 100 in the NCAA. Xavier (20) leads the way, followed by Richmond (44), Temple (45), Charlotte (61), George Washington (66), St. Bonaventure (70) and Dayton (83). This is the highest the conference has been ranked since January 2007.

Rams making progress

Although they've spent the majority of the season cemented to the basement of the A-10 standings, the Fordham Rams have seen significant improvements from last year's team that finished the season 0-29.

Sb far, Fordham is tied for second in the nation in team turnaround standings with a plus-7 win differential. The turnaround can be attributed in large part to the Rams' improved defense, which is allowing 11 points fewer per game than last season.

Fordham senior guard Annie Zopf said she came into the season with a positive mindset and way ready for a turnaround.

"I kind of came back ready to change things, " Zopf told The New York Times. "A lot of girls felt the same way."

Academic honors

Katelyn Murray of St. Bonaventure's, Morgan Robertson of La Salle and Theresa Lisch of Saint Louis earned first-team All-District honors for stellar performances in the classroom as well as on the hardwood.

Murray has maintained a 4.0 grade point average as a biology major while leading the Bonnies to a 17-6 start. She is the second-leading scorer on the team, averaging 11.3 points per game, and is just 11 points shy from becoming the 17th player in program history to reach the 1,000-point milestone.

Robertson, a junior forward out of Amarillo, Texas, leads the Explorers of La Salle in both points per game (12.5) and rebounds per game (8.5) g) and maintains a 3.87 GPA.

Lisch is the Atlantic 10's leading scorer, averaging 20.9 points per game for Saint Louis. She also leads the conference in free-throw percentage (.885) and 3-point field goals per game (2.18). The three women will now be eligible for Academic All-American accolades.

One-goal losses too common

the power play for the majority of the season, but the ample opportunities the Minutemen have on the man advantage has not been used to their benefit for quite some time.

On Saturday against UMass-Lowell, the Minutemen went 0-for-5 with five shots on the power play. Friday against Boston College UMass did the same, 0-for-5, with eight shots. UMass is eighth in Hockey East on the power play (18-for-130 this season, 13.8 percent) and have allowed five goals while a man up.

Against UMass-Lowell, the Minutemen failed to set up the power-play unit in their offensive zone. The first power-play unit consisted of James Marcou, Casey Wellman and Chase Langenaup with Justin Braun and Matt Irwin manning the points. The second unit saw Michael Lecomte, T.J. Syner and Cory Quirk with Topher Bevis and Alex Berry on the blue line.

The two units struggled to move the puck around in the offensive zone, which limited the openings between UMass-Lowell's penalty killers and didn't allow the Minutemen to get quality shots on net.

Defending strong

UMass' special teams isn't completely at a loss, as the Minutemen are fourth in Hockey East on the penalty kill (112-for-130 this season, 86.2 percent) and have scored four shorthanded goals, two coming from Braun.

The Minutemen have numerous players capable of playing in the man-down situation. On Saturday, Brett Watson and Scott Crowder played offense while Braun and Bevis were on defense. The other unit saw time from Doug Kublin, John Wessbecker, Quirk and others.

At 16 minutes, 14 seconds into the first period, Will Ortiz and Martin Nolet were called for two separate penalties, putting UMass-Lowell on a 5-on-3 advantage. For one minute Braun, Bevis and Watson played a tight triangle in front of Paul Dainton. They prevented the River Hawks from getting good looks on offense and Dainton made saves on the shots that the River Hawks got past the trio.

Scoring

Losing by one goal has become a theme in UMass' season. The Minutemen are 3-7 in one-goal games. In many games, the winning goal was scored in the first or final minute of the game.

The Minutemen sit at seventh in scoring in Hockey East with 79 goals scored – an average of 2.82 goals per game.

But, the Minutemen have numerous players that contribute offensively. Marcou and Wellman lead the team in points. Marcou is tied for second in scoring in Hockey East with eight goals and 23 assists (31 points) while averaging 1.11 points per game. Wellman is ranked first in freshman scoring in Hockey East. He has tallied eight goals and 16 assists (24 points). Berry is the leading goal-scorer for the team (10 goals, 13 assists).

UMass will look to stay consistent within its entire game when they have a home-and-home series with Northeastern next weekend. The Minutemen will host the Huskies on Friday Feb. 13 at 7 p.m.

Slow tempo hurt UM

late in the game and allowing scores at the end of the half.

It remains to be seen if UMass can eliminate these errors when the Atlantic 10 Tournament starts.

Fast start, slow finish

One of the keys to the Minutemen's game plan was controlling the tempo and forcing St. Joseph's to play at a faster pace then it wanted to.

UMass started the game at a torrid pace, scoring 15 points in 4 minutes. All five starters scored and the Minutemen raced off to a nine-point lead.

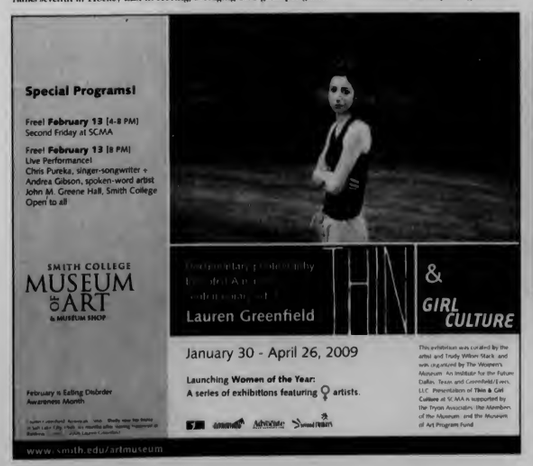
UMass attacked the basket every chance it got and had success getting to the rim. This was sparked by quick passing after rebounds and the Minutemen's looking to score baskets in transition.

By halftime, the Minutemen accumulated a 13-0 advantage on fast-break points and took a three-point lead into halftime.

"I thought we were great in the first half. I thought we should have been up even more," Kellogg said. "The tempo was favoring us, the ball was moving up the court, even in the first half I thought we missed some easy plays and open shots. I was really pleased for awhile with how the game was going."

But as the game wore on, the Hawks started to slow the game down, making it a battle of half-court offenses. For a team with a dominant post presence in the form of Ahmad Nivins, this was exactly what UMass didn't want to happen.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg is hoping to see improvement over the next few weeks as the Atlantic 10 Tournament looms ahead.



As hot as the Minutemen were at the start of the game, they couldn't get a basket when they needed it most. The game was tied 56-56 with 4 minutes left when SJU went on an 11-2 run to ice the game. The Hawks hit two jumpers as the shot clock expired and made two layups, whereas the Minutemen missed two layups, a 3-pointer and three foul shots.

Xavier loses to DU, falls to No. 14

By Adam McGillen
Collegian Staff

In one of college basketball's biggest upsets this season, Duquesne defeated visiting-No. 9 Xavier on Saturday, 72-68.

The Dukes (15-7, 6-3 Atlantic 10) opened the game aggressively, taking a 20-7 lead over the Musketeers (20-3, 8-1 A-10) in the first 7 minutes of play. Though still atop the Atlantic 10, Xavier fell in the AP and ESPN/USA Today polls to No. 14 after losing to an unranked opponent.

Duquesne started hot and ended cold. After shooting an overwhelming 81 percent from the field in the first half, the Dukes relied on their defense to seal the victory. In the final 7 minutes, 44 seconds of the game, the Dukes did not muster a single basket. Aaron Jackson's five free throws in the final minute proved the difference.

The upset was defining for both teams.

Xavier continued a trend of losses when travelling to Pittsburgh, Pa., where it has lost three of its last four at Duquesne.

For the Dukes, it represented another achievement for a team turning things around after its school-worst record of 3-24 just three years ago. Jackson, who led the Duquesne effort to hold its lead in the closing seconds, was one of the five basketball players wounded in an on-campus shooting on Sept. 17, 2006.

A-10 stars in NBA

Former Atlantic 10 standouts Jameer Nelson (Saint Joseph's '04) and David West (Xavier '03) will appear in the NBA All-Star Game on Feb. 15. Both players developed impressive resumes during their college careers, earning A-10 and AP Player of the Year honors in their respective senior seasons.

Averaging 20.6 points, 5.3 assists, 4.7 rebounds and 2.97 steals per game, Nelson led his Hawks through a perfect season (27-0) and into the Elite Eight as the No. 1 seed in the NCAA tournament during his final season. Now a guard for the Orlando Magic, Nelson's 16.7 points per game earned him a spot on the Eastern Conference All-Stars. But he will not be able to play due to a shoulder injury.

As a Musketeer, West became the third player in Xavier history to score more than 2,000 points and grab over 1,000 rebounds in his career. He holds the school record for double-doubles, with 68, and led the A-10 in rebounding each year he played. Now with the New Orleans Hornets, the 6-foot-9 forward joins the Western Conference All-Stars averaging 19.6 points per game.

Baron for 3

Rhode Island's Jimmy Baron has risen to third all time in career 3-pointers in the A-10. His 316 career 3-pointers is the most by any Ram, and puts him behind only Monty Mack's 331 (Massachusetts 1998-01) and Darnell Harris's 342 (La Salle 2005-08).

A-10 Basketball

The Rams are sixth in the conference, with an overall record of 16-8 (5-4 A-10). With seven games left and his team looking to extend its season with a run in the A-10 tournament, Baron will likely surpass Mack for second. If he continues 3-point performances like the one he had at Duke on Nov. 16 (going 8-for-10 from 3-point range), there's a chance he could capture Harris's crown by season's end.

Tussle at the top

With the season winding down and the conference tournament on the horizon, Wednesday's game between No. 14 Xavier and Dayton (21-3, 7-2 A-10) will play a decisive role in how the bracket shapes up.

The Musketeers have to beat the Flyers to preserve their spot on top of the A-10. Both teams head into the game coming off disappointing losses to conference foes. Duquesne defeated Xavier on Saturday, and Dayton lost at Charlotte (8-14, 2-6 A-10) on Sunday.

Former Atlantic 10 standouts Jameer Nelson and David West were named to this year's NBA All Star roster. St. Joseph's Ahmad Nivins, above, is part of the new generation of A-10 stars.

Dayton has not lost a home game this season, and if it can defeat Xavier on Wednesday, the Flyers will rise into a two-way tie for first with the Musketeers. By beating Temple on Thursday night, however, St. Joseph's (14-8, 7-1 A-10) can make it all moot, improving its conference record to 8-1 and taking sole control over first.

Christa Narus and the Minutewomen are looking to knock off returning Atlantic 10 Champion Richmond in next week's A-10 meet.

UMass preparing for Atlantic 10 meet

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving programs have been eating salad for more than six months, and it's almost time for the main course.

With little more than a week remaining until the Atlantic 10 Championships, or as UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth has termed the competition, "What we swim for."

UMass enters next week's four-day competition at Buffalo's Flickinger Aquatic Center with dual meet records of 6-1 (men) and 4-2 (women), respectively.

None of that matters now, however, as any Minuteman veteran who was around for the team's 2006 loss at A-10 finals will likely convey.

After witnessing the Minutemen's 10th conference championship last year, opposing teams will be gunning to play spoiler.

Swimmers like Roman Becicka of Duquesne are creeping up on UMass in the latest conference's top times updates, grappling to unseat a Yarworth dynasty that has failed to become A-10 Champions only twice this decade.

Bolstered by recent dominant performances by divers Sarah Horstmann and Karen Upperco, the Minutewomen will take on the likes of defending champion Richmond, picked in the preseason coaches' poll to repeat.

UMass Swimming

New year; new pressure

"You never like to say rebuild," Yarworth said in a preseason interview on Oct. 18. "You reload."

In the weeks that followed, his team saw two outstanding freshmen, Jason Cook and Joey Sbordon, dominate. Last week, Sbordon earned his second UMass/Dunn Brothers Athlete of the Week award this season for winning multiple events at Fordham, while Cook set a new school record earlier this season with an impressive 3-meter dive score of 297.45.

At last year's conference meet, UMass footprints were all over the winner's podium, where Mandy Hixon collected A-10 Diving Coach of the Year Honors for both men's and women's sides. Meanwhile, standout R.J. Rappe, who has since graduated, picked up Most Outstanding Diver honors after sweeping both of his events.

Coaches salute seniors

The final clock is ticking on UMass seniors' longtime practices in Boyden Gym's Joseph R. Rodgers Pool, and UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb admitted it can be a bittersweet affair.

"It's always a little sad," Newcomb said following the Minutewomen's Senior Weekend victory over Boston College. "You develop a relationship with these kids over four years. You get to know them and you see them grow up and you see them develop as athletes and individuals and students and everything else. It's always sad when you realize you're almost done with them."

Yarworth echoed these sentiments, citing mixed emotions about the departure of captains Nate Bromage and Brad Sloan.

"It's always poignant, but it's nice to see them get out of here with a degree," the veteran noted. "Swimming's a high attrition sport because it's so hard and demanding."

Crunch time issues

Missed opportunities at crucial times costly

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When two evenly matched teams play, it is the ones that get the little things right who will win close matchups. The teams that fail to heed the details are left muttering to themselves, "What if?"

Poor execution and missed opportunities have plagued the Massachusetts men's basketball team. A few crucial plays can account for almost every UMass defeat this season, including Sunday's 68-64 loss to Saint Joseph's.

"It's the little tiny things that make the difference in this league, a missed blockout here, a tough shot there, free throws come into play at times. There are some things we have to continue to get better at in the last 4 minutes," said UMass coach Derek Kellogg.

UMass Basketball

Take the end of the first half.

The Minutemen were poised to enter halftime with a six-point lead after Ricky Harris drains two free throws with 8 seconds left. The ball was inbounded to SJU guard Tasheed Carr, who raced up the floor and hit a 3-pointer as time expired.

"I knew that St. Joe's was going to make a run, they always do because they're a good team. That shot at the end of the first half gave them momentum," Harris said.

Boxing out is one of the first fundamentals taught to basketball players, but one missed boxout by UMass allowed the Hawks to start their comeback.

With 7 minutes left in the game and the Minutemen up 53-48, St. Joe's guard Chris Prescott missed a 3-pointer. If UMass had grabbed the rebound, they would have had the chance to burn 30 seconds and potentially gain a seven-point lead. Instead, Darren Govins raced in untouched, snatched the rebound and scored an easy layup. This play started a 6-0 run by the Hawks and suddenly their lead was trimmed to 54-53. The game was up for grabs.

Three missed free throws in the final 4 minutes didn't help UMass' cause either. But this isn't a problem that suddenly sprung up, as it has been happening all season. Look at UMass' 75-74 loss to Jacksonville State in the home opener on Nov. 24. The Minutemen led 74-69 with 30 seconds left – then everything fell apart.

First, standout forward Tony Gaffney missed the front end of a one-and-one that could have sealed the game. UMass then fouled the Gamecocks' Brandon Crawford while he was shooting a 3-pointer and the guard converted the four-point play. Jacksonville State fouled on the inbounds pass, Harris missed a free throw and Jacksonville State scored on the ensuing possession to steal the game, scoring six points in 22 seconds.

The Minutemen lost their next game, 57-56, to Toledo on Dec. 3. The Rockets were scored on a tip-in because someone missed a box out.

Even in the highlight of the season, the 61-60 victory over Kansas Dec. 13, Chris Lowe missed two free throws with 20 seconds left to give the Jayhawks a chance for a game-winning shot.

Now it's February and the Minutemen are still allowing offensive rebounds, missing free throws

UM secures regionals slot

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts men's and women's ski teams used strong performances in the giant slalom on Friday to secure a place in the MacConell Regionals, which start on Feb 21.

For the Minutemen, co-captain Andrew Hawes finished fourth in Friday's race, with a time of 1 minute, 57.18 seconds, just .42 ahead of his fellow teammate Matthew Small, who placed in sixth. Junior Travis Hopkins had his best finish of the season, coming in eigth with a time of 1:58.22.

The men's team finished in sixth place in the slalom, which was its lowest finish all season. In the end however, the performance did not affect the team's overall standing. The Minutemen finished third in the MacConnell Division for the season.

For the men's side this is just the first step toward reaching its ultimate goal.

"Our goal is to go see if we can defend our title," said UMass coach Skip Fox.

The Minutewomen also maintained their top five position with a steady fourth-place finish in the giant slalom Friday.

"The women really had a good day Friday coming in fourth, which is really where we've been all year," Fox said.

Leading the way was junior Emily Shilletto, who placed in the top five in the giant slalom for the second time in three weeks. Her time of 2:02.38 earned her fifth place. Sophomore Jamie Taloumis also finished in the top 10 for the second straight week, as she placed sixth.

Despite the absence of junior co-captain Ashley Hawes (torn ACL), the Minutewomen's steady showing on Friday helped lock down a trip to Watervalley, N.H., to compete at Regionals. The Minutewomen finished in fifth place in the MacConnell Division for the season.

The top 18 teams will compete in the last two weekends of February, with the top six teams of the Northeast advancing to the Nationals.

UMass inconsistent in '08–'09

Cahoon disappointed with effort near end of periods

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Inconsistencies plague teams and those inconsistencies are getting the better of the Massachusetts hockey team.

Since the start of the season, UMass has slowly made its way lower and lower in Hockey East standings. After two loses last weekend to No. 12 Boston College (2-0) and UMass-Lowell (2-1), the Minutemen sit in the eighth-place spot (15 points), one point behind seventh-place Maine.

UMass Hockey

UMass (11-14-3, 6-10-3 Hockey East) has been working to start periods strong and finish them stronger. UMass failed to do so in both games this weekend. On Saturday, UMass-Lowell scored the game-winning goal in the first minute of the third period. Against Boston College, UMass allowed a goal just over a minute into the first period.

"Lo and behold, we give up a goal in the first minute of a period again which gets back to the first and last minutes of periods – one of our objectives, one of the things you really work on," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after Saturday's game. "It's a real cardinal sin in our sport to give goals up in the beginning and ends of periods, and we give one up in the beginning of the period."

The Minutemen have been working to play the last two periods as hard as their first. Against UMass-Lowell, Cahoon noted that their first period was strong, but the remaining two fell short of the Minutemen's capabilities. The same went for the Jan. 30 win against No. 3 Northeastern, when UMass played an impressively in the first period, but steered away from their system of play in the last two.

Staying consistent from game to game will play a critical role in UMass' progress toward a postseason run.

Minutewomen hope to stay undefeated in young season

BY STEVEN LEVINE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Fresh off an 8-1 victory over Fordham, the Massachusetts tennis team travels to Boston Tuesday for a match against Boston University. The Minutewomen have experienced a relatively easy schedule up to this point in the season, but that's about to change.

BU is the defending America East champion. It is coming off consecutive victories against Army and Dartmouth. UMass coach Judy Dixon acknowledges the challenge ahead for her players. On top of that, the Terriers play on carpeted courts, where the Minutewomen lack experience.

"On carpeted courts, the ball is slower and stays low to the ground," Dixon said. "We will definitely have an adjustment to make there as well as the rest of the week when we play Albany at home."

The highly anticipated Temple match this week has been postponed and moved to April 11 due to scheduling conflicts.

Although dominant so far this year, UMass still has to tighten up its game. In the No. 1 match against Fordham last Sunday, Candyce Boney, had a tough time against the Rams No. 1, Dominique Liguori. Liguori improved to 11-0. Dixon will slate Boney in the No. 2 slot at BU as she looks to regain confidence and her strong forehand. Magdalena Ploch, coming off an easy victory against Fordham in the No. 2 match, will play No. 1 against BU.

The Minutewomen's doubles teams had no problem against Fordham, as they cruised to victory in every match. They will look for a similar performance against the Terriers.

Pending Tuesday's results, a faceoff between two undefeated teams could be in for the cards next Sunday when UMass hosts Albany. A win against BU isn't out of reach, but the match will represent the toughest competition for the Minutewomen this season. UMass will look to improve on its stellar win-loss ratio, which currently stands at 17-4.

Cotto finishes 1st to lead Minutemen

Aguguo, Bakanowski notch 2nd-place finishes for women

BY MIKE MASTONE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams turned out solid performances this weekend at the Giegengack Invitational. There were no team scores.

The men were led by junior Tyler Cotto, who continued his dominance of the 60-meter hurdles. Cotto qualified with a time of 8.32 seconds in the preliminaries, and won the finals with a time of 8.17. It was his second straight first-place finish; he is yet to finish outside of the top four in three meets.

"He is putting himself out there as one of the top hurdlers," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien.

In addition to Cotto, sophomore Jeff Hill and junior Brian Miller scored top-three finishes. Hill finished first in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 14:52.31. Miller placed second in the long jump with a distance of 22 feet, 1 inch. He also competed in the 200-meter dash and finished in the top 15. Top-10 finishes also came from sophomores Darius Velez and Sean Busch.

Velez, UMass' most impressive sprinter so far, finished sixth overall in his first 60-meter dash of the season; he clocked in a time of 7.02.

Busch continued to build on his strong start by matching his season high in the pole vault with a height of 14-03.25 inches. The vault was good enough for fourth place, his second top-five finish of the season.

"Going into the season, you have expectations based on past seasons," O'Brien said. "I thought we improved our team. Hopefully we can continue down the path we've started on."

The Minutewomen tallyied six finishes in the top 10 and enjoyed favorable performanees in the field events as well.

Second-places finishes came from sophomore Stephanie Aguguo and senior Kristen Bakanowski. Aguguo took second in the triple jump with a distance of 37-03.00. Bakanowski vaulted a height of 11-05.75. Along with Bakanowski, junior Lisa Wilson continued to be the team's anchor in the field events. Wilson placed fourth in the shot put (42-10.25) and fifth in the weight throw (49-01.75).

Sophomore Jenelle Denehy had a breakout performance with her fourth-place finish in the pole vault. The 10-6.00 vault was her best of the season. Freshman Claire Petit also scored a fourth-place finish for her 1:17.34 effort in the 500-meter run. Brittany Bakanowski (1:17.42) and Deanna Julian (1:18.10) finished right behind Petit to round out the top six in the 500.

Petit, along with the Bakanowski sisters and junior Holly Heinricher, finished second in the 4x400 meter relay. Heinricher also finished third in the 200-meter dash (25.54). Ida Okkonen gave another strong performance by finishing third in the long jump with a distanee of 17-08.25.

Both the men's and women's teams return to action this weekend for the Boston University Valentine's Invitational. The men's competition will begin Friday at 4 p.m. and resume Saturday at 11 a.m. The women's events begin Friday at 1 p.m.

Innocent plea in stabbing case

UM student held without bail after allegedly stabbing an Amherst College student Sunday

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A University of Massachusetts student pleaded not guilty to a charge of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (a knife) after being accused of stabbing an Amherst College student at an Amherst College dormitory Sunday morning.

Marcus Smith, 21, of 5 Codman Park, Apt. 3, Roxbury, Mass., a sociology major at UMass, was arraigned in Eastern Hampshire District Court in Belchertown on Monday and will be held without bail until his pre-trial hearing on March 12.

According to a probable cause statement by Amherst police Sgt. Brian Johnson, the victim, 20-year-old Issac Cameron "received six to seven stab wounds to his abdomen, back and neck areas."

Police initially responded to a report of a double stabbing at Crossett Dormitory on Sunday at around 1:10 a.m. and found Smith, also injured, in the building's basement bathroom.

"Smith stated that he had been involved in a fight with an unknown male and as a result of this fight had been stabbed in the hand," said Johnson's report. "Smith then showed me a wound to the back of his left thumb, which was a deep, clean laceration approximately three-fourth inches in length."

The report said Smith was wearing a purple T-shirt and a white undershirt which were "heavily stained with blood in several places," though police observed no additional wounds than the one on Smith's hand.

"I asked Smith if he knew who had stabbed him, and he stated he did not," wrote Johnson. "I asked him for a description of his assailant, and Smith stated he could not provide one, and that he never saw a knife."

According to Johnson, when searched by police, no weapons were found on Smith's person.

"Smith stated that he became involved in an argument with an unknown individual over a girl he was dancing with," the report said. "Smith stated he was punched in the nose by this person."

One witness, 18-year-old Cory Atkins, a freshman at Amherst College, was interviewed at the scene.

"Atkins stated that he witnessed a dark-skinned male wearing a purple and black shirt with a purple or black baseball hat involved in a physical altercation with his friend, Cameron," said Johnson's report. "Atkins did not see a knife used…[he] positively identified Smith as the individual he had witnessed fighting with Cameron."

Cameron was transported by the Amherst Fire Department to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, Mass., where he was in fair condition, said police.

Smith was brought to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton where he was treated for his hand injury and released into police custody afterwards, officials said.

Prior to his arraignment, Smith was held at the Hampshire County House of Correction in lieu of $25,000 cash bail.

Johnson's report said the bail was $50,000.

Court documents provided a statement on why Smith is now being held without bail.

"Given the serious nature of the offense and the injuries sustained during this knife attack, no condition of bail would assure the safety of the victim or the community," said the document.

The maximum penalty for Smith's charge is 10 years in prison.

The incident occurred at Crossett Dormitory on the Amherst College campus where the two men were both found with stab wounds.

UMass student Marcus Smith pleaded innocent to charges Monday.

Student papers avoid cutbacks

BY GARY TARANTINO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Due to the tough economic times this country has been facing, several commercial newspapers have had to make buyouts and layoffs in order to maintain the publishing of their daily paper. Fortunately for most student-run newspapers, this isn't the case.

The financial outlook for most student publications is fundamentally sound, said more than a dozen student editors, publishers and advertising managers of colleges and universities across the country. Most student newspapers have managed to avoid the large-scale cutbacks often found among their mainstream counterparts.

"We're not experiencing a problem," said Kevin Schwartz, general manager at The Daily Tar Heel, at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. "There's no advertising downturn for us."

The continued strength of student publications is rooted in the fact that most students pick up a printed copy of their campus paper. Nearly 80 percent of students read the print edition of their daily campus paper at least once per week, according to research by Alloy Media + Marketing, the largest national advertising placement service for college newspapers.

Even independent student newspapers, which depend on advertising revenue and typically do not receive any financial assistance from the universities they cover, are generally in good shape. They are often aided by a constant influx of students who are willing to write stories, take photographs and sell advertisements for a little or no pay.

As advertising spending on college newspapers grew last year even as it dropped off at mainstream publications. National advertisers spent an estimated $30 million on college newspapers in 2007, a 15 percent increase from the year before, according to Alloy. During the same period, total print advertising revenue at commercial newspapers fell nine percent, according to the Newspaper Association of America.

"It's a niche publication," said Logan Aimone, president of the National Scholastic Press Association. "Particularly at smaller schools, and maybe where it's a residential campus, the campus newspaper is going to be much more valuable. The

UMass Body Politics program gets award

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Women of Color Leadership Network (WOCLN) at the University of Massachusetts has received the 2009 Voice of Inclusion Medallion Award for the work done in the program, Body Politics.

"The show and project is a space for women of color because there are not a lot of places on campus or in the world where they can speak freely without censoring themselves," said senior English major Luchele Chisunka, the coordinator for this year's production of Body Politics. "Our events are so diverse that it isn't like any other network."

The award comes from the American College Personnel Association (ACPA), an international group that advances student affairs in higher education. ACPA has nearly 9,000 members, including students, faculty, private organizations and companies involved with college campuses.

"They have a committee to decide the winning program," said Hind Mari, the director of WOCLN. "We had to document the process, discuss what the program is and highlight how it promotes diversity. We included testimonies from audience members and participants in last year's program."

Body Politics is a program where women come together and work on writing or creating art for different topics facing women of color. At the end of the year, all of their work is then put together in a script to create a 90-minute performance.

Students volunteer for science

BY SARA CODY

A bearded dragon skittered across the desk in hot pursuit of a cricket while a four-foot-long ball python slithered off the edge. Peg Riley, the founder and president of the Massachusetts Academy of Sciences (MAS), laughed as the lizard was chomping away, and invited the golden brown snake, known as Monty The Python, to entwine itself around her wrist.

Monty serves as the mascot of the newly created, nonprofit MAS organization, and is often aboard when the MAS attends such events.

Whether it is a visit to a kindergarten or the annual conference of the American Academy for the Advancement of Science, the goal is always to inspire and excite.

"Monty helps [the MAS] engage individuals of all ages, and although we claim he is there to excite the kids, we often find the adults charmed and engaged by his presence," Riley said.

A professor of biology at the University of Massachusetts, Riley believes that creating a more intimate atmosphere is critical to inspiring interest in science, and these outreach efforts are the best way to do this.

"As much as I would love to say that my greatest love is being in front of people talking about the MAS, in fact, my passion is to have Monty twined about my neck and see some little kid who's afraid of snakes, decide to give it a go," she said. "All of a sudden you have this photo of them smiling with the snake wrapped around their arms."

"Anything that I do that inspires, educates or transforms an individual I feel is my own personal mark on humanity," continued Riley. "My goal is to touch as many people on a one-on-one basis as possible. I prefer to touch a few people in great depth and get them jazzed about something than to reach the masses and not be able to inspire as deeply or as richly."

Riley's first encounter with a state academy of sciences came 10 years ago when she was on sabbatical at Stanford University in California. Her good friend Professor Ward Watt served as the president of the California Academy of Sciences, which was founded in 1853.

Riley saw firsthand everything that the Cal Academy was doing, both to promote public interest in science and to support the professional scientists. Whether it was a scientist looking for a grant, a science teacher looking for a professional development seminar, or a mother wanting to take her kids on an educational day trip, the Cal Academy was there.

In September 2008, the Academy opened the doors of its brand new home. The new building has a green, eco-friendly design, and boasts an aquarium, a planetarium, a natural history museum and a four-story jungle. The roof itself is literally green; it's covered in native plants and turf in an ingeniously biocngineered design.

Riley was so impressed by the Cal Academy that she could not wait to return home and check out the Bay State's equivalent.

She said she was surprised when she found no such organization existed in Massachusetts.

"I thought it was just a crazy oversight on all our parts," Riley said.

Over the next few years, she cultivated the idea of starting an academy in Massachusetts. In 2007, she finally translated that vision into reality.

She reached out to everyone around her to see if she could garner interest in establishing an academy. To her delight, a group of people rapidly assembled to help.

"An extraordinary team just sort of fell together out of the people who I knew in my lab, friends and colleagues that I could convince to even think of this," said Riley.

This group of volunteers joined together out of their love for science and education to create the foundation that is the Massachusetts Academy of Sciences.

Everyone involved in the project understands the importance of having an academy of sciences, and shared in Riley's disbelief that Massachusetts was one of six states in the country that did not already have such an academy.

Gabrielle Bouton, an undergraduate working in Riley's lab, was quick to jump on board with the project as soon as she heard about it.

"I couldn't believe that this type of organization hadn't been created in Massachusetts," said Bouton, who now serves as the assistant director of outreach. "I really wanted to help make the MAS a reality so that it could become something more tangible that people could start to use as a resource for information."

Carla Goldstone, the director of operations said, "It is important that we have an organization that can act as an umbrella for all the wonderful programs and opportunities that exist in the state and help the community find them."

Riley agreed.

"We are the premier state in the nation with respect to scientific industry if you will, biotechnology, computer science, things of that nature, and one outcome of that focus is an enormous wealth of information," said Riley. "We also host some of the greatest universities on the planet and all of this combined talent is producing massive amounts of information and tools, resources, and there is no entity that is designed to sort of collect, collate and distribute this information to the appropriate user groups."

The MAS team has created a list of priority activities.

At the top of that list is the creation of a comprehensive and engaging website, which is the virtual home of the MAS (http://www.massacadsciences.org).

"With respect to science education, scientific research, and the application of that research to industry, community and outreach, this site should be one of the most impressive websites in our nation," said Riley.

The MAS hopes to compile as many resources, links and other information to create the place to go for such information in Massachusetts.

Among the long-term goals of the MAS is the desire for science education reform.

"Looking further down the road, issues such as teacher training, professional development, and assessing how classrooms and schools labs are equipped are all items that will need to be addressed," said Michael Bertrand, the director of education. "An example of one important current issue is how [standardized tests] influence the way some teachers are feeling compelled to 'teach to the test.' One way the MAS can absolutely help in addressing these and other issues is through advocacy from a position of authority on science matters."

Since announcing its existence at the American Academy for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) Conference in Boston in February 2007, the MAS has made enormous strides in achieving its goals, including a meeting with Lieutenant Governor Tim Murray.

COURTESY MAS

Volunteer and UMass senior Mike Valliere admires the corn snake at a convention in Boston.

"They see the importance of science and science education in the 21st century. The Governor's office seems very keen to coordinate all the efforts across the state and make it more accessible to the general public," said Goldstone. "[The MAS] hopes to help in creating an inventory of these programs and will play a coordinating role."

The MAS has also worked to coordinate several outreach events at schools across the state. Teachers are invited to contact the MAS and make appointments for the Academy to visit and provide interactive, engaging science demonstrations for the students, free of charge.

The MAS already has an impressive list of such visits.

Bouton's favorite event was National Astronomy Day, held in Brookline this past year.

"I got to answer questions kids had about science. Doing liquid nitrogen demonstrations with kids and explaining to them how it works is really rewarding because I know that I might have inspired a child to take interest in science," she said.

As for Sandra Robinson, the MAS director of volunteers, her favorite event was a trip to Natick High School.

"Young adults who normally have no interest in school, let alone science, gave us their full attention and were excited about our demonstrations," said Robinson. "To see the love of science peaked in someone makes all of our hard work worth it."

Being a part of the MAS can create rewarding experiences for all involved.

Both Riley and Goldstone find that interacting with the people they have the opportunity to meet is the best part of the MAS.

"From the children that are inspired, to the scientists that exhibit such passion for their work, and the community members that are glad to have a resource to go to when they have questions or want to incorporate science into their family's lives. It is always worthwhile when you feel like you are making a difference in people's lives and making them think a little bit more," said Goldstone.

Given all of its ambitious goals, one of the most important and emphasized efforts of the academy is coordinating a strong volunteer base. They're tapping into the students at UMass.

"Students have such energy and passion in the things they do. It is a great way to share that with kids and the community," said Goldstone.

By volunteering with the MAS, UMass students have the opportunity to be a role model for younger generations.

There are many reasons why students should consider volunteering for the MAS, said Bouton.

"There are so many different things to do. We need people to go to events, create podcasts and do various administrative tasks. You can do whatever it is that you find interesting," she said.

"By getting involved in the MAS, you are helping create an atmosphere conducive to greater scientific achievement for everyone and you are definitely paving your way to more and better college and career opportunities in the sciences when others see your record of achievement in MAS activities," Bertrand agreed.

The MAS is currently offering an exclusive internship for UMass students during the Spring 2009 semester. Members of the internship, Bio398D, will receive school credit while creating science-themed podcasts and learning the procedure of an MAS outreach visit.

Students will learn the basics of filming and film editing, planning and executing an interesting podcast while also being able to work with Monty, the hall python, and learning impressive liquid nitrogen demonstrations.

The class meets twice a week, on Mondays and Wednesdays in the BCRC, Morrill 4S, Room 370 from 10 to 11:30 a.m.

Performance comes to UM

WOCLN's award-winning Body Politics performance will come to the UMass campus on April 16 to 17 in Bowker Auditorium.

"This is our major program, and it is the only one that takes the whole academic year," said Mari. "It is a deep process, and these women work together very closely."

In the fall, applications are sent to participate in Body Politics, followed by interviews. In addition to regular meetings, there is a full-day retreat that the women go on to get to know each other better.

The Body Politics program from last year that won the award had Chisunka as one of the participants. The theme to it was "Remaining True to Yourself While a Woman of Color."

Some of the participants last year talked about immigration, miscarriages, political unrest, as well as several other topics.

"People in the audience came up to us afterwards and said, 'I can relate to that,' or 'it changed my life,'" said Chisunka. "Body Politics brings up subjects that can't be talked about in public and that are sensitive issues."

Although the theme this year is still under discussion, they are working on the script now and trying to more political and socially aware this year. The director this spring will be Iris Jacob, a graduate student.

There are other programs that WOCLN provides, but they are not so long and involved as Body Politics. The group does workshops on healthy eating, yoga, open mic nights and participates with Residence Life to have dorm dialogues.

"Last semester, the Res Life programs were about the importance of voting and elections, including information on all of the candidates," said Mari. "The programs that we provide have things to do with women's health issues, women of color issues or could be any other type of special issue."

WOCLN was created in 1993 to work with women of color and give them a place to talk about issues facing them, to give support and make connections. It is located in Wilder Hall on campus.

"A woman who was part of WOCLN referred me to the network and told me if I was ever lost or confused, had questions or just wanted to make friends, it was a safe haven," said Chisunka.

This year's Body Politics performance will be held in Bowker Auditorium April 16 and 17 at 7 p.m and is free and open to the public.

Several papers face difficulties

target audience is highly sought after by advertisers."

Student newspapers are not entirely immune to the changes in readership and advertising spending that have severely cut into the profits of much of the newspaper industry. This past August, two prominent independent student publications, The Daily Californian at the University of California at Berkeley and The Daily Orange at Syracuse University, have announced that financial difficulties will force them to cut print publication from five days a week to four.

Other student newspapers are facing financial difficulties more quietly.

The Daily Bruin, the independent student newspaper at the University of California at Los Angeles, is projected to lose "a few thousand dollars" this year because of a slower advertising market, said its editor-in-chief, Anthony Pesce.

Finances are sound at The Independent Florida Alligator, but it has cut back a few full-time staff positions and trips to conferences in recent years to save money, said Patricia Carey, the paper's general manager.

Harry Montevideo, publisher of The Red and Black at the University of Georgia, said that the student paper has seen a substantial decrease in advertising from both the university and local small businesses, a dip he traces to "a double whammy" of state budget cutbacks and a weak economy.

Even when student newspapers do run into difficulties, most of them have one other major advantage over mainstream papers.

"They don't need to make a lot of money," said Schwartz.

Back support for kids

A Children's Hospital Oakland surgeon uses a model of the human spinal column to explain to 5-year-old Mikey Markwardt the metal rods that he inserted into the boy's spine to treat a rare form of scoliosis.

Hope for children with spinal-deformations

BY SANDY KLEEFMAN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

OAKLAND, Calif. — Five-year-old Mikey Markwardt attracts more than a few glances as he maneuvers with his walker through a waiting room at Children's Hospital Oakland.

Both of his hips are dislocated. One leg is shorter than the other. He wears a brace after undergoing surgery for a severe spinal deformity. Yet none of this slows him down.

Sporting a new Mohawk haircut, he moves speedily and chatters constantly.

"Can I go play over there?" he asks.

"As long as you get suctioned first," says his stepfather, Richard Gould, who uses a machine to clear Mikey's tracheotomy. Mikey heads off to play, pretending he is a server at a fast-food restaurant.

Five to 10 years ago, medical experts would have had little to offer Mikey, said Dr. James Policy, a pediatric orthopedic surgeon.

But today, new devices and techniques make it possible for surgeons to do spine-straightening operations on small children. As a result, more help is available for those with scoliosis and other spinal deformities.

"It's great that Mikey and other kids like him now do have some treatment options that were not available until fairly recently," Policy said.

Mikey has a rare genetic disorder known as Larsen syndrome, which occurs in about one in 100,000 people.

First described in 1950 by orthopedic surgeon Joseph Larsen, the condition can lead to dislocations of major joints, foot deformities, abnormal curvature of the spine and other problems.

It also can soften cartilage in the windpipe, making it difficult to swallow and breathe. That explains Mikey's tracheotomy, an opening cut in the front of his neck.

Policy has seen two other children with Larsen syndrome during his career. Neither had as severe a spinal deformity as Mikey.

When Mikey was a baby, medical experts at a hospital near the family's Santa Rosa, Calif., home told them he would never walk.

"We proved them wrong," said his mother, Rachel Markwardt.

After Mikey turned 2, the family brought him to Children's Hospital Oakland for care because doctors there provided more hope.

Even before his November surgery, Mikey used a walker to get around, but his worsening spinal problems threatened to jeopardize that ability and he often complained about back pain.

"It is pretty impressive that he's even able to walk at all," Policy said.

In addition to other medical problems, Mikey has kyphoscoliosis, a combination of kyphosis, which causes his vertebrae to curve forward and form a hump in his back, and the more common scoliosis, which causes his spine to bulge to the side.

"As the deformity was getting worse and worse, it was pinching off his spinal cord," Policy said. "So if it had been allowed to continue, he most likely would have ended up being paralyzed. The second problem is that it was taking away the space in his chest cavity for his heart and lungs to function. That can have some pretty serious long-term consequences as well."

Policy decided to operate. The goal: attach metal rods to Mikey's spine to keep it straighter and give his heart and lungs a chance to mature. The rods contain lengthening devices. About every six months, Mikey will return for surgery to extend the rods to keep pace with his growth.

This procedure is common for people with spinal deformities, but only in recent years have physicians been able to use it on smaller bodies. Mikey stands 36 inches tall and weighs 32 pounds.

"There just weren't implants or devices that were small enough to use in younger children, and the techniques hadn't really been developed," Policy said.

Before installing the rods, doctors put Mikey in traction for several weeks to straighten his spine as much as possible. Pins were inserted into Mikey's skull and connected to what looked like a halo, a metal ring around his head. Sixteen pounds of weights could be attached to the halo to force Mikey into a straighter stance.

The hospital uses the traction technique on three or four children a year.

"It just provides a constant stretch on the spine to help straighten it out gradually and safely over time so that we don't have to do an acute correction during the surgery," Policy said. "That's easier on the spinal cord."

Mikey had traction devices on his wheelchair, walker and bed. This enabled him to move around the hospital and play video games with other children or kick a ball in the hallway with his mother.

On Oct. 30, Mikey had been in the hospital 44 days. He planned to dress up as a pirate the next day for Halloween and had tied a pirate flag to his walker.

"Aye, aye, captain," he said in his best pirate's voice. "Aaarrrrh."

"He's got the whole hospital wrapped around his finger," his mother said.

Mikey's classmates from the Santa Rosa Charter School for the Arts made a book with drawings for him titled "What I like about Mikey."

"I like your courage," his teacher wrote. "I'm sending you rainbows and happy thoughts."

His mother spent most nights at the hospital, sleeping in a bed in his room.

"I feel bad leaving him. I tell all my friends that I left my heart in Oakland and that he's hanging in there," she said, glancing at his wire-and-rope traction device. "That's my joke."

On Nov. 4, Policy inserted the metal rods and fused vertebrae at the top and bottom of his spine to anchor them.

Mikey has since returned home and recently came back to the hospital for a checkup. "This X-ray looks good," Policy told him.

The hope is that Mikey's body will tolerate the rods and extensions until he is between 12 and 14, Policy said. When the rods are removed, surgeons will probably fuse the spine so that it becomes one solid bone to prevent further deformity.

"If we could get Mikey to 10 years old before we had to do a more definitive surgery, I would be very, very happy," Policy said.

Mikey's condition is so unusual that his family has known only one other child with Larsen syndrome. They met the girl once, and then the family moved away. There have been no others.

Despite his tremendous challenges, Mikey seems to have endless energy and an enthusiastic, spirited personality. "Feisty" is how many describe him.

He will return to school soon. His mother is pleased that, since the surgery, he can stand straighter and has not complained about pain. Other surgeries may be on the horizon, including one to lengthen his leg, but for now, the family is glad to be home and watching his progress.

"I just want him to be able to do anything he wants to do," his mother said. "That's why we fight so hard."

Massive stimulus bill gets Senate approval

BY ROBERT SCHROEDER
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama hailed the passage of a massive economic-stimulus bill in the U.S. Senate Tuesday, saying it's a good start for House and Senate negotiators to hammer out a final version later this week.

Senators approved the $838 billion bill by a vote of 61 to 37, handing the president a legislative victory on a measure that he says will save or create as many as 4 million jobs and help the economy recover from the recession.

The Senate bill is a mixture of tax cuts, targeted spending on infrastructure projects and money infusions for cash-strapped states. It includes a home-buying tax credit, relief from the alternative minimum tax, billions of dollars for energy and water construction and $39 billion for the states.

House and Senate negotiators were scheduled to begin the hard work of reconciling the two competing versions of the bill almost immediately following passage in the Senate. Obama wants to sign it before the end of the week.

The Senate and House versions of the plan are largely similar, but the Senate's bill has more tax cuts than the House's, by about $110 billion. The $819 billion House bill doesn't include a $15,000 homebuying credit or AMT relief. House lawmakers also want to restore $14 billion for school construction and repair that the Senate stripped out. The Senate version also roughly cut in half money for states.

Obama got word that the bill passed during a town-hall meeting he was holding in Ft. Myers, Fla., a city hard-hit by the recession. The crowd cheered when Obama announced that senators approved the bill.

"That's good news," Obama told attendees. "We've got a little more work to do over the next couple days," he said, referring to the House-Senate compromise bill.

Republicans Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine, joined Democrats to back the measure. Other GOP lawmakers staunchly opposed it.

"This so-called stimulus package is a disgrace and represents a continuation of government's unfocused response to our economic problems," said Sen. Richard Shelby of Alabama, a former chairman of the Senate Banking Committee.

Meanwhile, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called for House and Senate negotiators to act swiftly to get the compromise bill to Obama's desk as soon as possible.

"The time for debate on this legislation was productive, but it is now over," Reid said. "With common sense as our compass, we must now answer the urgent call for action."

Obama has used extremely stark language to press the case for the bill, warning of economic "catastrophe" if lawmakers don't send him the package soon. But Republicans dug in their heels in opposition to the huge measure, saying it's too expensive and touting an alternative, tax-cut-heavy measure they say will better kick-start growth and save jobs.

Obama has lambasted that approach publicly, saying during a prime-time news conference Monday night that cutting taxes isn't the answer.

"As we learned very clearly and conclusively over the last eight years, tax cuts alone cannot solve all our economic problems, especially tax cuts that are targeted to the wealthiest few Americans," Obama told reporters at the White House. Read more.

Obama's trip to Ft. Myers is his second outside of Washington this week. On Monday, he stumped for the stimulus plan in Elkhart, Ind.

On Tuesday, U.S. stocks traded sharply lower, playing to a large degree off the remarks of Treasury Secretary Tim Geithner as he unveiled the new administration's plan to shore up the financial system and stem the recession. See Market Snapshot.

Reaching out to the public and overwhelmingly skeptical Republicans Monday night, Obama said that the plan isn't perfect. "I can't tell you for sure that everything in this plan will work exactly as we hope, but I can tell you with complete confidence that a failure to act will only deepen this crisis as well as the pain felt by millions of Americans," the president commented.

Just three Republicans, the same trio who supported final passage Tuesday, voted to move the plan forward in the Senate on Monday. None voted for it in the House, citing its impact on the deficit, among other reasons.

Republicans in both chambers of Congress remained deeply skeptical of the plan.

"The American people need our help, and they deserve better than this," House Republican Leader John Boehner said late Monday. "It is not too late to craft a bipartisan plan that creates more jobs and helps get our economy back on track, and Republicans stand ready to work with the president to do this."

But business groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers are supporting the Senate bill.

Online ballots legitimize SGA

The only number lower than the amount of University of Massachusetts students who can name their student body president is the number of people who actually voted in the election last March.

Malcolm Chu won the election without much of a struggle last year. He received more than three times as many votes as rival candidate Derek Khanna. Considering he received so many more votes than Khanna, you'd think that equated to something of mandate from the student body.

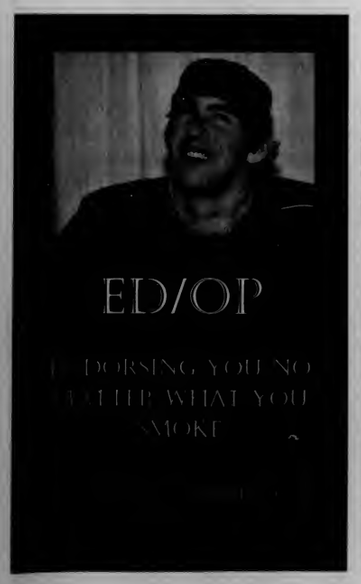
There's another piece of information that not only disqualifies any talk of a mandate, but also begs the question as to how Chu can even call himself the president of the entire student body. He received 1,523 votes from the student body compared to 475 for Khanna. The two leading candidates for Student Government Association president at a university with 18,720 undergraduates garnered fewer than 2,000 total votes.

Chu was the best candidate at the time given his resume and dedication to the UMass student body; but, with the University stuck in the transitional period it's in, more students need to vote and the process must be less cumbersome.

Chu and the SGA have discussed several remedies to draw more students to the polls, and now it seems as though they have their answer. Chancellor of Elections Sean McNair will present his plan to move all SGA elections online Wednesday night for general vote.

The online voting discussion was inevitable considering the progression of everything else at UMass; tuition bills aren't even mailed anymore. On a larger scale, like national, state or municipal elections, online voting is one big scandal waiting to happen. But the system proposed by McNair and backed by the brains at the Office of Information Technology is as secure as it can get.

The UMass community is just small enough to make it work, too. Any vote received is protected by the same firewall as Spire. If you'll leave your social security number and all other personal information on the system, an SGA election ballot shouldn't be much too worry about. No one involved in the election will be able to see who voted for whom.



There are more potential issues, but a few over-the-shoulder votes is a risk worth taking if more students will vote – you don't even have to close your Facebook account to do it. And a vote influenced by a friend isn't any worse than one influenced by a pushy candidate or constituent with a vested interest in the election's outcome.

The SGA's primary charges are to distribute student activities money – $47 from each undergraduate – and to protect the best interest of the student body. More people will vote if they don't have to leave their room to do it, and the SGA's stance will be more valid given a stronger percentage of student participation. The online ballots will even save money in the raw man-hours it takes to run voting stations and count the ballots.

Within the SGA, Chu and Student Trustee Lindsay McCluskey are the most ardent opponents of the measure. They're concerned about the dangers of the system, and protecting the integrity of the institution is partially their charge. But how much integrity can they really claim if fewer than 13 percent of the student body even casts a ballot?

Bittersweet Caroline

Ben Moriarty

I finally lost my virginity.

For my mom's sake, I should clarify that I'm talking about my UMass sports virginity.

After playing sports year-round my entire life and spending three years at this University, it took me a surprisingly long time to attend an athletic event here. But, to kill some time and for a column, I finally went to one: a hockey game.

Bring someone who never played hockey, or has ever really cared all too much about hockey, I didn't know what to expect – besides what I've heard about the games. This obviously includes rambunctious behavior, swearing at the other team, secretly drinking alcohol and, for me and my friends, quietly laughing at the people around us.

When Coach "Toot" Cahoon wrote to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian this past week, telling us students to keep it clean, I was expecting behavior to be slightly worse than it was – unless students actually did tone it down for some reason, which I sincerely doubted.

Yes, the fans proclaimed that every single starter on the other team sucked, gave the opponent that was going into the penalty box a farewell with a special little pet name attached on the end and then sang a chant featuring a four-letter word that was not coherent for anyone and especially not for sober little rascals. On the whole, though, the fans were relatively decent and very similar to other fans and crowds – granted swearing in front of children isn't the best thing to do.

But Toot, my friend of days, is that really what you are so worried about, when so many more, and worse things, have happened?

I don't think I even have to mention it; but, Toot, can't you complain about the song selection?

As embarrassed as I feel during the eighth inning at Fenway, I was tenfold more embarrassed when I heard "Sweet Caroline" playing at a UMass hockey game.

I used to think of hockey fans as being manly and tough, with parents beating each other up over frivolous calls and hockey moms almost becoming vice president of the United States because they have sex appeal. Not anymore.

Now I think of them as Sweet Caroliners who sing bad pop songs in the middle of what is apparently country music night at the Mullins Center. The same school which gave birth to the Pixies was singing Sweet Caroline.

Really.

I used to think of hockey fans as being manly and tough…not anymore.

I'm figuring it all was for fun. But when I realized that one of the prizes in a contest at the hockey game was a 15-minute ride on the Zamboni, I started to think that someone was playing a sick and twisted joke on me. Unless the driver of the Zamboni was Stephen Hawking, I don't see how that would be fun after 30 seconds.

I went to what I expected would be a contemplative, fast-paced and physical game. And it was, no doubt. The players were impressive, and I'm not just saying that because I don't want to be beaten up. After all, this is the hockey team, not the lacrosse team.

The game itself is intriguing, but going as a college student wasn't as fun as I thought it would be. Maybe shouting profanities at athletes has lost its flair for me from all the other sporting events I've been to. Or maybe I just realized saying someone I don't know sucks because they're on another team just isn't that fun to me anymore.

Sure, there is some fun for a heckler. But like I said, it wasn't even that big of a part of going anyway – it was overshadowed by something worse. Perhaps it was just the moron behind me who kept trying to start a "Yankees suck" chant that turned me off or the drunk guy a few rows in front of me who kept trying to get people to look at him.

So while I probably will go to another game, it won't be because I want to engage in the chants Toot hates. Nor will I not do them because I think I'm mature because I am making fun of half the people that went right now.

I'll go because Toot is right. The players deserve people who go to support them. There are obviously many, many people that go because they do. But strictly judging from one appearance, with so many also blathering about nothing during the game and only making noise when it's an insult to the other team, it only makes sense that there was more emotion for many during the singing of Sweet Caroline than there was at any point in the rest of the game.

So Toot, thank God for the swearing, because there is nothing a fan could say that could be worse on a child than having them believe being a beach-ball hitting, Sweet Caroline singing hockey fan who is only going to talk to their friends and occasionally make insults is cool.

A terrorist in politician's clothing

Zamil Akhtar

"If they don't stop after we kill 100, then we must kill 1,000. And if they do not stop after 1,000, then we must kill 10,000. If they still don't stop we must kill 100,000 – even a million. Whatever it takes to make them stop."

These could be the words of a terrorist, pontificating about killing Americans. But these are not. These are the words of a prominent Israeli rabbi, Mordechai Eliyahu, written about the people of Gaza.

According to The Jerusalem Post, these words were addressed to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and were also distributed to synagogues across Israel in a letter written in May 2007. The letter stated that "all civilians living in Gaza are collectively guilty for Qassam (rocket) attacks," and "there was absolutely no moral prohibition against the indiscriminate killing of civilians during a potential massive military offensive on Gaza."

More than a year after the distribution of this letter, 1,284 Palestinians have been killed in "Operation Cast Lead," Israel's war on Gaza. According to the Palestinian Center for Human Rights, 894 of the dead are civilians, 280 are children, 4,336 people have been injured and over 1,000 are children in serious condition.

"The more Qassam fire intensifies and the rockets reach a longer range, they will bring upon themselves a bigger holocaust because we will use all our might to defend ourselves."

These were not the words of an extremist rabbi, but the words of the Israeli Deputy Defense Minister, Matan Vilnai. Some 4,000 homes were destroyed in Israel's three-week bombing campaign, leaving 50,000 people homeless. According to the UN, the bombing destroyed about 50 percent of Gaza's agriculture industry. About 80 percent of the people are now dependent on humanitarian assistance in a territory regularly shut from all sides.

"[There is] a biblical ban on surrendering a single millimeter of [the Land of Israel] to gentiles. We will not abandon it to the hands of another nation, not a finger, not a nail of it."

This is an excerpt from a publication entitled "Daily Torah studies for the soldier and the commander in Operation Cast Lead," which is distributed to Israeli soldiers operating in Gaza. According to Haaretz, the publication equates the Palestinians with the biblical Philistines, a race of people the early Jews were commanded to expel from Israel in the Bible.

The publication was "written by an ultranationalist rabbi identified with the Jewish settler movement in the West Bank." There are 475,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank and East Jerusalem living in walled enclaves guarded by thousands of soldiers. There are 2.3 million Palestinians in the same area. There are 600 checkpoints barring Palestinians from traversing their own land. Palestinians are not allowed to travel on most of the highways, which Israel has deemed "Jewish only."

Haaretz reported that in Hebron, in December 2008, a gang of masked settlers attacked the house of a Palestinian family. The gang set fire to the house and shattered windows as the women inside cried for help. Watching the assault, hundreds of settlers shouted suggestions to the attackers on how to harm the family more effectively. The Israeli army personnel nearby did not call for backup until after the house was destroyed. Prime Minister Olmert called this assault a "pogrom." Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad called it "terrorism."

Prime Minister Olmert called this assault a "pogrom." Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad called it "terrorism."

"It is past time for a secure and just two-state solution. We will work to achieve it, and to defeat the extremists who would perpetuate the conflict," said Vice President Biden. But there can be no Palestinian state with the 121 Israeli settlements appropriating 40 percent of West Bank land, all of which is illegal according to the International Court of Justice in the Hague.

There can be no Palestinian state with Israel controlling all the water in the West Bank, channeling 80 percent of it to Israelis and leaving only 20 percent for Palestinians. The World Health Organization recommends a minimum of 100 liters of water per day for a human being. The average Israeli settler consumes 280 liters of water per day. The average Palestinian consumes 60.

"Settlements prevent the establishment of a Palestinian state in the land of Israel – this is the goal and this is the reality," said Daniella Weiss, mayor of a large Israeli settlement, in an interview with CBS 60 Minutes.

Believing they are on a mission from God to populate the land, CBS reports that the settlers have violently resisted orders by the government to vacate houses built without proper permits. As a result, the government is "loathe" to evict settlers, fearing religious revolts would "rip Israel apart."

For Palestinians, house demolitions continue as settlement construction rose by 60 percent in 2007, according to Peace Now. According to the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions, from 1967 to 2006, 18,147 Palestinian houses were demolished by the Israeli government in order to make room for Israeli settling – and its "punishment."

"No one is suffering more than the Palestinian people."

These are the words of then-candidate Barack Obama. Since 1948, billions of dollars from the American taxpayer have purchased this suffering, and will continue to, unless you do something to stop it.

Life's short, enjoy the little things

Matt Kushi

"Time is of the essence," is a saying that almost everyone has heard since they were born.

What it truly means is that we need to treasure what we have in front of us in the present. In order to do that, we need to pay attention to the small things in life. Only then can we enjoy life to its full potential.

This past weekend, I learned that lesson all over again. A simple experience that I had moved me enough to reconsider what the phrase "time is of the essence" means.

This event was my great uncle's funeral.

My great-uncle, Uncle Karl, was 84 years old when he "slipped the surly bonds of Earth" and put out his hand to touch the face of God. On a day celebrating a life so full, what I remembered were the small things.

While standing in the church in Northampton, I recall just looking at a picture of him above his memorial and thinking that the man in that picture, leaning on his car window in the middle of a meadow, was really gone. I remember, in the eulogy, we were asked to think of one happy memory of him. What I remembered was a simple card game of pitch on New Years Eve. I remember him with his wife when I was little.

What moved me the most was the ceremony at the cemetery. Since Uncle Karl courageously served in the United States Navy during World War II, he was given a military honor at the cemetery. I vividly remember hearing the birds sing as a recording of "Taps" was played and the United States flag was folded.

So many small memories in a life so large. While standing in that cemetery, I got to thinking about how short life is.

The 84 years may seem like a long time when you think about it quickly in generational terms. But if you look at 84 years in the total of all of that time, you come to realize 84 years is not long at all.

Undergraduates on this campus are generally in our late teens or early 20s. We aren't thinking about when we will be called from this Earth yet. But if you look again, you will realize that roughly a quarter of our lives have already gone by.

We need to stop searching for the big moments and learn to enjoy the small moments that make up our days.

What we need to do is slow life down. I don't mean actually slow it down with some scientific formula. I mean slow it down in the sense that we purely enjoy what we are doing with our lives.

Live life for all it is worth. See the things for what they are in all of their strength and beauty.

When you are walking to class one day, listen to the birds sing. Listen to the wind rustle the leaves on the trees. Stand for a moment and watch the ripples of the pond as a drop of morning dew gently falls into the water. Enjoy the small things in life for what they are.

We need to enjoy the time that we've been given to live on this Earth. So often we procrastinate and say that we will do something later. How do we know that we have so many "later" moments to lean upon?

If you love someone, let them know. If you want to let a friend know that they are a great person, tell them. If you want to tell your family that they are your rock, make sure that they know that. Who knows how many opportunities are out there.

From the movie "Field of Dreams," there is a line from Burt Lancaster's character that perfectly exemplifies what I am trying to say.

"You know, we just don't recognize the most significant moments of our lives while they're happening. Back then I thought, well, there'll be other days. I didn't realize that that was the only day."

The point that I got in the past few weeks, when two people I knew passed away, the other being the school nurse from my high school, is that we must treasure the time that we are on this Earth with the utmost preciousness.

In order to do that, we need to stop searching for the big moments and learn to enjoy the small moments that make up our days.

Life is a strange and sweet adventure that runs too quickly, an adventure that we need to savor each step of the way. Through it all, we never stop learning, and we never stop being inspired by those around us – whether they are living or dead.

Sometimes, the greatest lessons learned come from the simplest moments of life, whether that be a birth or a death. I know that I have learned and been inspired all over again about the preciousness of time while standing on a snow-filled cemetery listening to "Taps" in honor of a good man.

Focus on Wall's fall

Multicultural Film Festival kicks off tonight at UMass

BY CAROLINE SCANNELL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Today is the first screening for the 16th annual Massachusetts Multicultural Film Festival, a series of film screenings curated by Catherine Portuges through the interdepartmental program in film studies.

This year, in celebration of the 20-year anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall, the films are related by the overarching theme "Beyond Walls," centering on the post-Soviet reclamation of former Eastern Bloc states and the domino effect the 1989 uprisings had in redefining communism across the globe.

The films' goals are to communicate the influence of socialist government on daily life in a number of countries, including Romania, Hungary, Russia, Cuba, Hong Kong, Germany, Israel, China, Korea, Turkey, Lebanon and the Czech Republic. Additionally, the festival incorporates a sub-theme that focuses on children and youth, which Portuges explains as "offering the viewer a powerful connection to their experience of events beyond their control."

This year's line up features a number of award-winning films and international film festival entries from across the globe, including best screenplay winner "The Edge of Heaven" at the Cannes Film Festival, Freedom of Expression Award winner, "Repatriation" at the Sundance Film Festival, Hungary's official Academy Awards selection of "Iska's Journey" and Toronto International Film Festival's Contemporary World Cinema selection, "The Biggest Chinese Restaurant in the World."

Additionally, the program will showcase debut films from young filmmakers along side the films of established directors, many of who will attend the screening of their works and be present for follow-up discussion.

Portuges writes, "We try to mix groundbreaking films from new talents with those by seasoned directors from around the world." This spring's visiting filmmakers include Ibtisam Mara'ana, Marina Goldovskaya and possibly Weijun Chen.

Portuges will welcome distinguished speakers from within the Five Colleges and the academic community at large. Notable speakers include Emeritus Professor Thomas Elaesser from the University of Amsterdam and visiting professor at Yale University who will deliver a lecture on the occasion of the inauguration of the University of Massachusetts graduate certificate in film studies program.

The festival opens tonight with the showing of a Romanian film titled "The Way I Spent the End of the World" ("Cum Mi-am Petrecut Sfarsitul Lumii"). The film takes place in 1989 in Bucharest during the waning days of Ceausescu's rule. It focuses on the plight of 17-year-old Eva, who attempts to swim across the Danube to Bulgaria to escape the cruel regime after being punished for accidentally shattering a bust of Ceausescu in her school. Her younger brother in response engineers a ploy to assassinate the dictator, whom he blames for his sister's decision to leave, while performing in a children's concert in the hope of keeping Eva on his side of the river.

The film falls under the Romanian New Wave genre, a film movement that is helping to resurrect a crippled Romanian film industry. "The Way I Spent the End of the World" is the first feature film for director Catalin Mitulescu, which has been lauded by critics for its portrayal of unheroic people living their lives quietly in fear of the regime until the revolution suddenly shook society to its core.

Mitulescu's realist style incorporates some newsreel footage from the uprisings, but avoids the kind of pessimism that has characterized earlier Romanian cinema's depiction of post-communist reality. To offset the brutality of the actual events, film critic Dana Duma describes Mitulescu's deliberate pairing of the historical footage with an "exaggerated happy ending in candy colors." Film critic Martha Fischer comments on elements of the production that, "done differently, they would have been cloying and unbearable, but in his [Mitulescu's] hands they're imbued with a wonderful, impossible innocence."

Mitulescu explains his film "reflects that combination of sadness and happiness, reality and imagination that I associate with that time. It is a tragic-comedy with shades of the absurd and sublime. It explains the emotion of that era in Romania and gives a clue of what we are

See FILM on page 7

"The Way I Spent the End of the World" will be shown tonight, setting up the rest of the festival and giving viewers an idea of what to expect from the rest of the festival's selections.

Martin talks about 'Important Things'

Demetri Martin's new show on Comedy Central will be a showcase of his everyday humor and talents. The show is another step in Martin's career after leaving law school.

BY ANGELA STASIOWSKI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Demetri Martin is not like other comedians. He does not want you to laugh at his intellectual superiority or his showy displays of wit. He wants you to laugh at the important things.

The stand-up comedian's latest endeavor, a sketch comedy show for Comedy Central aptly dubbed "Important Things with Demetri Martin," premiers tonight at 10:30 p.m.

The recipe for Martin's genius calls for the examination of a simple thought or concept, a dash of thoughtful introspection and a pinch of fresh perspective. Just add water and Martin's concoction creates humor from the humdrum of the everyday.

A pioneer of wordplay, he approaches the "important thing" from every possible angle, leaving no leaf unturned in his quest for comedic enlightenment.

Throughout each episode, Martin showcases his arsenal of self-proclaimed "useless talents," including singing, standup, drawing, juggling, unicycle riding, dancing, pen-twirling and the occasional comedy sketch to boot.

The first episode, which zeroes in on "Timing" deals with everything from time travel to the proper time to arrive at a rave through illustrations, stand up and skits.

As a young man from a Greek Orthodox family in New Jersey, Martin was always a precocious individual with a knack for making people laugh.

The best and worst dressed at the Grammys

JULIE HOLBROOK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Katy Perry took a step away from her usual outlandish and zany vintage style and rocked this classy yet funky gown by up-and-coming Lebanese designer, Basil Soda. The sparkly bow adds zest to the bubble-gum pink gown. The matching lip color along with Perry's cropped brunette curls give the ensemble edge and pizzazz. Katy Perry dresses for the occasion by keeping it fun, yet not going over the top.

COURTESY MSN.COM

Carrie Underwood brings class and elegance in this Zuhair Murad creation. The silhouette fits her body beautifully, and the gold sits well on her skin tone. The sequence and bead work pull it all together and give the gown a little something extra. Underwood's casually pulled-back hair and chic earrings pull the look together.

COURTESY MSN.COM

Jason Mraz looks cool and casual in his Alexander McQueen suit. He takes a regular gray men's couture suit and gave it his own personal edge and flare. The teal pattern tie, fedora and Converse Chuck Taylors made him look super chic and stylish. Mraz also looked comfortable and confident – which are the keys to rocking any red carpet event.

COURTESY MSN.COM

Jennifer Hudson adds sophistication to the red carpet in this Roland Muret gown. It is wonderfully fitted to her figure. The contrast between the white, black, gray and the various pleating give this dress character and make Hudson stand out among the other stars. Her chandelier diamond earrings pull the entire look together and make Hudson truly shine.

LL Cool J shined among the men of hip-hop in his tailored suit, which is part of his own fashion line. The suit itself is classic, but he adds a modern touch with his signature Kangol hat and sunglasses. A patterned tie and pastel colored shirt gave him a touch of flare.

WORST:

Leona Lewis is simply being drained out in this Randi Rahm creation. The color does not work with her skin tone. The ill-fit gives an extremely unflattering look to her figure, particularly on the bust, and makes her look much larger than she is. If that weren't enough, she tops it off which a huge turquoise ring that doesn't match the gown.

COURTESY MSN.COM

Paula Abdul is wearing what looks to be a bright yellow toga by Lebanese designer Basil Soda. The ancient look of this dress also contrasts with the futuristic gold plating that is running up Abdul's arms and shoulders. Abdul tops it off with a beehive hairdo, and a chunky, shiny clip that just adds to the tackiness of the entire ensemble.

COURTESY MSN.COM

Max Azaria made Miley Cyrus look as if she's on her way to a funeral rather than the Grammys. A boring black gown dates the young songstress and makes her look decades older than 16. Her conservative hair and earrings just make the old-lady look that much worse.

Estelle looked as if she was getting ready for a mission to the moon. Her metallic, futuristic-looking get-up, by Bernard Chandran, is tacky. The metallic, shiny high heels looked like moon boots, and the gaudy choker necklace and bracelet just added to this fashion disaster.

COURTESY MSN.COM

John Mayer looks like he is joining the military in this suit. The five-button satin jacket is bad enough by itself, but to add insult to injury, Mayer is wearing a bright purple shirt and periwinkle tie. The usually impeccably dressed Mayer definitely takes a few steps back with this heinous look.

Daily Collegian: Who do you look to for style inspiration?
Danielle Lancione: My friend, Maureen, is really creative and takes risks. I like that she doesn't necessarily follow what's in fashion.

DC: Who is your ultimate fashion maven?
DL: I like how Rachel Bilson dresses, and I like how she doesn't look like she tries too hard…it's effortless.

DC: Aside from people, are there any cultures that play a part in your everyday look?
DL: I really like the hippie culture, and I have a lot of peace sign stuff. [My outfit today] isn't normally what I wear.

DC: What stores do you rely on for a fashion pick-me-up?
DL: Macy's, Forever 21 and I love Lululemon Athletica. It's an athletic yoga [clothing line].

They have an online store, but they have one on Derby St. in Hingham and one at the Natick Mall too.

Budget your Valentine's Day

Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Correspondent

For a lot of couples, Valentine's Day translates to one of the most extravagant date nights of the year. With extravagance come expense, though, and college students tend to be lacking financial endowment. But fear not, because there are an infinite number of things you can do on a small budget to make Valentine's Day special for you and the one you'll be spending it with.

The easiest way to save money is to have your date in your dorm room. You can skip the fancy restaurant and high-cost gifts simply by cleaning up, throwing down a blanket and having an indoor picnic.

Anything that you may need for the evening can be found at Stop & Shop for a small price or Dollar Tree for even less – that is, if you could not already find the things you need in your dorm room.

The first and most important thing to consider when planning your date is the lighting. The harsh fluorescent lights that all dorm rooms have are a no-go, especially if you're aiming for romance (if a Valentine's Day study date is your thing, though, by all means use them).

One simple solution is your handy desk lamp with bendable neck. Position the lamp so the light shines upward towards your ceiling. Lower-wattage bulbs will provide a slightly warmer, more inviting light to the room. Don't have a bendy-neck desk lamp? You most likely know someone who does. Borrow one.

If you live off-campus, it would be in your best interest to use candles and maybe a dim light. Candles are a clear indication to your significant other that you want the evening to be a special one. Be creative; place them all around the room using tea lights. Scented candles provide a subtle air of fragrance, just be sure to use only one scent as opposed to many different ones, which can overwhelm and offend the senses.

Finally, close any shades or curtains, unless you have a view of the sun setting at the time of the date.

The next, and most important thing, is the meal. More important than the meal, though, is the dessert. Since it can be a major hassle trying to cook an elaborate meal in your dorm, put more of a focus on dessert. If you feel like experimenting with a few microwavable dishes, try the organic section at Stop & Shop and please, serve all of the food in matching dishes. Your date will appreciate the extra effort. Disposable dishes make for an easier clean-up.

Naturally, the most appropriate V-Day dessert has got to include chocolate. For a romantic dessert, try a rich chocolate cake, for example, Betty Crocker Warm Delights.

They're microwavable, so they'll be hot in addition to delicious. For a sexier dessert, one word should pop into your mind instantaneously: fondue. You can buy microwavable fondue chocolate at Stop & Shop, as well as different fruits and cookies for dipping, but don't forget napkins and toothpicks.

What you choose to do before and after your indoor picnic is up to you; the possibilities are infinite. To maintain the leisure you've created with your ingenious picnic-and-fondue idea, perhaps watching a movie would be appropriate. A few suggestions:

"Say Anything." Lloyd Dobler is the perfect man, and a model for how every boyfriend should be.

Much Ado About Nothing." Shakespeare, plus Kate Beckinsale, Denzel Washington and Keanu Reeves wearing leather pants.

Cinema Paradiso." It's in Italian. More need not be said.

Marley and Me." When it gets said, you can just hold each other. Everything will be all right.

Princess Bride." Three words: "As you wish."

If you'd rather get out of the dorm, a few promising new movies are being released on Friday. If you're staying in, dorms are prime DVD-sharing zones. If you don't have one you both want to watch, borrow from someone else.

carrying with us, me and my generation, into this new world we entered."

The director is classified a member of the "December Children," which describes filmmakers who grew up under Ceausescu and witnessed his fall in their 20s. Now in their 40s, their films engage in a reflective dialogue about those turbulent times. The group's name makes reference to the bloody December 1989 uprisings that culminated in the assassination of the dictator and his wife and it is this historical moment that the opening film makes reference to.

Film critic Jan Schulz-Ojala notes that the "December Children" are making "realist cinema, albeit with a satirical twist – testaments to a lively confrontation with the past that double as imposing critiques of the present."

At the same time, it seems the very mixed perspective Mitulescu describes seems to dominate the 13 other films curated as part of this year's festival. Though many of the films function as criticism of communism at the time of Soviet control, films also make nostalgic references to life in a communist state. One such film is "The Sugar Curtain," in which "the daughter of exiled Chilean filmmaker Patricio Guzmán, laments the lost paradise and revolutionary ideals of her youth during the 'Golden Age' of Cuban communism," according to the film's synopsis.

Other festival selections demonstrate the drawbacks of capitalism and the abrupt transition out of communism. "Czech Dream" for example offers what is described in the film notes as "a cheeky treatise on capitalism." The film is the thesis work of two young film school students who accepted a state grant to produce their documentary. .

The young filmmakers put that money towards promoting the opening of a "fictitious big-box mega market" supposedly opening in a Prague field. Though they invested heavily in advertising efforts, all they have to offer the throngs of people who arrive for the opening is a façade of a massive department store..

"The resulting scandal, alternately hilarious and discomfiting, illuminates the strengths and pitfalls of consumerism in a country still trying to adjust to the concept."

Assistant curator, Nancy Inouye explains that the speed of transition to a capitalist society following the fall of communist states in the wake of the collapse of the Soviet Union proved traumatic to the populations living in those countries. "After years of privation people were overwhelmed by the choices afforded by thousands of square feet of goods, overwhelmed by 150 different types of cereal."

The variety of perspectives offered through this year's films attempts to communicate the range of experience under socialist regimes and to communicate the "many ways life looks after communism" in these regions. The people depicted in the "Beyond Walls" series "live in various contexts; some protagonists reckon with it, others exploit it and some are victimized by it," Inouye explains.

Wednesday night just got more 'Important'

He had a childhood fascination with word problems and maintains a lifetime fondness for palindromes, or words and phrases that are the same forward and backward. These word games are often incorporated into Martin's performances.

With his high-standing academic achievements, it came as a great surprise to Martin's family when he decided to drop out of NYU law school a year before obtaining his degree, despite a full scholarship.

"It's weird to make a decision where everyone in your life disapproves…I said, 'You don't understand. I was trying to figure out what I wanted to do and now I know. I have the answer and it's dumb to waste any more time,'" said Martin on the matter.

However difficult the decision, Martin knew what he had to do. He followed his comedy dreams to New York City, performing his signature blend of music, jokes and wordplay at local comedy clubs and bars.

Eventually, Martin was noticed when he was featured on a 2001 episode of Comedy Central's "Premium Blend."

In 2003, Martin's original one-man show, "If I…" was honored with the Perrier Comedy award at the Edinburgh Fringe Festival, and was later featured as a special on BBC.

Reaping the success of these honors, Martin soon received his own Comedy Central special in early 2004. He then released a CD/DVD via Comedy Central Records entitled "These Are Jokes," and embarked on a nationwide tour.

Martin also has a recurring role as a correspondent on "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart."

Under the production and guidance of Stewart's masterminds, "Important Things" combines television and Internet content for a multimedia experience. Additional video content will be featured on the show's website each week.

The website also features a picture contest, in which viewers are encouraged to submit a drawing based off of each week's theme for various prizes, including an iPod Nano.

Martin has often confessed his admiration for fellow stand-up comedian Steven Wright, sighting him as one of his greatest influences. Martin himself has often drawn comparisons to Wright and the late Mitch Hedberg, particularly in their deadpan style of delivery.

If one were to examine Martin as he examines the world, one of the most endearing aspects of Martin's person is his ability to appreciate the humor in every aspect of a situation.

His charisma lies somewhere between his universal knack to relate things and his impeccable good hair.

He stands as an inspiration for all the lawyers that harbor secret desires to be stand-up comics. Moreover, he is living proof that anything is possible with a proper amount of dedication and a keen sense of humor.

Important Things With Demetri Martin will air on Comedy Central on Feb. 11 at 10:30 p.m.

Execution key in stretch run

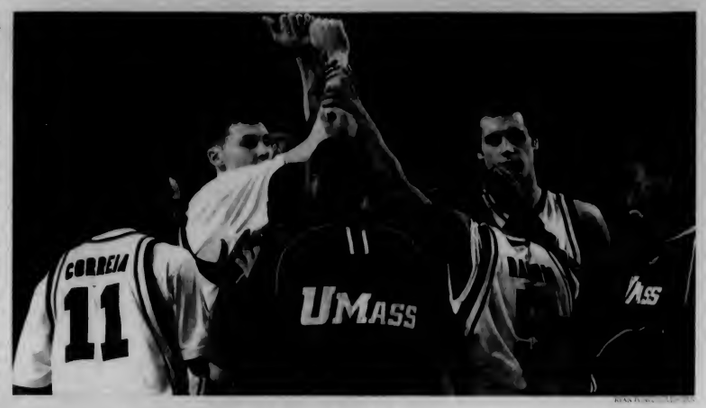
working in practice to improve their execution down the stretch by simulating late game scenarios.

"It starts in practice; we do a lot of different drills to emulate what can happen at the end of a game," Kellogg said, "you know, free throw shooting, loose ball drills and [other] late game situations."

When UMass and Fordham met last year, the Rams took a surprising 76-72 victory at the Mullins Center, but the Rams have not won consecutive games in the series since taking three straight from 1970-72.



Point guard Chris Lowe has averaged 6.9 assists per game this season and currently has 619 career assists, 14 shy of Carl Smith's all-time record of 633. He would need 15 assists, one more than his career high, to break the record this Wednesday.

Lowe is more concerned about getting a win than matching a record, mentioning that it is important to get a victory after Sunday's tough loss.

Kellogg has typically been playing a 9-man rotation with reserve players Tyrell Lynch, Matt Glass, Gary Correia and David Gibbs all contributing in key moments. Solid play by the bench will be important to UMass' success in this game and in the upcoming weeks.

Harris has seen the bench players improve as the year goes on and thinks they are playing with much more confidence. He feels that as long as they don't become nervous in big situations, they will do well.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu

The Minutemen gather after a break in play during Saturday's 68-64 loss to Saint Joseph's. UMass will look to rebound tonight at Fordham despite struggling on the road all season with a 1-8 record when playing on the road.

Senior Sakera Young scored a career-high 22 points in UMass' victory over Rhode Island last week and increasingly has become a more dynamic scorer as the season progresses. The guard had seven points and five rebounds last year in UMass' loss to Temple.

UM needs Wright's success to continue

ing 68.1 points per game behind some strong offensive threats, and sit atop the A-10 in assists with 15.68 per game.

Owl guard LaKeisha Eaddy is an aggressive defender who compliments scorers Shenita Landry (12.1 ppg) and Shaqwedia Wallace (11.8 ppg) while averaging 11.3 points per game.

Eaddy and forward Kristen McCarthy were unstoppable in the first half against Saint Louis last Sunday, combining for 26 of the Owl's 34 points to lead TU, 76-56, over the visiting Billikens.

TU defeated Dayton back on Jan. 31, as four of their players posted in double figures en route to a 10-point victory. The win was the Owls' second consecutive in their current four-game streak, and come into this afternoon's match-up with a balanced scoring attack and defensive game.

"They're a team that can turn up the notch defensively and put a lot of pressure on us," Dacko said.

The game against the Owls marks the 46th meeting between the two teams with the Owls leading the series 27-18.

Last season, UMass fell to the Owls in their final regular season game, 64-46, and after earned a No. 12 seed in the A-10 tournament against fifth-ranked Dayton.

Pam Rosario scored 15 points and Kate Mills added 13 along with Young's seven points and five rebounds, but a 32 percent shooting average from the floor plagued the Minutewomen in their A-10 finale.

"For us to be successful, we need to be able to take care of the basketball and let our mistakes turn into easy points for them," Dacko said.

Young's play critical for win in afternoon contest with TU

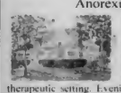
the hoop and with her jumpshot. However, Dacko doesn't want her point guard taking jumpshots when she has the ability to set up her teammates for scoring opportunities.

"Sakera's got to play within herself. Sakera has to set up people," Dacko said. "The offense is meant for Sakera to break down the defense and create shots for our shooters. I think she's got to get back to that. She got out of that in the Dayton game, and she took some long shots, and she's got to get out of that."

Even if the Minutewomen are shooting and have the offense functioning, the team's destiny will still be heavily swayed by the play of sophomore forward Teva Wright. Wright had been struggling, but with a double-double against Dayton, she showed that she is still in top form so long as she can stay out of foul trouble.

"She's getting her hands on a lot of rebounds, and that's something that we have hoped she would be doing up to this point," Dacko said of Wright. "She's got to be a good post down low without being knocked around, and we've got to keep her in the game…she's starting to come into her own, which is great for me to see."

Further complicating Wednesday's game will be the tip-off time. As part of Field Trip Day, the Minutewomen will be taking the court at 11:45 a.m. at the Mullins Center on a day where the players would normally have class. Dacko, though, expects her players to be ready regardless of when the game is played.



"Most of our kids have 8 a.m. classes, so they're up anyway," Dacko said. "You have to be ready to play at midnight or if you're playing a game at nine in the morning. So I think that your mindset's just got to be prepared no matter what time of day it occurs."

Stephanie Lawrence moves to the hoop in an attempt to breakdown the Providence defense in a game earlier this year. The sophomore forward been an asset for UMass off the bench, playing 9.4 minutes per game.

Undefeated no more

BY JAY ASSER

With the exception of a remarkable comeback by new No. 1 freshman singles player, Magdalena Ploch, the Massachusetts women's tennis team was overpowered by Boston University in a 5-2 loss on Tuesday.

Defending American East Champion BU (4-1) handed UMass (3-1) its first loss of the year and the first since it was upset by Xavier in the semifinal round of the Atlantic 10 tournament last season by the same score, 5-2.

Also contributing with victories were No. 1 doubles duo, Candynce Boney and Maude Lecluyse, as well as No. 5 singles player Laura Danai.

| BU | 5 |
| UMass | 2 |

Boney and Lecluyse continued their winning ways, defeating BU pair Francine Whu and Stefanie Nunic by an 8-5 score. The victory marked their fourth win in as many dual matches.

Entering the match, Danai was a flawless 14-0 on the season (4-0 in singles, 10-0 in doubles). While she improved to 5-0 in singles play due to opponent Vanessa Steiner retiring, she had her perfect 10-0 doubles mark snapped when her and partner Tanisha Hodgson fell 8-3 to Cori Lefkowith and Danielle Abraham.

Magdalena Ploch's comeback effort at No. 1 singles stood out as the highlight of the day.

Ploch was impressive, battling back from a set down to defeat America East Player of the Year, Francine Whu, by a 2-6, 6-0, 6-4 score. Ploch seemed to be unfazed by the difficult task of matching up with Whu in her first No. 1 singles match.

However, Ploch was unable to match the effort with Kaitlyn Carpenter at the No. 3 doubles slot. The combination dropped their first match as a duo, falling 8-2 at the hands of Elizabeth Corrao and Petra Santini.

Also playing in her first match at a new position was Candynce Boney, who was relegated to No. 2 singles after the last match against Fordham. UMass coach Judy Dixon was specific when she spoke on why the move was necessary.

"We need to get her forehand right and her confidence up," Dixon said.

Kaitlyn Carpenter, Maude Lecluyse and Tanisha Hodgson all struggled in singles play, falling in the No. 3, 4 and 6 spots - respectively.

Cori Lefkowith defeated Carpenter handily by a 6-2, 6-0 score and Elizabeth Corrao followed, edging out Lecluyse in a hard-fought second set for the 6-0, 6-4 victory. Danielle Abraham handed Hodgson her second singles loss of the season, winning 6-1, 6-1.

UMass returns back home on Sunday at 1 p.m. when they host Albany at the Bay Road Tennis Club. Originally, the Minutewomen were scheduled to face conference foe Temple on Friday, but due to conflict of match times, it will be pushed back to April 11.

Freshman Magdalena Ploch staged an impressive comeback Tuesday at Boston University. The native of Germany lost the first match 2-6 to BU's Francine Whu before coming back to win the next two 6-0 and 6-4.

Minutemen hit road to face Atlantic 10 bottom dweller

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With a season-long trend of close losses, the Massachusetts men's basketball team could really use a dominant victory as the Atlantic 10 tournament approaches.

On Wednesday night, UMass will have its best opportunity for a convincing win when they face slumping Fordham (3-17, 1-7 A-10) in Bronx, N.Y.

"If we play like we did against the big teams – the Daytons, the Xaviers, the Saint Josephs, the Temples – we should win," guard Ricky Harris said.

The Minutemen (8-13, 3-5 A-10) have had difficulties playing up to their potential against teams with lesser records, having lost to teams such as Toledo and Charlotte. UMass is looking to learn from its mistakes and treat every game with equal importance. Harris feels the team should be excited for every upcoming game because the season is almost over.

"These next couple games are must-win games for us because we are trying to make a run in the A-10," Harris said.

The Rams have been outscored by an average of 12 points per game and have lost 10 of their last 11 games, most recently an 87-62 loss to George Washington. On the other hand, UMass has not lost any conference games by more than eight points and has shown the ability to play with any team in the nation.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg does not want his team to be complacent, expecting them to compete for all 40 minutes.

"At some point, hopefully tomorrow night, we can finish out the game strong," Kellogg said.

Closing out games has been a weakness for the Minutemen all season long. Several times this year, UMass has jumped out to early leads only to falter down the stretch. Last Sunday against St. Joe's, UMass led for almost the entire first half and did not trail in the second half until there were four minutes, 48 seconds left in the contest but lost 68-64.

Kellogg wants to make sure his team is ready for any potential crunch time situations.

"The game is different in the last four minutes; every possession, every block out, every rebound and every loose ball is of the utmost importance," Kellogg said.

UM host Owls in A-10 tilt

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Temple enters Wednesday afternoon's game against the Massachusetts women's basketball team riding an impressive four-game winning streak.

The only streak the Minutewomen have mustered is dropping seven of its past eight games, but they will try to get back to its winning ways against the Owls in an Atlantic 10 game slated for 11:45 a.m. at the Mullins Center.

UMass fell to Dayton last Saturday, 86-65 after an easy victory over Rhode Island last Tuesday, 70-53.

The Minutewomen erased multiple deficits and pulled within one possession of the Flyers on several occasions, but could not mount a strong enough comeback.

"All in all [I'm] disappointed, but certainly there were some points where we played a great game," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

"We played 30 minutes of basketball, and then the last seven minutes we were playing very poorly."

Senior guard Stefanie Gerardot had 17 points while freshman forward Kristina Danella scored a career-high 20 points on 5-for-10 shooting from 3-point range, but the combined effort was not enough against the host Flyers.

"We weren't there with the intensity, and Dayton was on a four-game skid," Dacko said.

"So we knew that they were going to be ready for us."

Even with the visiting Owls in the midst of a hot streak – winning their last four games – they will look to come out strong on offense and play stout defense against a Minutewomen team that is capable of going down early in games and playing from behind.

"My concern was playing transition defense and us being able to win the battle on the boards, and we didn't meet both of those two goals," Dacko added, regarding the loss to the Flyers.

The Minutewomen could struggle against a relatively balanced offense that leads or is atop of the conference in several statistical categories. But they have not taken advantage of going to the free-throw line in games, recording just a .650 free-throw percentage for 12th in the A-10.

Temple enters the contest with a strong rebounding presence, ranking third in offensive rebounding and sixth in defensive rebounding in the A-10. They are also ranked third in the A-10 in blocks, averaging 6.64 swats per game and third in steals with 184 so far this season.

Sophomore forward Teya Wright averaged a double-double of 14.5 points and 11.5 rebounds this past week, and will have to exploit an Owl scoring defense that allows an average of 60.3 points per game.

"They're a scary team that is playing a lot of good basketball right now," Dacko said.

On offense, TU is ranked second in the A-10 in scoring offense, averag-

Plagued by inconsistencies

Minutewomen hope to play mistake-free basketball vs. TU

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With inconsistencies haunting the Massachusetts women's basketball team once again in their most recent loss, UMass looks to produce an effort free of the mistakes that have led to their current 1-6 skid.

However, the Minutewomen will be facing one of the toughest tests on their schedule at Temple.

The Owls (17-6, 6-2 A-10) come in tied for third in the conference standings and boast both considerable size and talent. Unlike other teams with size, which the Minutewomen (9-14, 2-6 A-10) have attempted to beat with their speed, the Owls are a fast, aggressive team that takes advantage of other team's errors. Therefore, Dacko is focusing her team's efforts on taking care of the ball and playing mistake-free.

"They're a team that can turn up the notch defensively and put a lot of pressure on us," Dacko said. "They're very physical inside, they're very explosive, they're very aggressive on-the-ball defenders…so for us to be successful, we've got to take care of the ball and don't let our mistakes turn into easy points for them."

The most inconsistent area for UMass right now is its shooting. The Minutewomen have been outshot by their opponents 40.4 percent to 38.8 percent so far this season. At times, the numbers have been even worse for Dacko's squad as it will shoot nearly 50 percent one game only to hit 30 percent of its shots the next.

Consistency, however, means much more than shooting for the Minutewomen. For UMass to have success, it will need major contributions from the team's guard and post positions.

Senior Sakera Young, who put up a career-high 22 points against Rhode Island last week, has been steadily becoming a more dangerous scoring threat by driving to

SGA appoints commissioners

Student Government Association Speaker Shaun Robinson addresses members of the senate during last night's meeting.

Online voting left off agenda, motion's future uncertain

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Ellen Schmarsow, Michael Eressey, Weng Ng and Pak Wu were appointed Election Commissioners for the upcoming Student Government Association Presidential election Wednesday night in the body's weekly senate meeting.

Central Area Governor David Robertson nominated both Schmarsow, a freshman psychology major, and Erresey, a sophomore history major, for the positions, while Northeast Area Governor Stephen Thomas-Brown put Ng, a junior mathematics major, and Wu, a junior psychology major, forward.

To conduct March 10 and 11 elections properly, SGA bylaws require 14 commissioners on the body; otherwise, the elections are unconstitutional.

"We had to appoint these commissioners because, without the appropriate number of commissioners, we cannot run elections," Chancellor of Elections Sean McNair said following the meeting. "If we don't run the elections, we won't have new leaders; without new leaders, the student government will go into default. Therefore we will not be able to govern ourselves, and the responsibility will fall to the administration."

Two students, McNair and junior psychology major Jeidy Fernandez, were on the commission prior to Wednesday's votes. Eight more will be appointed in the coming weeks.

"Election Commissioners are important because the bylaws require them to execute certain tasks," McNair said. "They manage the elections. They vote on removing candidates or issuing suspensions should they violate a bylaw. There has to be one at each polling place.

"There are election assistants, but the executive tasks are, and must be, carried out by the election commissioners."

The 2008 presidential election of Malcolm Chu highlighted the significance of the position. Current SGA Senator on then-presidential candidate Derek Khanna received a warning from the commission for creating a flyer that negatively represented Chu's campaign.

The senate also voted to allocate $4,000 from its short-term reserve fund to pay for March's election. Typically, the presidential elections cost more than September's senatorial elections, but McNair cited poor spending practices by the previous commission as the reason for his request.

SGA Finance Committee Chairman Rudy Mahotiere and associate chairman Ricky Pierre supported the measure and answered questions from senators along with McNair.

"The money from the Finance Committee is necessary for us to run the elections as the bylaws require us to," McNair said.

Absent from Wednesday night's agenda was the motion to move March's elections away from their current paper format to an online format. The measure must pass through the Administrative Affairs Committee of the senate before it votes on it. Although a vote was held and the measure approved, there were not enough members present for the vote to be legal.

"The debate over online elections stalled in the Administrative Affairs Committee in the past two weeks," McNair said.

"They've had a multiple lack of quorums. Also, they have gone into default by not having the appropriate number of members on the committee. While they voted on it, they were technically unable to do so," he continued.

With less than one month left until the elections, McNair is pessimistic about the possibility off an online shift before March 10.

The debate over online elections along with his past involvement with the SGA made McNair's appointment an issue in October and November of the fall semester.

Present for Change

Convincing others of the right to exist may be doing just that

BY WILLIAM MCGUINNESS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The sun was not up over the palm trees behind his house on Los Angeles' Makee Drive when a nightmare terrorized Martin Aguilera until he could sleep no more. He imagined a man in his room, an intruder, who caused the nine-year-old to swing his legs from under his blankets and sink to his knees beside his bed. Whenever he was scared, the young Aquilera prayed to the Virgin Mary. He always felt a connection to her. Before he was Martin, his parents entertained the name "Guadalupe." Kneeling there, he said the Hail Mary five times before he felt comfortable enough to fall back asleep – before he was certain the man of his dreams wouldn't come back.

Steven Greenberg struggled similarly while in the deserts of his Holy Land. Coming to understand himself while working to understand God, he was drawn to a fellow male student. Believing himself to be bisexual then, he approached a trusted spiritual advisor. The sage said, "My dear one, my friend, you have twice the power to love. Use it carefully."

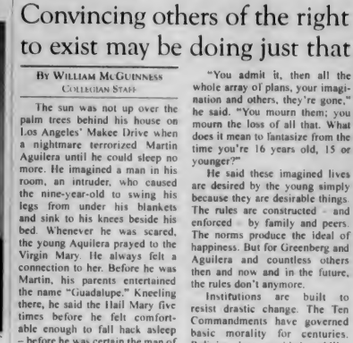
Both gay men have struggled to reconcile their sexual identities with the institutions in their families and lives. When Greenberg first said, "I'm gay," he saw a cliff. He said it's not unique to his experience but appears to many homosexuals from traditional backgrounds. He was backed up to its edge. There, the horizon was far off but clear, and the sky stretched over him until it met another far off distance. The only indistinguishable feature is what lies ahead. There was once a trajectory that seemed good. It carried him through a life that would bring him a perfect wedding, children and the accoutrements associated with conventional happiness. They were created long ago by a 16- or 17-year-old boy looking for security in television dreams.

"Every hopeful imagination of what the future holds is dashed by this one fact of your inner life," he said.

At the cliff, the route that would bring him to safety shattered and fell like shadows into the obscurity below.

"You admit it, then all the whole array of plans, your imagination and others, they're gone," he said. "You mourn them; you mourn the loss of all that. What does it mean to fantasize from the time you're 16 years old, 15 or younger?"

He said these imagined lives are desired by the young simply because they are desirable things. The rules are constructed – and enforced – by family and peers. The norms produce the ideal of happiness. But for Greenberg and Aguilera and countless others then and now and in the future, the rules don't anymore.



Institutions are built to resist drastic change. The Ten Commandments have governed basic morality for centuries. Religion has provided stability to social changes in many settings. Amherst's honor code has governed generations of students and the Constitution of the United States is our country's framework and foundation at once. Law is the sovereign judge of our judges.

David Roseborough, an assistant professor in social work at the University of St. Thomas, wrote in a paper, "the tension between religion and sexuality is particularly pronounced for gay and lesbian people who are often 'caught in the middle' between a constitutional sexual orientation and a church body that rejects it."

The person who now recognizes he is gay sees that sexuality and religion are closely linked but not always comfortably.

To some of his denomination, Rabbi Steven Greenberg – the first openly gay Rabbi in orthodox Judaism – is an abomination. The sage in Jerusalem did not hold this view but gave no endorsement of homosexuality, either. Greenberg's God seemed different than the versions who hated him. He could not imagine a deity that he would worship and love and believe to love him who would violate his most basic understanding of scripture – who would create a class of people who would never experience love and affection.

In Compton, Los Angeles, Aguilera felt his community squeezing him out. So he left at 16 years old. He imagined his very identity as contrary to Arriving at Amherst College, Aguilera felt a dynamic much different from that of his hometown. He then worked to change it.

Rabbi Steven Greenberg at Jerusalem's first Gay Pride parade. He is a pioneer in orthodox Judaism as its first openly-gay rabbi.

Catholicism and what he was taught a man, in his neighborhood, should act like. So he left it. Bright and motivated to escape, he found himself clear across the country at Deerfield Academy in Deerfield, Mass. The Pioneer Valley was surely different from Los Angeles.

"There, I felt F-R-I-E-N-D-O-M," he said.

"Every hopeful imagination of what the future holds is dashed by this one fact of your inner life," he said.

He had not yet come to Greenberg's cliff, but a weight was already removed. At Deerfield, people weren't sized up according to their machismo. Projecting manliness was no longer an issue because the high school was filled with students painfully aware that they were not yet adults.

But the required reading, with its coming-of-age tales, foreshadowed a time for Aguilera when he would have to leave Deerfield and construct his own image of himself.

Greenberg said, "It can feel like dying. How do you expect to work toward a future you can't even imagine?"

Greenberg found his answer in his usual place but one that may seem surprising. He opened his Torah and read from the Book of Jacob.

The story has violence and a young man laboring for love. His family is dysfunctional; he becomes entangled in a power struggle for his father's inheritance. His brother is the perfect foil – a hairy and brutish hunter to Jacob's fair-faced domesticity.

He comes into the world grabbing onto his brother's ankle as if trying to prove himself worthy of life too. The two grow up and apart. His brother hunts while Jacob stays at home with his mother and cooks among the women.

The narrative is woven with ideas involving identity and what it means to be a man. Like many other stories in the Bible, Jacob struggles before coming to know God on a personal level. The rising action involves his vengeful brother marching with an army of 400 men to destroy him. The climax is an action scene but one with a mysterious assailant.

The man comes from nowhere, and Jacob wrestles him for hours until a stalemate is reached. Some say the mysterious figure was an angel. The story is rife with issues of acceptance and chronicles a young man torn between his church and state of being. In an interview, Greenberg adds a twist: the angel is a representation of Jacob's feelings. He struggles with himself and overcomes his fears, and the blessing he receives afterwards is from both God and his consciousness. Following the fight, the man renames Jacob "Israel."

Greenberg sees a bit of himself in Jacob. Both possess a different kind of masculinity. Compared to the he-man, Jacob seems almost effeminate. He sees Jacob's stalemate with the assailant as "an affirmation of his emotional growth." Limping from the fight, Jacob is renamed Israel because "he has wrestled with men and with God, and he has proven himself capable."

The interview is interrupted. A colleague calls and a father has a son who is gay and the man doesn't know what to do. Greenberg asks to break momentarily while the cliff is encountered again.

Martin Aguilera's father might have been on the other line if he weren't a staunch Roman Catholic from Mexico, if Greenberg's congregation were in Compton, Los Angeles and if he had any inclination his oldest son is gay.

Oddly, most at Amherst College know. He came out to female friends during his sophomore year and to others later. Now, he leads the Gay Amherst Party, a LGBT community building organization.

"I had to come out because it just felt right," Aguilera said.

He dated a young woman from

Smith College during his freshman year, but it felt uncomfortable and forced. Coming out at Amherst College seemed relatively safe, but an awkwardness lingered. He almost enjoyed the comfort of Compton's overt homophobia, where displays of machismo are peppered with "fag" jokes. But at Amherst, there existed a discomfort with not knowing.

"Beneath these layers of tolerance, there exists an idea of the way things 'should be,'" he said. "I think those lines of tolerance are blurred at Amherst and are much more difficult to navigate as opposed to home – where I know it's just a no-no."

He said it's difficult to determine whether his male friends are accepting, simply tolerant or worse.

Greenberg and Aguilera walked from respective airplanes into lives both were still dreaming of. Greenberg was starting as the first gay rabbi in his church, and Aguilera was headed home for Christmas dinner – gay at Amherst and straight in Compton.

Greenberg published "Gayness and God: Wrestlings of a Gay Orthodox Rabbi" in Tikkun magazine, a Jewish news and culture publication. A mix of memoir and close reading of the Torah, Greenberg started a more serious study on the matter of his warring identities. He published the article under a Hebrew pseudonym that translates to "and Jacob was left alone."

"It brings about the loneliness of discovering yourself to be gay and the wrestling of men against society and the expectation of manhood and with God," he said.

He expected a "bumpy road" after the article was published, yet it was well-received by most of his colleagues. Only one colleague could not cope with Greenberg's new role in the Jewish faith.

"I don't know why you are doing this to yourself," the friend said. "I can't deal. I'm sorry."

His family reacted as expected in his tradition. His father took the better part of a year to come to terms. His mother, a Holocaust survivor, saw her dreams for her son disintegrate and, for several years, could not find peace with her oldest son. She saw his old trajectory of grandchildren, a marriage and more family fade away.

Greenberg saw his mother's grief and a woman with a set of expectations that had little room for a gay son. So he moved to slowly start transforming their shared religion.

His article, the culmination of ten years of study and self examination, became a book, "Wrestling with God and Men." Director Sandi Simcha DuBowski featured Greenberg in his documentary, "Trembling Before G-d," often used as a teaching tool in reconciling sexuality with faith.

He sat in the synagogue on Yom Kippur, the day of atonement, each year with his tallit pulled over his head. Every year, all of Leviticus 18 is read. A rabbi reads of Moses relaying each of God's commandments to the Israelites, and Greenberg found himself in tears.

He still gets, "Cuando tu el conseguir estas casado?" When are you getting married?" "Tienes una novia?" "So, do you have a girlfriend?"

"'[A man] should not lay with another man as [he would] with a woman, it is a toeva [abomination]" (Leviticus 18:22).

"There were years when I could barely contain the tears," he said. "At some point I decided to add protest, and I stood up. I don't know what it meant. And finally I couldn't cry anymore," he said in the documentary.

He approached the lectern with sweating palms. The distance between him and the open scroll shrank, and a calm fell over him.

"I realized my willingness to be vulnerable to the text required the text to be vulnerable to me and to everybody like me," he said. "I realized that the people who decide what this verse means have never heard my story. They've never heard [other homosexuals' stories]. And if they did, they would no longer be so certain."

He said the texts should be given faces so that they can evolve just as he said they have for centuries.

"Religions – the healthy ones – respond to new circumstances all of the time," he said in an interview. "They reinvent themselves all of the time."

Liza Neal, director of Spiritual Life at Hampshire College, said sexuality and religion are linked because they both exist within the individual – that in a society that often tries to divide objects into bits and pieces, these cannot be separated.

"Both are inherent in you and take you to different states; they are methods of expression," she said. "Often our angst in religion over sexuality is often because we're trying to work things out."

Martin Aguilera stepped from his plane and towards his home and Compton. He walked into his brown house and into his brown living room. He acknowledged the painting of Jesus' head with the crown of thorns hanging above an altar of the Virgin Mary. Next to that is a picture of the deceased Pope John Paul II and the new Pope Benedict.

A candle burns on the altar just as it always has.

Home was bittersweet. It's good to catch up with family and eat 50 cent tacos. Christmas on his father's side of the family involves 30 members of an extended family and a barrel of Corona. It's slowly coming out that he's gay. He still gets, "Cuando tu el conseguir estas casado?" When are you getting married?" "Tienes una novia?" "So, do you have a girlfriend?"

Just a week before, he transformed an Amherst College building for the Gay Amherst Party (GAP). He stayed only briefly and walked for most of the snowy night from building to building convincing everyone to go. Inside Porter Dormitory, stuffed chairs and heavy wooden tables were moved to make a dance floor on the polished hardwood. GAP usually brings in a diverse crowd, there for a good DJ and dancing, but Aguilera said bringing the community into "their world" asks others to reexamine their views and stereotypes of gays. Streamers wafted back and forth in the molded thresholds between rooms. Gay, straight and the unsure drank rum and vodka stashed throughout the building and smoked cigarettes outside in the snow.

"What makes change is when people see and feel what it means for someone suffering in the context of a set of decisions that are intending to be good and are doing evil," Greenberg said.

He added that when changing any institution, the laws are the hardest to change. In a country currently chanting for "change" and gripping their chairs to see its first results, the LGBT community looks into the mix feeling bittersweet. For the first time in a decade, they sat back satisfied that their man had won. But with California and Proposition 8, there came the familiar voices saying they've asked for too much, too soon – that the tradition is slow to react to them as well.

Rabbi Steven Nathan, a spiritual advisor at Hampshire College, said the ball starts to waver when the humanity of the conflict is evident. In other words, it would be better, since laws cannot do what they wish, to force them to wish what they can do.

Greenberg said the queer community does not want to live in the shadows.

"They don't want to live in lifelong denial either, and when these stories come out, they slowly begin to change what I call an empathy," he said. "We've got to figure out how not one but two sexualities can exist within the world and maybe our laws up until now have applied to heterosexuals."

"We've got to figure out how not one but two sexualities can exist within the world and maybe our laws up until now have applied to heterosexuals."

He was his family's first born after the Holocaust and his mother shared her young son's dreams of family and children. He was named after her father, who was lost in Auschwitz, and her mother. He possessed the birthright that Jacob worked hard to garner from his father.

When Greenberg came out to his mother, he made it very clear that the decision was final, knowing that if there were any shred of doubt, she would work to change him. She mourned as if she had seen a branch of the family die.

"I was seen as the continuity, and I think it was very hard for her to see my life not carry this through in that way," he said.

When "Trembling Before G-d" was screened in Columbus, Ohio, his mother refused to go at first. But she had her own revelation, seeing the continuity in a different way. She saw people who would benefit from the story and the reality.

"I think she had this fantasy that it was going to be shaming," he said, "but what she saw was that it just wasn't."

"The fit between sexual orientation and religion as a relationship requiring a reworking of one's own world view is not exclusive," Roseborough wrote, "gays' and lesbians' relationships to government, family and other institutions are also relevant."

Rosehorough said the gay men he interviewed in his study often felt a resurrection after coming out of the closet. Their coming-out stories are framed as faith narratives. After coming to Greenberg's cliff, each has regained an internal locus of control. Once studied, they see how they can create new trajectories that include their own happiness.

Both Greenberg and Aguilera said some religions are more hospitable to homosexuals than others, that some communities are more comfortable with LGBT people, but neither expresses a desire to change his religion or transfer colleges. Instead, they see the institutions in which they operate as operating for them. The pieces may not have fit before because each hadn't yet made room for themselves or others.

Greenberg and Aguilera have started. Greenberg said America has too.

"FREEDOM OF SPEECH IS OF NO USE TO A MAN WHO HAS NOTHING TO SAY..." - FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

Against Obama's big spending spree

"Now, many of these plans will cost money, which is why I've laid out how I'll pay for every dime: by closing corporate loopholes and tax havens that don't help America grow. But I will also go through the federal budget, line by line, eliminating programs that no longer work and making the ones we do need work better and cost less, because we cannot meet twenty-first century challenges with a twentieth-century bureaucracy."

Alex Perry

That passage was part of Barack Obama's speech on August 28, 2008 at the Democratic National Convention. It was fantasy then; its just flat out laughable now.

I always wondered throughout the campaign how closing corporate loopholes and tax havens were going to pay for all of Barack's proposed spending, and that was before the $800 billion dollar bailout he voted for in the fall. I often wondered why, if Barack knew of such gaping loopholes, he did not call it to the attention of someone in government so they could be closed.

It always seemed peculiar to me, but obviously McCain never called Obama out in the debates and everyone knows the media would never question the chosen one. So Barack just ran on those loopholes being the solution to our financial problems all the way through Election Day.

But now that the bailout Barack approved in the fall has seemingly failed, Democrats have turned to the one thing they know how to do best: waste our tax dollars on government handouts. The same Barack who said he was going to go through the federal budget "line by line" and cut programs (although he never mentioned a single one during the election) is now primed to sign a spending bill that is worth over $800 billion dollars.

The idea is that spending this money will create jobs and, at the very least, slow down the recession significantly. In Barack's words, the bill will make "dramatic investments to revive our flagging economy." In reality though, a bill of this measure has no precedent for success, either in our country or in others. It's most likely end result will be wasteful spending that will lead to a prolonged economic slowdown and debt that we will be paying off for generations. Just take a look at some of the figures and proposals within this bill and see if you think it's a "stimulus" that will create jobs.

Wasteful spending ... will lead to ... debt that we will be paying off for generations.

The proposals include $1 billion for Amtrak, $36 billion for expanded unemployment benefits, $20 billion for food stamps and $600 million for new government cars. Also, $150 million has been slated for honey bee insurance, while 400 million is slated for NASA-conducted climate change research.

I could go on and on with nonsense such as honeybee insurance, but I don't think it is necessary. Everyone knows food stamps aren't going to create jobs. Neither is climate change research. While it's worth debating whether or not they are worthwhile causes, no one can argue that these are job creators.

Anyone who wishes to wade through 1,588 pages of this bill knows they can go on for days with wasteful spending such as this that will do nothing to create jobs.

In fact, according to the Washington Post, the best case outcome for job creation in this bill is just 4.1 million new jobs. The problem is the minimum projection for spending of this stimulus bill is $770 billion. That means each job added will cost the tax payer approximately $187,800, in a best case world. Lindsay Lohan's shopping addiction makes that look like wasteful spending.

The head of Barack's National Economic Council has stated that any stimulus must be "targeted, timely and temporary." This bill is literally none of the above. This stimulus is not targeted at any useful specific area such as helping Americans get their jobs back. If it was, I would like to think government could be a little more efficient then $187,800 per job. Instead it's a spending scattershot. If this was created correctly there wouldn't be money poured into job sectors that aren't losing jobs like education and health care. If this bill was being written correctly, there wouldn't be $54 billion going into federal programs that the Office of Management and Budget or the Government Accountability Office have already criticized for being "ineffective" or unable to pass basic financial audits.

What's worse, there is no end in sight for this outlandish liberal spending. This bill calls for $170 billion being spent in fiscal 2009, $356 billion in fiscal 2010 and $293 billion in fiscal 2011 and beyond. In other words, "timely and temporary" were not words congress took seriously when crafting this bill. They are setting what is likely to be an irreversible trend, a growing annual baseline for government spending so large that it would drop even FDR's jaw.

You may ask, what are Republicans doing about this? The answer is, barring a few senators, they are unanimously voting against this bill. Instead of approving the spending bonanza, Republicans are urging for a much smaller stimulus mostly focused on tax cuts. But in this bipartisan era under Barack, Republicans are outnumbered everywhere in Congress and are not needed. Therefore, their opinions are not taken seriously by Pelosi, Reid or Democrats in general. This bill will pass with or without Republican support. I think the bipartisan era under Barack is summed up best by Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi, "We won the election. We wrote the bill."

Unfortunately, for us and generations beyond, that will be a harsh reality to cope with.

Holub and the big re-shuffle

S.P. Sullivan

University of Massachusetts chancellor Robert C. Holub sends me more emails than my father, my girlfriend and the people selling natural male enhancement pills combined.

Holub sent yet another update to the campus community last week, this one revealing the bullpen of members for his newest acronym, the TFR, or Task Force on Reorganization.

The first thing on my mind when the memo hit by inbox was this: what's with all the geezers? The list consisted of 16 people from a wide range of departments and backgrounds, but they all seemed to have one thing in common: tenure.

Holub drew criticism from campus community members – namely student leaders, like Student Government Association President Malcolm Chu and Student Trustee Lindsay McCluskey – when he formed last November's Budget Planning Task force, which was also a little short on anyone who made less than $40,000 a year.

After he was reminded that those rowdy kids who pay more and more in fees each semester would like a say, too, Holub adjusted the task force and made a little more room at the table for students and staff.

"I always had the notion to consult with campus constituencies," he told me in an interview in November. "The only question was how to go about that."

Inviting them to your party is a start.

It seems peculiar that when forming a very similar-sounding group to address a very similar-sounding issue, the same logic wouldn't apply. The student body is just as capable – if not more so – of bitching about what the University ought or ought not do to restructure itself than tenured professors.

And we'll do it on the cheap.

It's also unwise to leave the Graduate Employee Organization, slightly more expensive but just as prodigious at complaining, after they've been distributing anti-Holub propaganda since the last task force left out any union employees. The best way to hammer out the kinks in your plan is to involve people who fundamentally disagree with you.

Earlier this month while addressing a general meeting of the faculty on issues surrounding the University's $46 million budget shortfall and his proposal of reorganization, Holub tried to lighten the mood by comparing himself to someone he figured all those tweedy profs knew and loved.

The best way to hammer out the kinks in your plan is to involve people who fundamentally disagree with you.

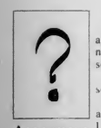
"Barack Obama and I both have the similarity of having been interested in a job before this economic downturn, so that we kind of were surprised when we got the jobs and found the state of affairs," he said. "Now there are a couple of differences of course: Barack Obama has a much larger purview in his job and, also, he can print money."

Holub and Obama have another similarity that I've noticed: Both are good at putting on airs like they want diversity of opinion, but fall a little short in the execution. Obama promised us a cabinet spread across the political spectrum; what he delivered looked like the green room at the Democratic National Convention. Bob Holub promised to engage every campus constituency in the reorganization process and delivered the faculty lounge.

To his credit, Holub is also similar to Obama in his use of technology to gauge the vox populi, with his website, umass.edu/chancellor. There, campus community members can address their concerns in earnest, and they'll be taken into consideration.

But a seat at the grownups table wouldn't hurt, either.

It's clear that most of the legwork involved in a campus-wide college shuffle is going to fall on the profs – or their teaching assistants, at least. Their say should, ultimately, hold the most weight. Yet administrations past and present have done enough to disenfranchise the student body that, "don't worry, we have your best interest at heart," isn't going to cut it. You can't have reorganization without representation – of every campus constituency – from faculty and graduate employees to students and the folks who work at the Blue Wall.



A campus-wide consolidation of colleges may inconvenience professors and affect jobs in every department, but it's most profound impact will be on our degrees. I came to this university thinking I'd end up with a degree from the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences. Now it looks like I'll be getting my diploma from something Holub has tentatively titled the College of Humanities, Arts and Social Sciences, or CHASS for short.

What this means for my future isn't clear. But what is clear is that if the administration is going to reshuffle what college I belong to, somebody with my interests at heart – who is in touch with what it means to be a student at this university at this particular point in time – should be sitting elbow-to-elbow with those calling the shots.

For one, cancer hits home

Anonymous

My mom has cancer.

She found out about a week ago and told me Monday afternoon when I randomly called to see how she was doing.

Now I need her to call me to see how I'm doing.

I'm terrified and anxious and a whole lot of other adjectives. I can't even begin to imagine what's going though my mother's mind right now. How could I?

When she told me the news, I didn't know what to say. How do you respond to something like that? Not knowing how to handle it, I kind of just grew silent on the other end of the phone – and just changed the subject.

I should have told her I loved her. And considering she's always been there for me through the hard times of my life, I should have told her I'll do the same.

I will, Mom.

That's partly why I'm writing this column: part-tribute to her, part-apology for the way I acted on the phone and part-therapy for me to get this all out – because this is really weighing me down emotionally right now.

Although it seems like everyone I know has dealt with family health problems at some point, it's something that I've somehow been lucky enough to avoid.

With so many people affected with cancer – there seems to be like 1,000 different types – I knew deep down at some point it would happen to someone that I love. But for some reason as young adults, we think nothing like that will ever happen to us or our loved ones. It does. And it's like a punch in the gut.

We think nothing ... will ever happen to us or our loved ones. It does. And it's like a punch in the gut.

The most frustrating thing is that there's really nothing I can do. I'm powerless. Sure, I can be there for her and provide encouragement, but I can't make the cancer go away.

The thing that scares me the most is that she just found out about it. What if she's had it for a long time? If you don't catch these things soon enough, the prognosis gets worse.

She finds out on Friday – Yes, Friday the 13th – how much her skin cancer has spread. Luckily, neither of us is superstitious. I'm also the least religious person on this planet, but you better believe I'll be praying Thursday night before I go to bed.

Another nerve-racking aspect of this is that I don't know anything about cancer. I don't know if there are different levels or degrees of skin cancer, or if skin cancer tends to come back after going in remission or what all the treatment options are and how much they help.

The only thing I do really know about cancer is that it scares the hell out of me.

I guess that's a big reason why I'm writing this. I could use your help. I don't know what to expect, how to cope, how to help my mom, etc.

I've created a confidential e-mail address (canceranonymous@yahoo.com) – a place where people dealing with cancer in any way can get things off their chest, vent, offer encouragement and provide advice.

I'll be checking the e-mail constantly, hoping for some encouragement. I'll be sure to send it to my mom. It would probably mean a lot to her.

And if you have the cure for cancer, be sure to send that on over, too.

I love you Mom.

Commonwealth College and UMass' future

No need for ComCol

Eli Gottlieb

When first admitted into UMass, I took the offer because they had also admitted me to Commonwealth College and offered an accompanying scholarship that would help keep me from accruing too large a student debt. I wonder how many others did something similar, because when I ask my friends in ComCol about their experiences, they all sound pretty similar to mine: they took the ComCol admission for the money or to earn high Latin honors.

Of course, when I took the ComCol offer it was portrayed as a "school within a school" that would give me the community and intellectual elitism (as in "highly competent peers," not as in being against Sarah Palin...) of a small college with the resources and diversity of a large state school. Its website promised, and still promises, that Commonwealth College "aims to provide an innovative interdisciplinary curriculum in a learning environment that promotes active student involvement and advances the principles of social justice essential to a diverse democracy."

If the University really wants an honors program that students can deal with ... it needs to tear down Commonwealth College.

Well, they certainly come through on the latter clause. ComCol's community-service learning programs provide students with ample opportunities to serve the Amherst and Five College area communities. However, ComCol utterly fails to provide an innovative interdisciplinary curriculum or foster student involvement, largely because it appears to exist as little more than a feather in the prestige-cap of UMass, helping us get a few spots higher up in the U.S. News college rankings without accomplishing much else.

Its first, most definite flaw glares out so obviously that you've probably spotted it by now if you belong to ComCol yourself: ComCol gears its curriculum and requirements entirely to the career paths of liberal arts and social sciences majors. It completely and utterly fails to offer a significant number of courses in scientific subjects that those of us in 90-credit majors can fit into our schedules and pencil into our tracking forms without taking even more credit overloads than we science and engineering types already do. Yet they have the ignorance and audacity to demand that ComCol students do roughly a full minor's worth of extra work.

Indeed, I have trouble finding science courses in the Commonwealth College listings that aren't merely a special section of an otherwise normal course geared towards residential academic program residents. Still, ComCol requires that students take several honors courses that explicitly cannot be honors colloquia added to their normal work. It requires that we take from its selection of vaguely literary, philosophical and political courses, all of which have a detectable liberal bent that should not show or even exist in mandatory, supposedly apolitical academic work.

Most ComCol students will find what I say about Dean's Book and the Capstone Experience so glaringly obvious that they may wish to skip this section. These requirements for honors students exist, supposedly, to teach students about research and presentation, and to encourage top students to think about graduate school and a life of the mind. A Dean's Book student in a science major who has read, written and edited research papers before can very well find themselves in a "research" course covering little more than literary interpretation, usually out of a book that few people like and nobody wants to read for class.

Capstone Experiences sound like a nice umbrella for the senior thesis typical of most academically rigorous curricula, but again ComCol infects it with a pernicious, creeping bureaucracy and requirements to which neither the student nor the professors of their own department have any desire to subject themselves.

If the university really wants an honors program that students can deal with and for which professors can feel pride, it needs to tear down Commonwealth College. UMass needs to stop forcing its best and brightest through an inferior rip-off of Amherst College for scholarship money and admit that diverse students need diverse honors programs. Rather than a unified "honors college" that only burdens everyone else, individual academic departments or colleges should construct their own honors programs that will fit neatly with their normal programs. After all, high Latin honors now simply go to the best students in each college, so why not just delegate honors down a level or two entirely?

A rare opportunity

Nicole Sobel

It's easy as a college student at a large university to feel lost at times, with the voluminous class sizes, and lack of one-on-one attention with faculty. Often times when you are a student who requires a challenge academically and looks forward to intellectual rigor in classes, you end up feeling very much disappointed and unchallenged by common classes at large universities.

Luckily, Commonwealth College provides a milieu where students can enjoy a dynamic curriculum and camaraderie with fellow students who are talented academically, and who challenge themselves daily in intensive and small classes and seminars.

Meredith Feltus, Director of Outreach & External Programs for the Commonwealth College at UMass, explains why Commonwealth College is so special, and what sets it apart from other programs.

"The honors classes in Commonwealth College are small. They get to know the teachers more closely, which is really a nice benefit for the students. These types of classes also allow [students] to achieve a higher degree of academic excellence and provide them with the ability to make a real pure connection with other students who are just like themselves," she said.

To be able to have such close-knit relationships with faculty at such a large university ... is truly a commodity.

Faculty attention to students, smaller classes and peer connections are just three of the main factors that set Commonwealth College apart from a common university. The program encourages students to excel in every aspect of academia. Commonwealth College challenges its students daily to find connections between theory and practice. It prepares students with outstanding academic performances with the tools they need to accomplish an advantageous and efficacious career in the future. It is the provider to these students of an innovative interdisciplinary curriculum.

The best part, however, of Commonwealth College is the opportunity it affords its students to make personal connections with their peers. A group of students so intensely engaged and passionate about academia will take comfort in the connections and friendships afforded to them by Commonwealth College. To be able to have such close-knit relationships with faculty at such a large university is truly a commodity and an asset to students. Commonwealth College is so much more than a program. Everything about it makes it exceptional. It motivates and inspires its students daily to be able to leave the university with a sense of high personal achievement, academic excellence and merit, and an active engagement in society.

Commonwealth College students share the bond of being enraptured in enriched honors, a passion for excelling over and beyond in academics, and challenging themselves in enriched honors colloquia. It's a comfort and a truly unbelievable opportunity for Commonwealth College students to know they're involved in something where everyone else shares at least one of the same passions as them; excellence in academics.

Commonwealth College dares its students everyday to take steps beyond common achievement. It motivates them and inspires them to make a difference in the world, and Commonwealth provides them with the tools, knowledge, personal connections, friendships and inspiration daily to do so.

Even for animals, recession

Hannah Nelson

Eastern Massachusetts versus Western Massachusetts: it is an old battle rearing its ugly head once again. The Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (MSPCA) announced last week that three of its locations are closing, one of which is the Western New England Animal Care and Adoption Center in Springfield.

In less than two months, on March 31, the shelter will close its doors. A total of 26,000 animals go through the seven MSPCA locations combined in one year. The bad economic situation is worming its way into every aspect of life, and even cute and cuddly pets aren't immune.

In economic spirals it's not uncommon for there to be a decrease in adoptions and an increase in families who can't afford to take care of their pets any longer. Many families would rather do the responsible thing, bringing pets to a shelter rather than abandon them. The MSPCA has always provided pet owners with alternative options for bringing in their animals when there's a strain on the household and the adoption center only considers taking in pets as a last resort. Owners often bring their pets there for health emergencies as well and have long depended on it as a resource. It isn't just an animal shelter; it's a valuable community resource.

Of the seven MSPCA locations in the state, the Springfield location is the only one in Western Massachusetts. The Brockton and Martha's Vineyard locations are the two closing in Eastern Massachusetts. With all the money floating around Martha's Vineyard, do you really expect me to believe that the island's summer home owners can't afford to keep it afloat with donations? What – the tax break wasn't worth it? What charitable giving is next on the list to ax – homeless shelters and food pantries?

The political realm is known for its long arms, but Western Mass. always manages to be conveniently out of reach. Take a look at healthcare. I'm no big fan of Boston HealthNet Plan's Commonwealth Care, and looking through an inch and a half thick provider directory is just one more reason for the dislike. There are far more providers locations in Eastern Mass., making it harder for Western Massachusetts citizens to get the care they need. It's only logical then that there would be a 1-to-6 ratio when it comes down to state animal care resources as well.

People are losing their jobs, their homes, their pets, and peace of mind. Will Springfield ever see a revitalized MSPCA?

People are losing their jobs, their homes, their pets and their peace of mind. Will Springfield ever see a revitalized MSPCA once we finally start to see some economic relief? We keep getting told it's going to get better, but all I see is it getting worse. Everywhere there are cutbacks, and I'm sick and tired of it, just like everyone else. When it comes to economics in Massachusetts, it's not surprising that the western half would get the kick when it comes down to the crunch.

Long time subjects of animal advocate wrath are the dog breeders. Little elaboration is needed, but I'm looking at you, "Marley & Me", Westminster and Pedigree. There is one more party that deserves to carry a lot of blame on the issue, and they are the veterinarians. There isn't much of an explanation needed here either. Anyone who has ever had a pet knows how quickly the bills rack up when you have a sick pet, or even a healthy one that needs a couple hundred dollars worth of vaccinations. People shouldn't have to resort to buying pet health insurance, which does in fact exist. I only know of one vet who charges reasonable fees for care, but such a thing is a novelty.

There's been a surge in adoptions since last week's news as members of the community showed their concern, with as many as 50 pets getting homes in two days. The closing of three shelters means that there will be less room for homeless pets in the future. That means thousands of pets from Western Mass. will end up dispersed through other shelters like the Dakin Pioneer Valley Humane Society in Greenfield and the Berkshire Humane Society in Pittsfield. The remaining animals are going to be transported to the remaining four Eastern Mass. shelters come April.

According to MSPCA's Springfield website, "Last year alone, our Adoption Center provided care to 6,100 homeless animals, found new homes for 2,000 animals, helped an additional 1,020 animals by transferring them to other adoption centers and rescue groups, and sterilized 2,000 animals – all without any state or federal funding." On this campus it's not unusual to hear about the occasional clandestine dorm pet. Ferrets, hamsters and rabbits are just a few in to come up in conversation. Consider this a strong hint to sympathetic campus groups for those future fundraising brainstorm sessions.

NEW LATIN HONORS SYSTEM NOT MISLED

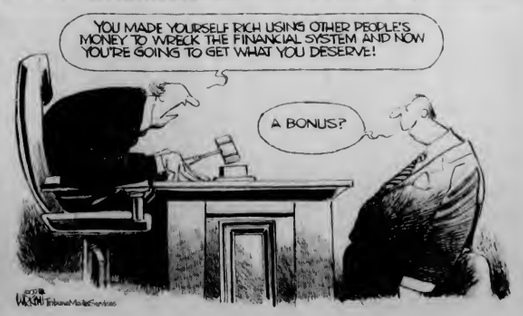
RE: "Staff Ed: Change to Latin Honors eliminates incentive" February 4, Collegian Editorial Board

Dear Editor,



In its article, "A high bar set for Latin honors" (Thursday, February 5th,) the Daily Collegian's Editorial Board says the reasons behind the change in standards for Latin honors are inappropriate and that the new standards are set too high. First, standards should be set high. Academic honors should be awarded to those who have worked for them, with the highest honors going to the hardest working. The new qualifications for receiving high Latin honors will be changed to better reflect this. The hardest working should be rewarded best, and sometimes they just don't want to deal with the nightmare ComCol can be.

The coming standards are not unreasonable when compared with other colleges. Every year, US News and World Report ranks the best institutions of higher education. Of their top 15 national universities, nine offer university-wide Latin honors. Of those nine, seven award summa cum laude to those graduating in the top 5% of their class or graduating with a 3.9 GPA. If the Editorial Board would like to compare the proposed system with that of University of Michigan or UC-Berkeley, they will find that they give summa cum laude, on average, to the top 3% at Michigan, which translates to 3.75 in engineering and 3.93 in liberal arts, and those with 3.927 or better at Berkeley. As Michigan's case shows, the difference between GPAs based on studies that will occur here will not require higher grades as the Editorial Board claims.

Furthermore, the Board criticizes Chancellor Holub for trying to reduce the size of Commonwealth College during a hard financial time. The university is going to have to attack the budget from some angle, and this one works well. Reducing the size of honors program helps it focus on a smaller target. Resources will not be stretched as thin, and the community ComCol brags about in all its fliers can more effectively develop. The decision on the whole is not irresponsible, and neither is the timing. It would make less sense to try to keep ComCol the same size with a smaller budget. Timing and money aside, Latin honors should not be mishandled or taken lightly, and this change in policy will fix that.

'Titanic' stars pair for 'Road'

By Frank Godinho
Collegian Staff

After deciding to settle down and live on Revolutionary Road, Frank and April Wheeler fit the image of the type of couple whom neighbors gossip about with jealousy. With a quintessential colonial home in the suburbs and two young children, the Wheelers have everything going for them. It's their self-assured exterior that convincingly hides their true hatred for one another and their unhappiness with their current situation in life.

Kate Winslet and Leonardo DiCaprio, who last paired up in 1997's "Titanic," reunite on-screen to play the Wheelers, the unhappy husband and wife duo in director Sam Mendes' ("American Beauty") even darker glimpse at suburban life in his latest film "Revolutionary Road," based on the 1961 novel by Richard Yates.

Within minutes, we're given an inside look at the loathsome relationship between April and Frank, as a simple discussion quickly erupts into a vicious argument almost to the point of physical violence. However, the scene never suggests that this seemingly loveless marriage is ever on the verge of a divorce. Instead, it suggests they're destined to live together forever in misery.

While April is home cooking and cleaning, Frank works at a well-paid, yet dull office job. They've unintentionally arrived at the life they never wanted to have. They never envisioned themselves settling down to a monotonous way of life. After witnessing the demise of her own aspiring acting career, April decides it's time to resist society's ridiculous rules and pitches the idea to move to Paris to her husband Frank.

It will be the move their marriage desperately needs and where April believes Frank will finally have the opportunity to become the man he's meant to be.

It all seems too good to be true, doesn't it? People don't just impulsively get up and move on a whim's notice. For Frank, it takes some time and a significant piece of news to realize this, but for April nothing is going to change her mind and nobody is going to get in her way. The only person who seems to understand the decision is John Givings (Michael Shannon), a man undergoing psychiatric treatment in the town. To him, the Wheelers are of the few people who can see both the hopelessness and the emptiness in suburban life.

The problem with "Revolutionary Road" is its main characters, who have no redeeming qualities whatsoever. Their relationship throughout the film is like a car crash on the side of the highway. It's painful to look at, but you can't turn away.

Winslet embodies a character that it's nearly impossible

Leonardo DiCaprio and Kate Winslet reunite for "Revolutionary Road," their first film together since 1997's "Titanic." The film, directed by Sam Mendes, pits the two stars against one another in a less-than-perfect suburban marriage.

Dark 'Coraline' not simply kid's flick

Grim world of dolls, button eyes interpretted in clay fantasy

By Morgan Meagher
Collegian Staff

From the first few moments of "Coraline," it is apparent that this animated feature is not, as it would appear at first glance, a film for children. The opening credits roll over shots of spindly metal fingers destroying a stuffed doll – disturbing images even for someone who used to pop the heads off of Barbie dolls as a child.

In fact, nothing in "Coraline" is as it appears to be. The story is standard issue: a malcontent little girl who feels lonely and neglected escapes through the looking glass to another world where everything seems like a dream come true, only to learn that true happiness was waiting at home all along.

Despite the formulaic concept, "Coraline" is far from dull. What awaits the titular Coraline (voiced by Dakota Fanning) and the viewer is an unexpectedly imaginative and downright creepy adventure.

Poor Coraline, uprooted by her parents, finds herself in what is apparently the middle of nowhere. With no one but some very weird old neighbors, her neglectful parents (Teri Hatcher and John Hodgman), and an obnoxious little boy named Wybie (Robert Bailey Jr.) for company, the situation seems hopeless. The precise setting is never specified; Coraline's new home is a big old house on a desolate mountainside.

Wybie enters the scene on his dirt bike, asserting his position as Coraline's equally spunky but unwanted sidekick. He also brings an element of mystery to the story. He lives with his grandmother, the owner of Coraline's apartment house, but he is forbidden from entering the dwelling. As he explains to Coraline, his grandmother's twin disappeared from the house when they were little, and she believes the house is too dangerous for children.

It is Wybie who introduces the doll from the opening scene, which has been refashioned to look just like Coraline. The doll is one of the more inventive elements in the movie. The antagonist of the film, known alternatively as the "Other Mother" and "The Belle Dame," is an evil being who uses the doll to spy on and capture the souls of children. Each time, the doll is re-crafted to resemble the unfortunate, unhappy target.

The Other Mother lures Coraline into her world through a hidden door behind a bureau. She provides everything Coraline's world is lacking. Her delicious meals compensate for the terrible cooking of Coraline's father. While Coraline's real parents seem exasperated to see or hear her, the Other Parents are eager to play games, sing to Coraline and tuck her in at night. The real Wybie never shuts up; the one made by the Other Mother is quite mute. Even though it's obvious the kid is on a straight path to disaster, it's hard to blame Coraline for liking this world better.

Director/co-writer Henry Selick did a fantastic job crafting both the "real" world and the bizzaro world, which Coraline reaches through a hidden door in her family's new apartment. The house itself is a little girl's dream: a big, rambling pink mansion complete with a turret, dubbed The Pink Palace.

Downstairs live two aging British actresses, going a bit dotty in their old age, while upstairs is a possibly drunk, certainly strange Russian acrobat with a troupe of performing mice. Interesting neighbors for sure, but not much fun for a little girl, especially when they insist on calling Coraline "Caroline."

In the special universe crafted by Coraline's "Other Mother" (also Teri Hatcher), these characters cater to the girl's every whim, but the real-world versions are just as amusing. The actresses, Misses Spink and Forcible, voiced by Jennifer Saunders of "Absolutely Fabulous" and Dawn French, respectively, are quite batty, as evidenced by their wall of taxidermied terriers. In the fantasy world, they perform a bawdy act that shocks and entices young Coraline, while in the real world they prove to be more canny and helpful than one could expect from two old biddies.

Take thriller 'Taken' lightly, with popcorn

By Bryan Shaffer
Collegian Correspondent

Looking at the 2009 Oscar Nominees, one might be a bit puzzled by a single omission. The new Pierre Morel movie, "Taken," was oddly omitted from any such nominations. Such an injustice should not be allowed to stand. In fact, the Academy would be well served to tack screenwriters Luc Besson and Robert Mark Kamen on as nominees for best original screenplay.

Well, not exactly. "Taken" can be called many things, but innovative, original, or any synonym of the like would be completely inappropriate. Some better adjectives corresponding with "Taken" include cliché, excessive and predictable. There's not much more that can be said, except that it was a hell of a good time, anyway.

Anyone who has seen the trailer probably has a good grasp on what the movie is about, but here is a quick recap of the premise: Liam Neeson plays Bryan Mills, a former CIA agent who traded in his gun for a chance to get closer to his estranged teenage daughter.

Shortly after her seventeenth birthday, Mills' daughter takes a trip to Paris, where she is abducted by some Albanians looking to sell her as a prostitute. Mills must look to his "very particular set of skills" to rescue her before she is too deep in the European underground to ever be found.

As implied above, the plot is nothing short of cliché. A study could be done to show that a similar premise has been used exactly one million times in previously released thrillers, but if that's the case why is it such a good time?

The answer is simple: Besson does what has been done so often before, and does it just right. "Taken" comes complete with all the elements a viewer looks for in a popcorn thriller – intense fight scenes, car chases, evil villains and a mysterious, yet likeable main character who takes no prisoners. It even features a weak American accent by an Irish actor. What more could you want?

The best thing about "Taken" is the fact that the film comes just as advertised. It identifies itself as a fun, slightly over the top thrill ride, and never tries to be anything but that. Within the first act, we are introduced to Mills and his family, and we get a pretty good sense that there is going to be minimal character development throughout the story. Besson sets up each of the characters in the vein of cliché action movie characters.

In Mills, you have the man on a mission, and won't allow anything or anyone to stop him from reaching his goal. In Mills' daughter, Kim, played by Maggie Grace, you have the helpless damsel in distress, with her fate entirely in the hands of the protagonist. By minimizing character depth, Besson allows us to bypass the process of analyzing the characters, leaving the viewer with a clearer head with which to enjoy the nonstop action.

The plot goes out of its way to present Mills with some sticky situations where the only way out is to use brute force and special fighting tactics to disarm a large number of bad guys. Fortunately for us, a majority of these action sequences are well shot and allow the adrenaline to pump up a couple notches, giving us a good time in the theater. For instance, in one scene, Mills comes to a building where the Albanian kidnappers dwell and, despite encountering a five on one confrontation, Mills spends a couple minutes showing them exactly what the CIA can do for you (he destroys them).

Besson does a good job moving the film at a fairly quick pace, with Mills spending no more than five minutes in any particular location, which works well. Not only does it keep the action coming at a constant flow, but it keeps our short attention spans from wandering too far from what's at hand.

All in all, "Taken" was a very fun movie to watch. Despite its predictability and clichés, it offers the viewer a chance to kick back, munch on some popcorn and watch a fairly straight forward action movie. Not by any means a must see, but if you are bored and have a couple dollars to kill, it's well worth the price of admission.

Magician Kubínek to clown around at FAC

Prague-born Tomáš Kubínek will bring his magicianship, circus training and physical theater to the FAC Friday.

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

Tomáš Kubínek has been dubbed a "Certified Lunatic and Master of the Impossible." He claims he achieved his lunatic certification "by mail order off the back of a match book," but he also describes himself as a "fool, clown, visual poet, solo performance artist, multi-talented vaudevillian, comic genius, and charming huckster."

This diverse one-man show performer will be bringing these various personalities to the stage at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center this Friday, Feb. 13.

Kubínek was born in Prague in the 1960s. However, the 1968 Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia forced his family to flee to Austria and then Canada when Kubínek was three.

It was in Canada two years later when he saw his first circus, inspiring Kubínek to get involved in circus, theater and magic. After a few years spent attending every show in the area, Kubínek began to learn magic for himself.

"I joined a magic club of old men when I was eight or nine years old," Kubínek said. "They were mostly hobby magicians who on weekends did shows at hospitals and birthday parties ... I would be the youngest one there, dropped off by my parents."

These men taught Kubínek the secrets of the trade and by the time he was 13 he had an agent. Coffeehouses were his usual venue until he joined Circus Flora as the rear of a two-person horse costume.

"At the end of the number the gag was that the horse split in half and the front half would run away and I was left chasing after it in undershirt and boxer shorts with the back half of the horse costume around my ankles," he said.

Kubínek quickly moved up in Circus Flora, however. He said, "Over the course of several runs they realized my talents were of greater use than me running around in my boxer shorts."

He was promoted to "Guest Villian" and over time was able to save enough to travel to Europe to study with such great theater teachers as Jaques Lecoq, Pierre Byland and Boleslav Polvika.

A number of collaborative efforts resulted from this training. Kubínek has been featured on Polvika's television specials on Czech National Television, created a three-man play called "MOOSE," which toured through Europe for a year, with Britain's The Right Size physical theater company. He also co-created and starred in "Bed," a solo show about an insomniac cabaret artist, and worked as co-creator and director for a one-woman show called "Not Yet, At All."

Many awards, both serious and silly, have been bestowed upon Kubínek, including the Moers Comedy Prize from the International Comedy Arts Festival in Germany, the Samuel Beckett Theater Award from The Dublin Theater Festival in Ireland, and "The Gold Fly-Swatter," awarded for to feel any empathy toward, while DiCaprio's Frank is someone who is quite simply a man whose actions at times seem incomprehensible. Their marriage is a horror story from the get-go and conveys a dismal feeling for any who witness it.

Kathy Bates is charming in her supporting role as Helen Givings, the real-estate agent with the utmost affection for the Wheelers for their generous hospitality toward her son John. Shannon's scene-stealing performance as John recently garnered him an Academy Award nomination.

His mad antics and disregard for the Wheelers or his parents' feelings are brilliantly displayed in the scene, and his ability to switch his demeanor from fascination to outrage is deserving of the nomination.

"Revolutionary Road" is not a bad film. Technically speaking, it's well made and features incredible performances by Winslet, DiCaprio and Shannon. But it's script and overall message leave you with the same feelings of hopelessness and emptiness that are expressed so thoroughly in the film

For anyone whose Valentine's Day plans this weekend include seeing a movie, perhaps it's best you skip this one.

Leonardo DiCaprio plays Frank Wheeler, a man stuck in an inevitably difficult relationship with his wife, April, played by Kate Winslet.

Animated 'Coraline' a creepy affair

The best part of "Coraline" is undoubtedly the animation. Reminiscent of "The Nightmare Before Christmas," another by Selick, the visual style is that of an extremely whimsical nightmare. It is this style which elevates the film above the confines of the plot. The claymation simultaneously makes the story more charming, while belying the more disturbing motifs.

The creatures in the Other Mother's world all have buttons for eyes. This does not seem too unusual, as the animated characters are practically dolls anyway, but when the Other Mother insists that Coraline trade in her eyes for buttons (thus surrendering her soul), the glinting, already threaded needle and the Other Father's assertion that it will hardly hurt at all still packs a punch.

All this conspires to trap "Coraline" somewhere between family-friendly fare and a dark fairy tale better suited to older audiences. It's "Pan's Labyrinth" meets "James and the Giant Peach." If children aren't frightened, the symbolism may be going right over their heads. The film remains sweet and charming enough to appeal to the kid in all of us, but if it is in fact aimed at the grown-ups, it may as well have been a bit darker than it is before culminating in the trite but welcome happy ending a film of this ilk is obliged to provide. Although the concept is hardly unpredictable, the outcome is unusual and funny just leave the little ones at home.

When young Coraline enters a portal in her lonely new house, imaginations run wild. Selick ("The Nightmare Before Christmas," "James and the Giant Peach") crafts an eerie clay world not just for kids.

University hosts Kubínek's one-man show

Kubínek's victory in a house-fly-catching competition. Of his awards Kubínek has said, "They all collect dust equally and are useless other than as paperweights, but getting them helps with the hype and people think you are more important just because someone else said you are."

He also jokingly added, "I've come to expect them [awards], really, and feel quite insulted if a week goes by without my receiving one."

It is Kubínek's solo work that he is best known for. He describes his show as "a brilliant one man show of absurd stories, death defying experiments and spontaneous hilarity," and has said, "My performance has the usual effects one can expect; mass hypnosis, attempts on my life, marriage proposals ... Mainly I've been told that my work is funny and life affirming."

Most of Kubínek's ideas are his own, although colleagues sometimes offer suggestions for his act. He is always experimenting and hopes to make his audience laugh at every performance.

"The performance is unique and personal in that I am simultaneously author, director and performer in every moment being created before the public's very eyes."

Tomás Kubínek will perform at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Friday Feb 13 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $30, $25, or $15, and $10 for Five College students and youth 17 and under.

Second half lifts UMass

sive presence as UMass coach Marnie Dacko wants her to be.

"I'd like her to step up and rebound and be more aggressive on the boards," Dacko said. "But she's done a great job for us and she's only going to get better."

Yet Danella was the only Minutewoman to score more than three points at the half. She scored 11 of her 19 points in the first half.

UMass played a press that was especially impressive in the first half. Only Wallace finished the half in double figures (11 points, three rebounds). The Minutewomen also caused six turnovers.

The UMass offense was limited in the first half because of miscues and mismatches in the post due to size. The Minutewomen had 13 turnovers and both Danella and center Teya Wright were called on two early fouls.

The fact that senior captain Stefanie Gerardot – the team's leading scorer left early in the first half due to an apparent coach's decision. Fortunately for the Minutewomen, it didn't doom them.

Dacko ran a lineup that used sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove as another scorer. Mosgrove was a solid defensive presence in the paint but sophomore forward Stephanie Lawrence was the player who stepped up to force attention from the Owl defense. Lawrence hit a 3-pointer on a fast break initiated by center Nicole Jones' defensive rebound and long pass to Lawrence.

Lawrence's score not only made Temple give her more looks on defense but it knocked the Owls off-balance for the rest of the half.

The second half was another game entirely. UMass had an offensive explosion that was led by Young. Young had 11 second-half points, five of which came from the free-throw line.

Wright dominated the post with 10 rebounds while notching six points in the second half.

The other positive statistic for the Minutewomen was the 14 assists that never let Temple get comfortable on defense. The Owls committed 11 personal fouls in the second half alone, compared to the six committed by UMass.

The 10 points the Minutewomen scored at the foul line may have made the difference in a game that saw the lead change hands eight times.

"We really played as a unit," Dacko said of the scoring of her entire team. "I think that the rebounding sets the tone for us. We're much better if we get the ball off the rebound and push it up the floor."

The game was won not just in the paint but with basic, fundamental play and the kind of team basketball that Dacko has preached to her players all season long.

UMass plays another home game on Saturday at 2 p.m.

Kim Benton scored five points, added three rebounds and four assists yesterday. Benton was part of the overall team effort that lead to the win.

night off the bench finishing with seven points and a career-high nine rebounds as the entire bench contributed 26 points.

"Matt Glass had his best first half of the year," Kellogg said of Glass' performance. "Seven, I said seven rebounds in the first half. I went into the locker room and I told him I thought lightning hit the building.

"We did get great bench production tonight and we were able to rest our starters which will hopefully give us a little bit of an advantage come Saturday at St. Bonaventure."

The complete team effort continued in the second half, and impressed forward Tony Gaffney, who tied Harris for a team high 19 points and got his eighth double-double of the season with 10 rebounds.

"Everyone contributed from [Lowe] all the way down to [Lex Mongo]," Gaffney said. "Anytime we can get a full contribution from the entire team like that it shows in the scoring column."

Bonner also contributed to the scoring column, shooting a perfect 4-for-4 from the floor, with all four shots coming from 3-point range for 12 points. The Minutemen's center also grabbed seven rebounds.

Fordham, who was led by a 21-point effort off the bench from sophomore Mike Moore, may be the weakest team in the A-10, but the win was still impressive for UMass, because it was away from the Mullins Center. Prior to the game, UMass was 1-8 on the road and had lost on the road to some of the weaker teams in the conference.

"Right now I feel we can go anywhere and at least be competitive and give our selves a chance to win," Kellogg said. "Now we've proved that we can win some games on the road."

Even more so, the Minutemen were just in search of wins as they hope to finish .500 and qualify for the postseason.

In the win column a 1-point win and a 23-point win both count the same.

"We were desperate for a win and we got one," Lowe said.

Jeffrey R. Lurnard can be reached at jlurnard@student.umass.edu

Stability lacking in offensive output

with a bit of room for error.

Northeastern (19-7-2, 14-4-1 HEA) returns to Amherst with one of highest scoring offenses and a net minder who stacks up with some of the best in the nation. Brad Thiessen has started every game this season in net for the Huskies. The junior has posted 2.19 goals against average, a .932 save percentage and a 19-7-2 record, leading the Huskies to the top of the conference.

Wade MacLeod and Ryan Ginand lead an extremely consistent NU offense. Only one point in the entire season has Northeastern's offense put up less than two goals and that was against then-No. 1 Boston University back on Nov. 16. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, they can't say the same about their goal scorers.

On any given night UMass attackers can score three goals or more then lose the next night, 2-1. Five out of the last six games the Minutemen have failed to score more than two goals.

"First order of business is to be more complete offensively, it's not like we're losing 6-5 games or 7-6 games; we're losing 2-1 games," Cahoon said. "Usually you need to expect that you're going to produce more than one or two goals in a game so we need to generate more offense, be more efficient around the net; we need to get consistent play from people on the offense side of the net."

With the Friars just outside in the standings, the Minutemen have to get every facet of the team on the same page with only so much time to do it.

Solid defense plays havoc

from the free-throw line to add 14 points.

Along with Hill, Young was able to play tough defense and kept Owl shooting guard Kristie Watkins-Day out of the box score.

But the Minutewomen's saving grace was sophomore center Teya Wright, who grabbed 10 rebounds and created second-chance opportunities on the offensive side of the glass.

The Minutewomen collapsed the lane to prevent TU forward Shanea Cotton and Shenita Landry from getting easy points and securing offensive rebounds.

"We wanted to disrupt their tempo because we didn't have the personnel to play them in a man [zone]," Dacko said. "So we were going to take our chances to try and rebound and defend out of the zone."

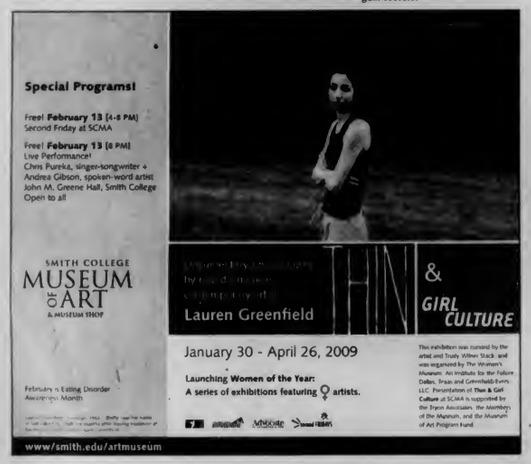
With a solid game from most of its starters, the Minutewomen received production and quality minutes off of the bench.

Junior guard Kim Benton (five points) hit a huge 3-pointer to put the game out of reach in the second half, as the Minutewomen went 19-for-29 in the second half.

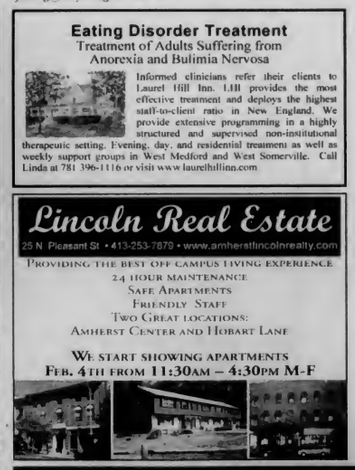
Benton led the UMass offense with Hill and Young on the bench against a Temple defense that had a knack for slowing game play down and forcing turnovers.

Along with Benton, sophomore forward Stephanie Lawerence had 11 points, and was 2-of-3 from deep.

Lawerence took a pivotal charge in the second half that gave the Minutewomen momentum, and was effective in slowing down the Owls post presence.



"She's been practicing well this week and gave us some quality," Dacko said. "She is a little longer in the two-three zone, coming out and defending 3-point shooters, so I thought that proved effectively."



The Minutewomen created bad shots for Temple, who shot 33.3 percent for the game and an abysmal 28.6 percent from deep.

"It was a huge win for us and for our program," Dacko added. "This is a very, very young team and we had young kids on the floor and they played as a unit."

Temple is a much bigger team that could play in the post and has many upperclassmen on its roster. On paper, they are a better balanced team that usually plays as a team. They shut down UMass' best player but it wasn't effective, because in this game the Minutewomen were the more balanced team.

UMass performs on road

Minutemen add to big halftime lead, cruise to win

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD

First it was Tony Gaffney.

Seven points and three rebounds in the first three minutes, 33 seconds as the Massachusetts men's basketball team built a 9-0 lead over Fordham.

Then it was Chris Lowe.

From the 14:55 mark to the 11:35 mark of the first half, UMass' lead grew from 14-4 to 24-13. Lowe had six points and two assists in that stretch, on his way to a 10-point and seven-assist effort.

Then it was Ricky Harris who scored 11 points of an 18-3 Minutemen run between the 11:53 and 7:40 mark of the first half.

And that was not the end of it as UMass built a 58-27 lead on its way to a 91-68 victory over the Rams Wednesday night in the Bronx, N.Y. It was UMass' first road victory in Atlantic 10 play this season.

|---|---|
| Fordham | 68 |

Looking at the Minutemen's (9-13, 4-5 A-10) stats for the first half, many may have thought they had played an entire game. The 57 points (they scored fewer than 57 in four full games this season), Gaffney was one rebound short of a double-double with 12 points and nine rebounds, Matt Glass tied a career-high seven rebounds and Lowe had 10 points and six rebounds of his own.

"I thought we played unbelievable in the first half," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said. "Tonight the shots were falling and that is why we had such a lead at half."

But UMass' first half dominance was more than just a dominant performance by one or two players; it was a complete team effort. The team shot 58.3 percent from the floor (21-of-36), 44.4 percent (8-of-18) from 3-point range with five different players hitting at least one, out rebounded Fordham (3-18, 1-8 A-10) by a count of 28-13 and had nine players score.

Everything continued to go UMass' way even in the second half of a game where they never trailed, as the Minutemen continued to build its lead. With 16:44 left in the game, UMass had gone up by a game-high 35 points at 67-32.

"It was just a good team effort," Kellogg said after the game. "I thought defensively we were on our game, we made some shots, we pushed it in transition and we did a nice job."

The lead slipped towards the end of the game as Kellogg got valuable minutes out of his bench and rested his starters for their next game. Glass had the biggest

Whole team effort leads to upset win

Four Massachusetts women's basketball team players scored in double figures in the Minutewomen's upset victory against Temple Wednesday afternoon, 71-60.

Surprisingly, Stefanie Gerardot wasn't one of them.

The senior guard has been the most consistent offensive catalyst for UMass, leading the Minutewomen in points per game with 14.9 while providing veteran leadership to an inexperienced team trying to find itself.

But, a young team was able to play as a unit and was effective even without a stellar performance in her absence her.

Freshman forward Kristina Danella led all scorers with 19 points and went 5-for-10 from 3-point range.

Gerardot played substantial minutes (21) but was just 1-for-5 from the field and finished with just two points.

"It was a coach's decision," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said, regarding Gerardot. "Diatiema was doing a great job defensively and I thought we were effective with Kim and Sakera at the guard position."

The redshirt sophomore guard Hill was responsible for stopping speedy Owl guard LaKeisha Eaddy, and was effective, as Eaddy could not find her shot throughout the entire game.

She also added eight rebounds, a statistic that was the Minutewomen's main concern coming into the game against TU.

"The first thing we had on the board was if we out-rebounded them, we would win the hall-game," Dacko said. "The kids need to know that we are prepared going in with the [practice team], and they need to deliver the knockout punch."

Senior guard Sakera Young helped deliver that blow, going 4-for-5 from the field and 5-of-6

Danella's 19 leads way as Gerardot struggles throughout

When a team rallies around a big performance by its star player, it says something about the player. When a team rallies around the play of someone else, it means even more.

While leading-scorer Stefanie Gerardot struggled, freshman Kristina Danella and helped lead the Massachusetts women's basketball team to a 71-60 upset victory over conference rival Temple Wednesday afternoon at the Mullins Center.

Danella led all UMass scorers with 19 points, including 5-for-10 from beyond the arc. Gerardot scored a season low two points on 1-for-5 shooting in just 18 minutes of play.

The Minutewomen (10-14, 3-6 Atlantic 10) started the game off with a 10-0 run which set the pace of the game. The Owls (15-8, 6-3 A-10) played from behind for much of the first half but made a push at about seven minutes left in the opening frame.

Down by six points, Temple guard LaKeisha Eaddy was fouled by Sakera Young and cut the deficit to four after making two free throws. Forward Shenita Landra sank two more shots from the foul line and guard Shaqwedia Wallace nailed a shot from beyond the arc to put Temple up by one, 21-20.

Fighting to keep postseason slot, Mass Attack search for wins

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If it wasn't bad enough for the Massachusetts hockey team – losers of its last three games – the Minutemen get to take on one of the top teams in the country, No. 3 Northeastern this weekend.

Twice.

The only previous meeting between the two teams ended in a 6-4 UMass victory on Jan. 30. Despite the win, the Minutemen let their emotions get the best of them, bringing down their play in all three zones and overshadowing the spectacular night UMass net minder Paul Dainton really had.

The Huskies, winners of four out of their last six, travel to Amherst Friday night fresh off their 5-2 loss to Boston University in the Beanpot final. NU beat reigning national champions, Boston College, thrashing them 5-1 to reach the finals.

The Minutemen will also play the Huskies in Boston on Saturday.

"We need to dispel any idea that there will be a post-Beanpot slack-off just because of one emotional game," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "[Northeastern] has held first place in this league from the beginning of November through right to this time.

"This is going to be a real hard game. It's going to be a game that I think a better Northeastern team is going to come into the rink than that was here a couple weeks ago."

The Minutemen (11-14-3, 6-10-3 Hockey East) find themselves in somewhat of a hole. With only eight games remaining, UMass, currently eighth in the confcrence standings, is fighting to keep its slot in the Hockey East Tournament. UMass finds itself seven points ahead of Providence going into the final stretch. The Minutemen have caught a break recently, as the Friars are 1-4-1 in their last six games – providing the Minutemen

Offensive spark non-existent

Potent scoring threats vanished during first half of season

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The potential is there, everyone has seen it, but the Massachusetts hockey team continues to struggle with a consistent attack.

Defending isn't the issue for the Minutemen; it's their failing to score one more goal to tie or win various games that has slowly lowered the team to eighth in Hockey East rankings.

The Minutemen have scored multiple goals in numerous games, most recently the 6-4 win over Northeastern (Jan. 30). But, as of late, the consistency of UMass' offense is still lacking.

The Minutemen (11-14-3, 6-10-3 Hockey East) aren't losing to teams in high-scoring games because of a lack of defensive proficiency. They are losing games by one goal: 2-1 loss to Maine (Feb. 1), 2-0 loss to Boston College (Feb. 6) and a 2-1 loss to UMass-Lowell (Feb: 7).

"The defense piece, for the most part, has been in play," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We give up a couple goals, there are mistakes made; it's not perfect defense by any means."

But the defense is doing its job and the offense is expected to be able to score one or more goals in a game. The problem is the Minutemen aren't generating the offense that they did at the start of the season. They aren't being efficient and productive enough around the net and lack consistent play on the offensive side of the ice.

UMass has all the pieces to make their offense work and it's recognized by coaches around the conference.

"UMass has a lot of team speed. They've clearly recruited players that fit that system that they play," Northeastern coach Greg Cronin said in the weekly Hockey East teleconference. "They trap, they counter attack really well. I was thinking about it after the BU game. UMass beat BU at UMass, 5-1, and that's impressive in itself. They shuffled their lines so anytime they've got, whether it's [Alex] Berry, [Cory] Quirk or [James] Marcou, or [Chase] Langeraap, [Michael] Lecomte and [Chris] Davis, those top six guys are pretty good. That third line of [T.J.] Syner, [Casey] Wellman and [Will] Ortiz has ridiculous speed. They may have more team speed than anyone in the league."

But with the team speed, the third leading scorer in Hockey East (Marcou, five goals, 17 assists for 22 points) and a deep attack, what can get the energy back into the offense that was present at the start of the season. That's the question that Cahoon has been asking, as of late.

"I shut the doors to the locker room and I have conversations with them that sometimes speak to their core," Cahoon said on how he tries to spark energy in the team. "Hopefully they interpret that and they are able to rally with one another so the best of them comes out."

"If they don't [get energized] then they've got to start looking themselves in the mirror. The coaches can't go out there and play the games for them and I can show my passion, I can try to articulate my passion. The coaches can show their expertise, they can teach but we can't be their inner soul, they have to be their own inner soul," Cahoon said.

An energetic offense will be needed this weekend in the Minutemen's home-and-home series against Northeastern. UMass will host the Huskies on Friday at 7 p.m.

New students at Cashin

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Cashin Residence Hall in the Sylvan Residential Area will become a 12-month dorm next fall and house graduate students and undergraduates not of the typical college student age, according the University of Massachusetts Housing Assignments Office.

A letter from Associate Director of Residence Life or Assignments and Administration David Vaillancourt informed the dorm's residents of the change and offered them advice on how to go about the fall 2009 room selection process.

Vaillancourt also said in the letter he is confident that students living in Cashin that want to continue living in the area will likely find available space in Brown or McNamara, the other two buildings in Sylvan.

Residence Life staff members met with Cashin residents to answer questions about their housing options and added that students could go to housing.umass.edu for more information.

UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said that Housing and Residence Life staff members worked with graduate student leaders to create the new arrangements. The shake-up is a response to requests from graduate and non-traditional aged, or "non-trad," undergraduate students for more single rooms, bathroom privacy and newer kitchens.

He said that since 2003 the number of graduate students requesting and getting an assignment in a traditional residence hall has decreased along with the amount of graduate students living in such dorms during summers.

"The move to make Cashin a 12-month housing facility for graduate and non-traditional undergraduates best meets [those students'] needs," Blaguszewski said in an e-mail. He added that about 120 of the University's approximately 5,820 grad students live in traditional dorms.

Blaguszewski said that in addition to the Cashin change, the Prince Residence Hall will become a nine-month traditional undergraduate housing facility, meaning it will be open during academic breaks like Thanksgiving weekend.

Though the University is trying to ease the transition process for Cashin residents, some students aren't happy about having to leave.

Cashin residence hall will become a 12-month dorm next fall.

"Obviously, everyone needs a place to live but I don't think that people should be forced out [of their dorms]," said UMass junior Nicole Figucia. "I like [living in Cashin] … If you want to meet people it's easy to, but if you want alone time it's easy to do that, too."

IT jobs still going strong

By Graeme Wilson
Collegian Correspondent

While the job market for graduating seniors continues to look bleak, the US Bureau of Labor Statistics predicts that in 2016, there will be over 700,000 new job openings in computer engineering and network/system analysis.

With the vast number of layoffs in the past two years and the prospects for new jobs increasingly slim, students are showing serious concern about being able to find a job after graduation. However, those studying engineering, especially electrical and computer, and Information Technology are generally confident that they will have less trouble.

"There is always going to be a demand," said Clem Leung, a junior computer systems engineering major. "The world is getting more and more dependent on computers and the Internet, and companies everywhere need people to constantly be updating their networks."

However, some have voiced the idea that the flood of graduates in the next few years will flood the work force with qualified bodies.

"The key is to make sure you specialize yourself. IT is a very broad field," Leung said. "As long as you have the right job in view, you just work towards that one goal."

He is currently working on the CCNA (Cisco Certified Network Associate), a specialized certification for networking. He said that it is important to know the specific job you want.

Greg Kent, a junior minoring in IT, says working in the technology fields is exciting because "you're always at the forefront of technology."

Kent, who wants to work as an IT consultant, will specialize himself by being knowledgeable in the current trends of technology and helping companies stay with the trends in the industry. He said that every kind of business relies on technology these days, and since the technology advances at such a rapid pace, the people in these businesses will need someone like him to stay current.

The Bonnaroo Music Festival is often considered by music fanatics to be the concert of the year, but it comes at the hefty price of $265. Fortunately for some, one company is offering free admission in exchange for the low cost of recycling.

For four days in July, Manchester, Tenn., hosts not only over a hundred bands of all genres and compositions, including Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band, Phish, the Beastie Boys, Snoop Dogg, The Mars Volta and MGMT to name a few, but also thousands of devout music fans who have made pilgrimage from all across the world to see the gathering of their favorite artists, from places as far as Asia to as local as UMass Amherst.

Former child soldier speaks

By Kimya Hedayat-Zadeh

Hip hop artist and orator Emmanuel Jal shared his experiences as a former child soldier for the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) on February 11th at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom in honor of Black History Month.

Jal, who has documented his story in his recently-released book "Warchild," was taken from his home in roughly 1987 to be trained in the SPLA.

Born into a Christian family in south Sudan in the 1980s in the middle of the Sudanese civil war, his mother was a teacher and his father a policemen. When the SPLA was formed, Jal's father would flee to the south in fear of being captured, like other policemen.

"My father's friends were disappearing. So my father was scared and left for south," said Jal. "My mother was fired."

When Jal's village was burned down, his family had "lost everything." Jal would also lose his mother to the war before being taken as a six or seven-year-old to fight for the SPLA. He and other children traveled on foot to Ethiopia, where they would meet thousands of other child soldiers for training.

Dehydration and starvation claimed the lives and sanity of many child soldiers, Jal said.

"When a young kid was about to lose their mind they started to ask questions. 'What's God? Why are there these problems…And when no one was able to answer the questions they started to shake…" Jal said.

Jal eventually escaped the violence in Sudan and smuggled on an airplane to Kenya with the help of British aid worker Emma McCune, where he started his career as a hip hop artist. He has performed alongside artists like Alicia Keys, Annie Lennox, Damien Marley and Stephen Marley and has also made a documentary of his experiences as a child soldier.

Jal, who is working to build a school in Sudan, stressed the importance of creating a stable infrastructure and investing in schools. "…I think it's important what he said about the children because they are the future and we have to invest in them," said freshman Molly MacKenzie.

Freshman Maura Webber, who has become interested in Darfur from her involvement in the MassPIRG, encouraged her friends to attend the event.

"Last week I was tabling for MassPIRG and they were trying to take a survey to see how many people knew what the country of Sudan looked like and where Darfur was located in it," said Webber. "It was surprising to see how many students were unaware of what was happening … I think a lot of our generation needs to learn more about this."

Trouble for Vitaminwater

By Jessica Sacco
Collegian Staff

Athletes looking for something to quench their thirst after a long day at practice might find choosing the popular electrolyte- and nutrient-enhanced Vitaminwater can cause more harm than good.

Certain flavors of the beverage contain substances that are banned, or "impermissible" under the National Collegiate Athletic Association guidelines.

The NCAA's website lists five Vitaminwater products that have ingredients that could be problematic for many student athletes if present during drug testing.

The flavors "Energy" and "Rescue" make the list of the flavors with banned substances. Both contain caffeine, with guarana seed extract also present in "Energy". According to the NCAA, caffeine will produce a positive drug test if the amount exceeds 15 micrograms per milliliter. This, however, should not be a problem with moderate consumption.

Students may not use substances banned by the NCAA, at any time, unless for legitimate medical purposes. A student who tests positive for a banned substance above a certain level will lose a year of eligibility for playing time.

Four of the drinks contain impermissible components, which are substances that do not meet the criteria issued by the NCCA for use as nutritional supplements, and therefore institutions should not provide them to athletes.

"Power C", contains taurine (also found in Red Bull), "Balance" has traces of glucosamine, which can be used to repair cartilage and other body functions. "B-relaxed" and "Rescue" contain L-theanine and ECGC, both of which are ingredients in green tea extract.

According to UMass sports nutritionist Caren Weiner University of Massachusetts Amherst athletic students had yet to be notified officially about the new banned drinks as of Wednesday.

Weiner said she had just recently found out about the banned substances, and confirmed that athletes will be alerted, and that the new rules should not be a problem to follow.

"Athletes know they're drug tested," said Weiner. "It [Vitaminwater]is certainly not worth risking one's career for. I'm sure a lot of students drink it innocently and think it's just sugar water."

Arjun Collins, sophomore on the track and field team, believes that although the new NCAA regulations are not an urgent issue, it is worth letting athletes who may drink a lot of Vitaminwater know of the possible consequences.

"I know a lot of my teammates drink Vitaminwater, but I don't think people who normally drink it will be in trouble unless they were having[ a ridiculous amount each day," he said.

Meghan Rodgers, sophomore on the woman's crew team, also feels as though the new regulations are not something to be concerned about.

"I knew that too much caffeine could cause you to fail a [drug] test, but I'm not too fazed about it," she said. "Everything is fine in moderation."

The NCCA has approved "Revive", "Essential", "XXX", "Focus", "Multi-V", "Endurance", "Defense", and "Formula-50" for consumption by student athletes.

UM cashes in on discoveries

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts recently announced that it has earned nearly $41 million from the discoveries and inventions of its faculty.

The announcement comes following a report from the Association of University Technology Managers. The organization releases an annual U.S. Licensing Activity Survey, which tracks the income and licensing of a number of universities in the U.S.

According to the report, current as of fiscal year 2007, the UMass system spent nearly $400 million on research, which resulted in 78 licenses, 74 new patent applications and $41 million in licensing revenue.

The figures bring UMass' number of cumulative active licenses to 250, rivaling schools like Rutgers University, University of Colorado and Vanderbilt, among others. The achievement puts UMass among the top three earners in the Northeast, and the top 15 schools nation-wide.

Topping the list are schools such as the Massachusetts Institue of Technology and several members of the University of California system.

"As a public research University, our success in developing marketable new technologies is fueled by faculty excellence and innovation," said UMass President Jack Wilson in a press release. "The impact of groundbreaking research at UMass is threefold.

mythology, but with what worked.

"The Buddha was an empiricist and a pragmatist," she said.

Nazarko said that Buddhism, "Calls upon you ... to work with your own truth," and that there is allowance for LGBT people within Buddhism.

She said that there are no special rules regarding LGBT experience; monastics are celibate and laypeople are supposed to refrain from sexual misconduct, which simply means things like rape, adultery, and incest.

The second speaker was Faisal Alam, founder of the international LGBT Muslim organization, Al-Fatiha. He said that "the complication with Islam is that it is not just a religion, it is a culture."

Like Buddhism and two of the other three traditions (Judaism and Protestantism), Islam has no unifying organization empowered to interpret the Quran. But, Alam said, the fundamentalism the West associates with Islam is a very recent development. He pointed out that Islam is, historically, very tolerant of sexuality. Muslim rulers once kept harems and the Quran encourages sex for pleasure as a way of strengthening the love between couples. He contrasted that view with Catholicism, which teaches that sex is purely for procreation.

Alam said that "Homophobia is a Western exportation." Before the colonial period, there were no laws regulating an individual's private life. Public actions could be regulated by religion and Shariah, but the private life was between an individual and Allah.

Of 52 countries where Islam is the dominant religion, only five employ pure Shariah law. All homophobic laws in Muslim countries are leftovers of British and French colonial law. He said that in Iran, the Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa recognizing transgenderism and now that country is a leader in sex-reassignment surgery.

David Dunn Bauer, Rabbi of the Jewish Community of Amherst, spoke about finding room in the diversity of interpretation of the Torah – especially the two verses in Leviticus which say that sex between men is an abomination and they should both be stoned to death.

"I look to our texts for vocabulary particular to me, my people, my culture, my tradition, my civilization," Bauer said.

Chris McMillan, Co-Director of Amherst College's Multicultural Resource Center, and Kathleen Boucher, who did research on LGBT Catholics, covered Christianity. Mr. McMillan began his talk by having everyone in the room sit up, take the hand of the person sitting next to them, look into their eyes, and say "You are beautiful, loved, and blessed."

He then launched into a discussion of his personal experience as a Christian and focused mainly on the interpretations and readings of the Bible. He referenced St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians and the Epistle to the Romans where it is believed that homosexuals are excluded from the Kingdom of Heaven.

Ms. Boucher talked about her research on homosexual Catholics and how many people believe that the phrase "gay Catholic" is a contradiction. Mr. McMillan concluded his portion of the talk by saying that "God stays the same, we change" and again quoted St. Paul: "There is neither male nor female, slave nor free, rich nor poor in Christ Jesus."

Faculty, University share in patent profit

Faculty research expands the boundaries of human knowledge, that the application of those discoveries better our lives and foster new technologies and companies that create jobs and fuel the state and regional economy."

Most of the revenue, according to the press release, was derived from life-sciences related discoveries like new drugs and vaccines, in addition to clean-energy related technologies.

"A lot of [the revenue] is medical school related," said University Spokesman Robert Connolly. "But certainly UMass-Amherst is well represented."

Connolly said there has been a real surge from the Amherst campus in terms of biofeul research, but also in more traditional areas like computer science.

The licensing revenue has been augmented by the development of several companies around UMass discoveries including: Qteros, a company formed around the much-lauded Q-Microbe; RXi Pharmaceutivles, a discovery-stage biopharmaceuticals company pursuing the development and commercialization of propriety therapeutics based on RNA interference (RNAi); Anterios, a nanotechnology company, and Konarka Tehcnologies, which works on renewable energy sources.

The $41 million figure is especially impressive compared to 1994 numbers, when the University made $195,000. Connolly said the increase has largely to do with UMass Commercial Ventures and Intellectual Property (CVIP), which was founded in the late '90s for the purpose of "capturing and quantifying these types of royalties and licensing fees."

The CVIP allows profit-sharing for the researchers at UMass, who then all benefit from the commercialized discoveries of others in the form of grants and technology development. According to Connolly, when a faculty member makes a discovery, the CVIP helps obtain and shares in the patent, in addition to earning a portion of revenue from spin-off companies or licensure by other companies.

There has also been an increased focus across all campuses in recent years on UMass as a research institution.

More changes at dorms

Figueza, 20, said this is the third time in her three years at UMass that she has had to pack up and move to another dorm due to a program change. She said she lived in Webster her freshman year and in Mary Lyon as a sophomore. Both times she had to move because the dorms became all-freshman housing facilities.

But there are those who understand why the change might be a good idea.

"I guess it makes sense because [the] Lederle [Graduate Research Center] is just right down the hill," said 19-year-old sophomore and Cashin resident Emily Eller.

Though she said she intends to live in North Apartments next year, the English major said she doesn't think the building's residents should have a very difficult time finding a place to live in for the fall.

Doughnut race at Duke U.

By Julia Love
The Duke Chronicle

DURHAM, N.C. — Doughnuts, doughnuts everywhere, but not a crumb to spare.

As part of the Krispy Kreme Challenge, about 30 Duke University students traveled to Raleigh's Peace Street Saturday for a sickeningly competitive contest. Students at North Carolina State University challenged Triangle residents to run two miles to the nearest Krispy Kreme location, polish off a dozen glazed doughnuts and then sprint another two miles back to the N.C. State Memorial Bell Tower-in one hour or less. All proceeds from the race will be donated to the North Carolina Children's Hospital.

The crowd of doughnut chasers was 5,519 strong, but less than 20 percent of participants crossed the finish line in time-and even fewer did so without losing their 2,400-calorie breakfasts along the way.

Although sophomore Zach Hing was among the lucky few to complete the challenge, he found the scent of victory to be more pungent than sweet.

"The finish line smelled like vomit. It was disgusting," Hing said. "I kind of resolved after the race to never eat Krispy Kremes again."

The spoils of victory were rancid, but the race itself was a Tailgate in Spring – complete with pregames and even costumes, competitors said. Many students donned their respective schools' gear, but other runners broke out from the sweatsuit-clad pack in a wolverine costume, gorilla suit and an Elvis get-up. At one point, a Krispy Kreme doughnut and a Dunkin' Donuts morsel were sprinting in a dead heat.

The competition is in its sixth year, and national media outlets are starting to take notice of the local phenomenon. A reporter from ESPN made the run to Krispy Kreme in a business suit, trailed by a team of cameramen.

After reading up on competitive eating, senior Molly Bierman said she decided to prepare for the big morning by gorging herself at Cosmic Cantina the night before. The week before the race, freshman Ben Jones said he and several of his teammates from the Duke Roadrunners Club ran to Kroger grocery store and ate a box of doughnuts to simulate the conditions of the competition. Jones won third place with a time of 30 minutes and 8 seconds, but failed to keep the doughnuts down.

US. reduces arsenal ahead of schedule

By Walter Pincus
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — The United States is more than two years ahead of the schedule set under the Moscow Treaty in reducing the number of its nuclear warheads operationally deployed on strategic missiles and bombers, according to congressional and administration sources.

There are fewer than 2,200 deployed warheads, the goal originally set to be reached by Dec. 31, 2012.

"The reduction was initially planned to be met in 2012, then 2010, but was achieved a few days ago," said Hans Kristensen, director of the nuclear information project of the Federation of American Scientists, who first disclosed the information on his Web site.

While not giving the exact number of deployed warheads, Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Calif., , chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on strategic forces, said Wednesday, "We are in compliance with the Moscow Treaty." She said reaching that goal early could support an effort by the Obama administration to get the Russians to go to even lower levels.

The total U.S. nuclear stockpile remains above 5,000 warheads, with the majority now held in strategic reserve but available for deployment if the need arises. There are probably 3,000 to 4,000 more warheads in storage awaiting dismantling, according to Kristensen.

Tauscher noted that the weakness of the 2002 Moscow Treaty was that while it limited the number of operationally deployed warheads, it left out those not connected to delivery systems and in storage. She said she expects the U.S. to push for improvements in the Moscow agreement. "We need to broaden the definitions and work with the Russians to account for everything," she said.

Kristensen said modest reductions in deployed warheads that began during the Clinton administration were expanded under President George W. Bush. "In the past four years, they have overhauled the strategic war plan," he said. "Strategic Command believes it can adequately meet the White House guidance with far less weapons."

Some experts think the Bush administration does not get enough credit for the reductions it has made in nuclear weapons. Robert Norris, a senior research associate at the Natural Resources Defense Fund, said yesterday, "It is little appreciated or known that the two Bush presidencies have gotten rid of three-quarters of the U.S. nuclear stockpile."

According to Norris, the United States had about 22,000 strategic and tactical nuclear warheads at the end of the Cold War. In 1991, President George H.W. Bush ordered the withdrawal of all tactical weapons and signed the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), cutting to total to approximately 11,000. "His son cut it in half again by the end of his administration," Norris said, "and this will be the baseline for further reductions during the Obama administration."

crowds have needs, like eating, drinking and peeing. This means that they bring lots of unwanted waste into the small area where the festival takes place. If ignored, big festivals like Bonnaroo can be responsible for ecologic disasters in the places where they are held.

That's where North Carolina-based company Clean Vibes comes in. They recognized "a need to reduce the impact of these events by providing the means to recycle in addition to educating the attendees about recycling and keeping the festivals clean and safe," and started doing just that.

Clean Vibes is hired by a number of festivals to come in and take care of the tons of waste that participants leave behind, as well as teach attendees the importance of recycling and good environmental practices. Their participation helped win Bonnaroo the "OUTSTANDING Greener Festival Award" in 2008.

The company is largely staffed by volunteers. Besides "the satisfaction of helping to make a difference," Clean Vibes advertises, it offers a still greister still incentive: free admission. This, according to many UMass Bonnaroo vets, effectively halves the cost of making the journey.

Volunteers are required to work between 8-20 hours during the four-day festival, and often receive free meals, T-shirts, in addition to preferred camping sites.

The deal works in the favor of both volunteers and the local ecology. Economics major and sophomore Thor Tillberg said the idea of Clean Vibes was an important one, and not just because he "really likes TV on the Radio" (a band in the 2009 line up).

"It produces so much waste, it's probably crucial that there are environmentally active groups there," said Tillberg.

To get involved with Clean Vibes, visit them at cleanvibes.com/index.cfm.

'Juicy Campus' counterpart starts up

By Travis Winkler
Daily Pennsylvanian

PHILDELPHIA — The spirit of JuicyCampus, the infamous online gossip site that shut down last Thursday, lives on.

In its place comes CollegeACB.com, or the College Anonymous Confession Board, which seeks to give "students the freedom to voice their opinions and ask questions about any facet of college life," according to a press release on the Web site.

For the next two months, any user visiting JuicyCampus.com will be re-directed to the CollegeACB site. Owner Peter Frank, a freshman at Wesleyan College, struck an agreement with the defunct Juicy Campus to direct traffic to his site.

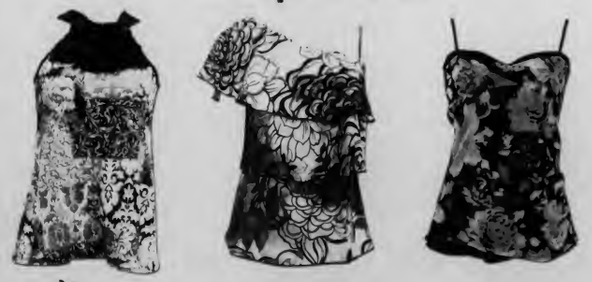
Although there is a traffic deal in place with JuicyCampus, Frank insists that there is no other relationship between the two Web sites.

"I am trying to fill the void JuicyCampus previously held, but with something better," he said. "I want to contribute something positive in the wake of JuicyCampus."

He pointed to the Wesleyan board on College ACB for what he believes the site can become - a place for college students to speak openly without fear of reprisal.

While JuicyCampus founder Matt Ivester attributed his site's demise to a lack of advertising revenues, Frank said he is not looking to make money off CollegeACB.

The new site shares some of the same features and goals as JuicyCampus, including the anonymous posting of "taboo" subjects, according to the press release. But there is at least one safeguard in place that aims to stop offensive posts from becoming rampant on the site.



Frank indicated that there is a "report" feature that will allow users to flag content they believe is offensive or inappropriate.

If the post is flagged enough times, it will be removed by the webmaster.

The site, which was started by Andrew Mann of Johns Hopkins University and Aaron Larner of Wesleyan University, has already been up and running for a year.

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A little hope for "Little America"

Rachel Dougherty

Crowds gathered around the stage carrying signs and shouting slogans. There was excitement in the air and a feeling of hope as they looked up at the podium at the man that would ultimately become their president. He was young, but he spoke with an authority and intelligence that drew the supporters from the masses.

Standing there just months before he would address them as their president, this young, educated politician looked out at the crowds and spoke to them of his hopes for the future of his nation. He promised them change – a return to the ideals that the country had been founded upon and the restoration of its former greatness.

Under his leadership, the country would again serve as a model for the nations of the world.

"It is doable, and we can do it!" He pronounced, before surrendering to the roaring cries of the crowd.

He then went on to promise that the country's nuclear program would not be aborted despite growing hostilities in the west and left the stage amid chants of "Allahu Akbar" and "Death to America."

This was Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as he first appeared to the Iranian public during the presidential election in 2005.

Four years later, standing at the launch of a satellite that many fear could lead to the development of nuclear missiles in Iran, it is hard to imagine that Ahmadinejad – the inflammatory Islamic hardliner – could have anything in common with U.S. president Barack Obama.

However, some elements of their respective campaigns are undeniably similar. Both came to power with limited experience, ran ideal-heavy campaigns and brought people to the polls in record numbers. In 2005, Ahmadinejad told the Iranian people "We can do it!" and in 2008, Obama echoed back across the Atlantic "Yes we can!"

The similarities between Iran and the United States are not limited to the propaganda of our leaders. In fact, Iran's technological advancements and modern lifestyles have sometimes occasioned the nickname "Little America" in the Arab world.

In terms of our political and economic futures, Iran and the U.S. are invariably linked.

We are twin nations reflected across the Atlantic. Is it a coincidence that just days after the "Hope" president is inaugurated in Washington, the "Hope" satellite goes up in Tehran? The propaganda is universal because the hopes and needs of the people are the same.

So if we're all so similar, why can't we seem to get along?

Part of the problem is that on the world stage, the image of a country is reduced to the face of its leaders.

From 2000 to 2008, Bush was the face of America. All of our complexities – our cultures, our conflicting beliefs – were reduced to a single image of an ignorant, stuttering cowboy who insisted on calling Iran the "Axis of Evil". As far as the rest of the world was concerned, Bush was America.

> Ahmadinejad told the Iranian people "We can do it!" and in 2008, Obama echoed back across the Atlantic "Yes we can!"

Ahmadinejad is like the Iranian Bush. As an inflammatory, conservative, religious hardliner, he has become not just the face – but also the mouth of Iran. This is dangerous because at this point, Ahmadinejad represents neither the will of the people nor even the real power in Iran.

There is no separation of mosque and state in Iranian politics. The highest authority is the supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, who is also the country's highest religious authority. Ahmadinejad is more like the country's prime minister. He has power, but it is far from absolute, and is significantly less than that of an American president. What's more – he is up for reelection in 2009.

Ahmadinejad may be an inflammatory, conservative, religious hardliner, but he is not an idiot. What he wants for his country – as he's said time and time again – is respect, power and the opportunity to advance.

He has this vision of Iran becoming a power like the U.S., and he believes that the only way to achieve that kind of power is by technological advance and weapons development. He may not be entirely wrong. As much as we'd like to think that we owe our place in the world to our democratic values, supposed esteem for human rights and go-getter American spirit, we are the most powerful nation on earth because we are a large, rich, technologically-advanced country capable of destroying entire cities with a single bomb.

We can't deny other nations the opportunity to advance unless we are willing to dismantle our own nuclear program. There's a whole mess of reasons why we can't or won't do that, but it makes it difficult for us to justify playing big brother to other nations.

The coming months will decide a lot about the future of U.S.-Iran relations. Politicians on all sides are throwing around words like "hope" and "change."

But behind the propaganda, what are we really talking about? Hope for what? Change what? Do what?

For Ahmadinejad "hope" is in the Omid Satellite, as a symbol of technological advance and the fruition of promises he made at the beginning of his term. It is hope for independence from western nations and a restoration of the kind of greatness Iranians have not known since they were the Persian Empire.

Americans see "hope" in the Obama presidency. Hope that he will be able to make good on his promises and navigate the emerging and inescapable interdependence of nations. Hope that some of our greatness may be restored to us.

The real hope for Little America is for renewed diplomacy with the U.S. and that Ahmadinejad or his successor will unclench the fist that has been raised against western powers since the Islamic Revolution.

It is the hope that we will get to a point where one country's advance does not necessitate another's demise – where we can celebrate Iran's new place in the world without fearing for the safety of our own.

It's time for Congress to be our political tongues

Ebad Rahman

On some issues, a congressman's job is straightforward. They simply speak the voices of their constituents. On Jan. 10, however, the U.S. Congress failed to do its job and failed the American people when it passed a resolution in both the House and the Senate supporting Israel's offensive into Gaza.

"The resolution clearly takes one side in a conflict that has nothing to do with the United States or U.S. interests," said Representative Ron Paul about the resolution. "I am concerned that the weapons currently being used by Israel against the Palestinians in Gaza are made in America and paid for by American taxpayers. What will adopting this resolution do to the perception of the United States in the Muslim and Arab world?"

> In the rest of the world, the situation in Gaza was a clear injustice, but only in America's political climate can the injustice not only be tolerated, but promoted.

According to a poll by the Rasmussen Report, 41 percent of Americans believe that diplomacy should have been used to deal with Gaza – rather than the use of military action.

These numbers are in stark contrast to the votes cast for the resolution. The House gave 390 votes approving the resolution, or 90 percent. Only five Congressman cast a nay vote, or about 1 percent. In the Senate, the resolution passed with unanimous consent.

These voting records show an overwhelming 40-point difference between the public and its elected officials.

During the recent conflict in Gaza, the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution calling for a ceasefire in Gaza. Fourteen of the 15 members voted for the ceasefire and the U.S. abstained. In the rest of the world, the situation in Gaza was a clear injustice, but only in America's political climate can the injustice not only be tolerated, but promoted.

According to worldpublicopinion.org, most countries prefer not taking sides in the Israel-Palestine conflict, including the U.S.

The website reports that a "poll of 18 countries finds that in 14 of them people mostly say their government should not take sides in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Just three countries favor taking the Palestinian side (Egypt, Iran, and Turkey) and one is divided (India). No country favors taking Israel's side, including the United States, where 71 percent favor taking neither side."

Even President Barack Obama, despite evidence calling for an evenhanded policy toward the Israel-Palestine conflict, supports "a strong U.S.-Israel partnership, Israel's right to self-defense and continuing foreign assistance to Israel"

Howard Dean, former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, has a first hand experience of why such a discrepancy exists. Back on Sept. 3, 2003, Dean was reported saying about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, "it's not our place to take sides." Seven days later he said that America should approach the conflict evenhandedly.

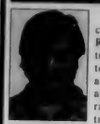
This view – supported by the majority of Americans – blasted Dean's reputation into oblivion.

According to "Howard Dean's Israel Problem" by Michelle Goldberg, "Democratic members of Congress, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, wrote Dean an open letter. 'American foreign policy has been – and must continue to be – based on unequivocal support for Israel's right to exist and to be free from terror ...' they wrote. 'It is unacceptable for the U.S. to be 'evenhanded' on these fundamental issues ... This is not a time to be sending mixed messages; on the contrary, in these difficult times we must reaffirm our unyielding commitment to Israel's survival and raise our voices against all forms of terrorism and incitement."

There was a horrible backlash for such a reasonable idea.

The vast majority of the United States and the world believe in a balanced approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but U.S. leadership fails to reflect this fact.

An already narrow viewpoint in Washington is further strengthened by a political culture that is intolerant of even moderate views.



Americans are politically saying what their leaders are saying whether they agree with them or not. It is time for the American citizenry to cry out for its most basic civic right – the right to be represented in government.

Dirty rats with filthy agendas

Matthew Robare

When I first saw the cartoons of Chancellor Robert Holub as a rat in a tux, my first instinct was to look at the captions and associated texts. They accused him of greed – of raising the costs of education at the University of Massachusetts beyond the affordability of students and numerous other iniquities.

But then I looked deeper and I saw what was really going on: They have accused the Chancellor of being a super-intelligent rat.

This rat is possibly one who is using a human proxy – or possibly one with mind control powers – so we just think that he looks human.

That is indeed a serious accusation. It brings more questions with it, such as: Are there more super intelligent rats? Are they hostile to humanity?

Is there a rat conspiracy plotting to overthrow human governments and initiate a reign of totalitarian rat regimes?

The question of what these hypothetical super-intelligent rats would be up to is very important in considering the theory. It is one thing to propose the existence of super intelligent rats. It is quite another to assume they have no motivation.

> Is there a rat conspiracy plotting to overthrow human governments and initiate a reign of totalitarian rat regimes?

For the rats to just exist – without a source or some sort of motivation for their existence – would make any evidence subject to question as coincidence or the work of normal rats.

It is certainly possible for the rats to develop super intelligence on their own. However, I think that conventional ideas about evolution would require more time and the lack of any indications of such processes in the evolutionary record would rule out that idea.

Exposure to radiation or chemicals – unlike in comic books – would more likely just kill the animals than provide them with superpowers. But genetic engineering, either by a corporation, the military, the CIA or a Bond super-villian, could potentially produce super-intelligent rats.

I imagine the applications for such an advance would be wide and varied both commercially by checking out ships and small places and militarily by searching out terrorists in caves without alerting them.

The rats, suddenly raised to sentience, would have been understandably miffed about their status as slaves and chattel and doubtless would have conceived of an escape plan. Many of them would surely have desired revenge for the cruel gift of reason and consciousness. The only way to accomplish this, in their eyes, would have been to turn the tables on their would-be masters.

World domination and enslavement of humans is the goal of these creatures. It starts with universities, the places that produce the future leaders and middle management types. As a university chancellor a rat would have valuable control over education, would be in a position to indoctrinate students with the command to serve the rats.

Other super intelligent rats are likely infiltrating the highest levels of our military, commerce, and industry – not to mention other colleges and universities. Perhaps even this current crisis was engineered by the Secret Grand Council of the Rats so they could gain control when CEO's and politicians began to be replaced.

That leaves only the question of mind control unanswered. The rats could be using a variety of techniques – such as hypnosis and subliminal messages – as well as more straightforward manipulation and misdirection.

The human we know as Holub could be an illusion crafted by a master hypnotist or simply a proxy loyal to his new super-intelligent rat overlords. Or perhaps the rats – employing their collective super intelligence in unison – have discovered the secret of telepathy and are able to implant suggestions and thoughts into our heads so we don't even know that we're serving our enemies.

The menace of these super intelligent rats must be ended.

We must all be on constant alert with unceasing vigilance and indefatigable dedication to the annihilation of our foe. Guard your minds carefully, my friends. If someone you know is acting like they are under control of the rats – talking about their new rat overlords, going on about how much better it would be if super-intelligent mind-controlling rats were in charge, suddenly hating cats and loving rats – whatever you do, don't raise their suspicions.

If you do, you will be the next victim. Instead, contact the local rat exterminator. They should take care of the problem.

Ultimately an investigation of this much importance cannot rest upon a cartoonist smelling a rat. There must be hard evidence of rat infiltration. Even super-intelligent rats – with mind control powers – are still not omnipotent and will leave some form of evidence behind.

It could be a nest in Whitmore missing cheese shipments and so forth. As far as I know, there is no evidence. While lack of evidence does not mean the theory is disproven, it casts a lot of doubt on it.

Personally, I do not believe the rats are real. But if they are, we need to always be watching the signs.

The graffiti debate

Local art programs looks to revitalize Kirkland Avenue

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Graffiti has long been associated with sentiments of anarchy, a guerilla tactic for artists armed with spray paint canisters to covertly express themselves wherever they see fit. The law falls by the wayside when there's an idle boxcar or some untouched brick to tag, the artist's product forever in limbo between inventive expression and detrimental vandalism.

Those familiar with Kirkland Avenue in Northampton understand this debate. The red and black brick lining the practical walkway between Pleasant Street and the Northampton parking garage is plastered with spray paint scrawls, including both vulgar and inspirational content such as "KILL THE MAYOR," "Kill Landlords," "Let Us Love Us," and "Lets recreate the World."

According to local legend, Peter Laird, co-creator of the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles comic book, often strolled through the alley in the early 1980s when he worked for a local Northampton newspaper. The myth claims the path served as a basis for the Turtles' lair.

Recently, storefrontART, a program of the Commonwealth Center for Change (C3), was approached by one of the abutting buildings' owners, Steve Jasinski, about the space's potential for murals and installations. Since then, the idea has grown into a full-fledged affair named the Kirkland Ave. Project. The overall goal of the project is for the Northampton community to use the space effectively as a means of expression and to enhance its function as a strategic walkway.

"Our focus is on revitalizing the area by asking how and why people pass through it," C3 program director Julia Handschuh said. "We want to create a different purpose for it."

"The [current] graffiti is in touch with the undercurrents of the town," Kirkland Ave. Project Manager Haley Morgan added, as slogans of freedom and militancy rule the bricks. The project hopes to take the varied ideals of the individual contributors and unite them in a way which gives the space legitimacy and vitality.

Handschuh and Morgan plan to host an "Art-In" today, Feb. 13, from 4-7 p.m. in the alley. The event invites various artists to the space to create two-dimensional art in and about Kirkland Avenue as well as to plan three-dimensional art and installations for a March 13 storefrontART "Art Happening" before the project's culmination, which will consist of collaborative performances and installations based on the project's investigative findings.

The scheme was birthed last fall when Jasinski contacted storefrontART about the possibility of murals in Kirkland Avenue. Jasinski, along with Joe Blumenthal, owner of the adjacent

Martin gets 'Important'

By Angela Stasowski

Sometimes, comedy is an important thing. But sometimes, "Important Things" are comedic.

Demetri Martin's new sketch comedy show, "Important Things with Demetri Martin," which premiered last Wednesday on Comedy Central, proves that everything is important.

With the program, Martin brings his stand up comedy to life, combining drawings, music, standup and sketches that are unified by a single theme such as "taming" or "power."

He examines the concept from every possible angle, stretching to the very reaches of the imagination and beyond.

The show is the latest brainchild of Jon Stewart's producers from "The Daily Show," on which Martin has had a recurrent role as correspondent.

In a recent interview, Martin provided a guided tour of the tedious production process that goes into making a comedy series.

"The way that process has worked has been in phases … But within the phase it's been a bit segmented. Once I did a pilot for the show that was kind of a sample episode, Comedy Central watched it and then decided to order episodes," Martin said.

Deer Tick offer odd Valentines getaway

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

COURTESY PARTISAN RECORDS

Providence R.I. native John J. McCauley III and his alt-country outfit Deer Tick will perform Saturday night at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. The band is touring in support of the re-release of their debut album "War Elephant."

As daunting as a Valentine's Day tour stop sounds for any band on the road, drawing a crowd when you're billed as "Deer Tick" sounds like a disastrous proposal.

After all, nothing says "I love you" quite like a disease-carrying arachnid.

Luckily, John J. McCauley III has never been keen on following convention. Instead, the 21-year-old songwriter thrives off his own blend of uncomfortable lunacy, a trait that will surely accompany him and the rest of Deer Tick on the stage of the Iron Horse Music Hall Saturday night.

Any doubts over McCauley's flair for the absurd can be eased with just a passing glance at the cover art on the band's recently re-released debut record, "War Elephant."

The black and white photograph is enough to knock any skeptic off of their perch.

In front of a backdrop of peaceful sand dunes, McCauley is a visage of unkemptness complete with tinted aviators and unflattering chest hair. His bandmates flank him donning dust-covered button ups, smoking butts and polishing a machete.

Finally, two bikini-and-sunglass-clad beauties holding assault rifles stand behind the group staring into the camera with blank gazes to round out the profoundly confusing – yet oddly appealing – album cover.

"War Elephant," originally released in September 2007 on the short-lived Houston, Texas-based label FEOW! Records, proved to be an immediate critical hit. Its sweeping popularity among bloggers and print critics alike caused the relatively small pressing to sell out in a matter of months, reducing the band to selling crudely constructed CD-R copies.

The album received a proper re-release (complete with its newly conceived artwork) courtesy of Partisan Records in September of 2008 after enduring several months of touring without anything to sell.

Lying beneath the album's ludicrous exterior is a collection of distinctly country-infused selections with surprising layers of maturity. McCauley's nasal-twang vocals propel his Hank Williams-inspired selections, all of which were recorded before any of the other members joined the band.

Deer Tick originated as a conceptualized dru m-and-guitar duo in McCauley's Providence, R.I. bedroom in 2004. As time progressed the band slowly evolved into its current incarnation: a collaborative quartet of drums, bass, and guitar with multiple vocalists consisting of fellow Rhode Islanders Dennis Ryan and Chris Ryan, who happened to be brothers, as well as Andrew Tobiassen.

The band's progress has yielded tangible results as the group has recently toured with the likes of Castanets, Jenny Lewis and The Felice Brothers.

Ever the road warriors, the members of Deer Tick are no strangers to the Pioneer Valley. The group has performed a handful of times in the area, most recently at last year's WMUA sponsored spring concert. While the event was sparsely attended, those uninitiated with the band received quite the introduction.

During a sizable set McCauley delivered more stage banter than actual music. Playing then as a three-piece, McCauley made wisecracks regarding the student-run station's numerical similarity to the September 11 terrorist attacks asking if the station was an acronym for "We Miss U All."

He continued the lunacy by covering Alice in Chains, then concluded his set bare-chested with a country-infused rendition of Richie Valens' 1958 hit "La Bamba."

Now, with its freshly re-issued album in tow, the band has hit the road hard. Saturday's stop in Northampton is part of a lengthy headlining tour that will see the band make additional area stops in Cambridge, Mass., and Providence, R.I., later this month.

This time around the band has material from two yet-to-be-released albums in their arsenal to supplement the material off of "War Elephant" and whatever covers they can cook up.

What exactly the eccentric McCauley has in store for the Valentine's Day crowd at the Iron Horse is anybody's guess, but it isn't a stretch to assume he will once again prove that awkward banter and country music can be the most unlikely of kindred spirits.

Deer Tick performs Saturday, Feb. 14, at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton with opening act Marissa Nadler. Tickets for the show are $10 in advance and $13 at the doors. Doors open at 10 p.m.

Hadley to host wild, Wild Wing promo

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

Chicken wings are a staple food for college students. Whether it is buffalo or BBQ, early-morning delivery or a night at the bar, students around the country devour millions of the bone-in tenders every year. The University of Massachusetts-Amherst is of course no exception, clogging the phone lines (and the wallets) of every deep-fried delivery joint in the valley whenever the Patriots play. This Monday, Feb. 16, a new wing destination will be opening its doors in the Pioneer Valley, and even though the sauce is plenty spicy, the restaurant is offering a little extra kick.

Buffalo Wild Wings is a popular chicken franchise that has been spreading like wildfire across the country. The company was founded in 1982 by two Buffalo, N.Y. natives living in Ohio who pined for the taste of home. After the success of their flagship location near the University of Ohio campus, they began opening up new franchises around the midwest.

By the mid-nineties, the company went public, and since then has opened more than 500 locations across the country. With an aggressive plan of expansion, the company plans on doubling that number in the near future, with a goal of 1000 restaurants by 2012. In 2007, it was named number 27 of Forbes Magazine's list of the top 200 small companies in the nation.

Catering largely to college campuses, Wild Wings is a sports bar known for a variety of beer, plenty of televised ballgames and spicy buffalo wings. Although this may sound par for the course when it comes to college bars, the franchise has been highly successful, garnering dozens of awards from around the country, ranging from "best wings" to "best chain restaurant."

On Monday, Wild Wings will be opening its newest location at the Hampshire Mall in Hadley, Mass. What makes this particular store opening interesting is the tantalizing promotion they have fired up. To draw student in from the get-go, Wild Wings will give the first 100 people to walk through the door free wings for an entire year.

Buffalo Wild Wings will open its doors to hungry patrons Monday at 11 a.m.

This deal is not quite as ridiculous as it might seem at a glance. The offer is limited to one small order of wings per week, so the heavy-hitters should abandon any wild ideas of putting down a platter of gratis chicken a day. Free wings every week is hardly something to scoff at, however, and the promotion is garnering lots of attention.

Since the closing of the Ground Round in 2008, the Hampshire Mall has been conspicuously devoid of sit-down restaurants, with not a single place for shoppers to rest their legs and have a beer. Buffalo Wild Wings should make for a relaxing alternative to the food court, serving up the usual bar & grill fare of sandwiches, burgers, and of course, the titular tenders (available in bone-in or boneless).

If you plan on getting in on any of the action with a free year's supply, be forewarned; you are not alone. Like it has done with many videogame and Harry Potter releases, the mall will be allowing customers to camp out in its abandoned halls all night in anticipation of the great poultry giveaway. The Collegian will be there, covering this spicy, battered waiting game as it unfolds, so stay tuned for updates.

The doors open at 11 a.m. this President's Day, and although the supply of free wings is fairly high, the demand promises to be higher still. And with over 31,000 spicy chicken morsels on the line, the competition could be fierce. For the brave of heart who are willing to tackle the odds, bring your sleeping bag. And your appetite.

Demetri's Things

After receiving the OK from Comedy Central, Martin went to work staffing his show and writing the concept that would make up each episode.

"I hired some writers … based on what submissions I thought were the funniest. The first phase was really writing the show. You're writing those seven episodes all at the same time," he said.

Martin confessed to working 15-hour days when actively working on the show.

"We didn't shoot anything before we finished writing all of them basically … then we went into the shooting period where we shot sketches all around New York and a little bit in New Jersey … We got a studio audience to come in and we showed them the sketches we had shot and edited. Then, some music layered on top and maybe a little bit of graphics," he said.

Of course, as many fans know, Martin was not always on the road to becoming a comedian. Before 1997, Martin was headed to the courts, pursuing a career in law on a full scholarship at New York University.

The year before graduation, Martin dropped out to pursue his true interest, and in turn learned a great deal about himself and the way the world operates.

On the matter, Martin said, "I was forced to change my definition of success … With standup, I was forced to look at success more in terms of a larger window of time. In law school, it was still a pretty structured environment. But with standup you have the audience and they do tell you if a joke is funny or not pretty quickly."

"From night to night it varies so much … It made me focus more on the process of comedy rather than the result of it. In law school I just never felt that, I never got my head into the process as much. But in standup … I just try to make things I like and I hope that other people like," he said.

Even so, Martin never limited himself to standup alone, attempting painting, poetry, and music, among various other art forms along the way.

When it comes to standup, Martin typically ties his many interests together into a menagerie of comedic talent.

Unfortunately, work on "Important Things" has put a damper on Martin's touring, though he would prefer to take some time to go out on the road.

If he should tour, however, don't write the University of Massachusetts off as one of his future venues.

"Colleges for comedians are such great venues," said Martin. "It's a treat to get to perform at colleges."

"Important Things" simply embodies Martin's success as a comedian. He has conquered all manifestations of comedy, and has even signed a book deal to publish some of his more literary thoughts.

"I got this deal to write a book," said Martin. "It's not a novel, and it's not just jokes. It would be comedic essays, drawings, and poems. It's kind of in a big soup right now in my head and I'm trying to figure out how to organize it."

Martin is constantly proving himself to be one of the hardest working men in comedy, but he knows where his priorities lie. When asked what the most important things were to him, Martin insisted that – in addition to trees – his friends are his highest precedence.

While so many get caught up chasing success, they forget that success is both the process and the outcome. Martin is well aware of this principle and makes sure to enjoy the process, encouraging others to do the same.

As advice to aspiring writers, comedians, producers, or general pursuers of dreams, Martin proclaimed sagely that, "persistence seems like the most valuable commodity in pursuing any kind of career in showbiz.

"I don't know how much anyone can quantify a person's talents or natural ability, but if you can work really hard, and if you're truly persistent and learn to pay attention … to each situation you're in, I think that feedback can get you to places that you want to go."

One would be wise to listen to Mr. Martin's advice. He knows some important things.

music shop Doyntown Sounds, is now excited for the project's commencement and went so far as to agree to let the space use power from his building for installations and lighting.

Consent from building owners aside, the big issue with the project is the alley's no-man's-land status, as it is neither a public city space nor technically owned privately.

The surrounding building was initially a fire insurance agency owned by Harvey Kirkland, the walkway's namesake, in the 1850s. According to 200-year-old maps Morgan found during research at the Forbes Library, the way used to be an actual road, though it is no longer recognized by the Department of Public Welfare, leaving it unplowed and icy.

Before he died, Kirkland left the building to his secretary, who proceeded to subdivide the area, making it virtually impossible to trace who actually owns the alley. Currently, different people have different ideas about who owns what.

"The area is contested," Morgan said. "People have different ideas about whose space it actually is."

The owners of the buildings around the space informally own the half of the alley which they face, allowing for tenants to park vehicles there and congest the area. Technically, in one way or another, the space owes the city $44,000 in back taxes, a major hurdle which storefrontART is trying to surmount. The organization is currently talking with the city, as well as with the buildings' tenants, over safety and ownership.

"We have initiated conversation with the town," Handschuh said. "They're aware of our intentions, but we want conversations to be more open."

So far, they've spoken with City Solicitor Janet Shepard, City Treasurer George Zimmerman, and the director of Planning and Development about the space's litigation process, which has been going on for years.

While mediating the ownership of Kirkland Avenue has been a bit of an issue, funding and safety have come more easily. storefrontART provides insurance to cover the artists working in the space and the project has acquired various monetary boosts, including grants from the Northampton Arts Council and Hampshire College, where Morgan is completing her final semester.

Since the project is donation-based, they have received aid for Friday's festivities in the form of hot tea from Deals & Steals and paper products from The Green Bean. In the case of inclement weather, the Guild Art Center, whose location opens out into the alley, has agreed to donate their space. Other mixed donations cover storefrontART's material costs.

Though the project faces a long process of investigation, proposal, and bureaucracy, Handschuh and Morgan ooze optimism. Their enthusiasm appropriately parallels the sentiments of some lines scratched on one of Kirkland Avenue's doorframes: "Why are we painting over each other? This takes cooperation. Not competition."

Cannella, Minutemen open season

After a disappointing 5–9 campaign, UMass looks for strong start in '09

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

After two seasons of struggles, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team aims to look more like the 2006 squad that reached the national championship game than the team that went a combined 12-16 over the past two years.

The Minutemen get their chance to start in the right direction Saturday afternoon in the 2009 season opener against Sacred Heart at Garber Field.

UMass, which finished last season at 5-9 (3-4 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference), appears primed to return closer to the level of play they exhibited in 2006 during their historic run at the NCAA title game. With a lot of starters returning – including honorable mention All-American goalkeeper Doc Schneider – coupled with the re-instatement of offensive star Jim Connolly, the Minutemen looked solid in exhibition play as they head into the regular season.

"[The exhibition against Army] was a great test, they are a very good team," UMass coach Greg Cannella said after the Saturday's final exhibition for the Minutemen.

"They tested our mental toughness defensively and also the opportunity to be in a tight game and sort of persevere and come back was good for our team."

But Cannella was far from satisfied following the 13-11 victory over the Black Knights, mentioning his team's struggles getting groundballs, clearing the ball on defense, throwing the ball away on offense and getting into an offensive flow.

Cannella was optimistic that a full week of practice could help out with some of the sloppiness, but he thinks it's something that will be there all season long that they'll just have to try to minimize.

A main focus for Cannella over the next few weeks will be to get his lineup more solidified.

"I think we know where we're going defensively, but I'm not sure we know where we're going on the attack side yet," Cannella said. "There are some guys that are going to continue to battle it out and maybe over the first few games as well."

Sacred Heart finished last season at 7-5, including a 9-7 victory over UMass on March 18 in Fairfield, Conn. For the Pioneers, it was their first-ever win over the Minutemen in six career meetings dating back to the 2003 season. In fact, Sacred Heart entered that meeting having lost every matchup by at least five goals.

Seven different players scored for Sacred Heart that afternoon, while UMass freshman Peter McNichols – who is academically ineligible this season – had a hat trick for the Minutemen in the loss. UMass dominated the 2007 meeting with the Pioneers, winning 11-4 behind three goals from Tim Balise and one goal and two assists from Connolly.

The Pioneers will be without graduated goalkeeper Ricardo Vargas, who made 13 saves in last year's victory over the Minutemen. Zach Frank, who played in four games last season (two starts) for Sacred Heart, will likely be the starter on Saturday. He went 2-1 with a solid .614 save percentage in limited action last season as a freshman.

Albany poses challenge

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

With payback on the mind, the Massachusetts tennis team will be back in action at home when it hosts Albany this Sunday at the Bay Road Tennis Club.

UMass (3-1) will look to get back on track after dropping its first match of the season to defending America East Champion Boston University (4-1) on Tuesday. Despite an impressive comeback by freshman Magdalena Ploch in her first match at No. 1 singles against last year's America East Player of the Year, Francine Whu, the Minutewomen fell 5-2 to the Terriers.

Candynce Boney played her first match of the season not at the top slot, but instead at No. 2 singles. UMass tennis coach Judy Dixon stated that Boney was working on her confidence while being relegated. After the BU match, Dixon felt that she made progressions.

"[Candynce] took a step in the right direction," Dixon said. "I feel she played better but she certainly still isn't where she wants to be."

Albany (5-0), meanwhile, has won its first five matches of the season and is coming off a 7-0 sweep against Atlantic 10 conference opponent, St. Bonaventure (2-4).

The Great Danes had a difficult time in winning both doubles matches, but managed to hold back the Bonnies for the 8-4, 8-6 victories at No. 1 and No. 2 positions respectively.

In an even match at No. 1 singles, Susan Ma was able to take down Manuela Marin of St. Bonaventure for the hard-fought 7-5, 1-6, 10-7 win. Albany overwhelmed the Bonnies at the No. 2 through No. 5 singles spots, combining to win 48 of a possible 52 total games.

In dominating fashion, Albany has lost only two points on the season, both coming in separate matches. Including their last match, the Great Danes have recorded three 7-0 sweeps on the season, two coming in consecutive meetings.

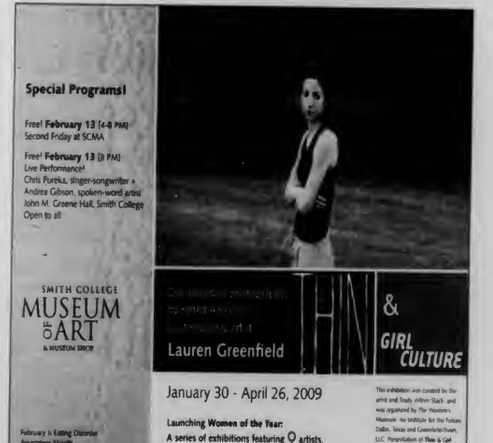
Dixon knows the team is in for a challenge, but feels confident the Minutewomen can bounce back, especially at home.

"The match is at home so it gives us a shot to get back on track on our home turf," Dixon said.

UMass, though, will be short-handed once again.

"Were playing without [Laura Dana] at No. 6 singles and that's going to make it more difficult for us," Dixon said. "In order to win, we'll need the middle of the lineup to step up and give us some relief."

In the spring season opener last year, UMass had a collapsing defeat to these same Great Danes. The Minutewomen won all three doubles contests but dropped the No. 3 to No. 6 singles matches to lose 4-3. As close as UMass was to defeating Albany, they were unable to close the match out.



Though early in the season, this match could be the most significant so far.

"We need to take care of business," Dixon said. "Albany will fight like crazy and the match could go either way. It's going to be an even matchup and will be the one that separates, in this case, the women from the girls," Dixon said.

However, Dixon knows the team hasn't forgotten what happened last season and is prepared to claim the victory that eluded them.

"Last year we lost to them at their place after having two match points so this is a little bit of revenge and I hope were up to it."

Duquesne on tap after upset victory

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

In its victory over Temple on Tuesday, the Massachusetts women's basketball team proved that it could defeat the stronger teams in the Atlantic 10. However, in Saturday's matchup against Duquesne, the Minutewomen will be going up against a team featuring a better conference record and the top-scoring offense in the conference.

In addition to bolstering the team's place in the conference standings, UMass' win over the Owls has given the team a jolt of confidence as they broke out of a 1-6 slump. With only two points from leading scorer senior Stefanie Gerardot, the Minutewomen (10-14, 3-6 A-10) won because of a balanced offensive attack with contributions from their bench.

PJ STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Point guard Sakera Young, left, helped lead the Minutewomen to an upset victory over Temple on Wednesday afternoon. UMass will host Duquesne Saturday at the Mullins Center.

"We played as a unit and I think that's important," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "Stephanie Lawrence came in and gave us some quality minutes, Kim Benton came in and gave us some quality minutes. I think Sakera [Young] and Datiema [Hill] came in and played a great game, one of the best I've seen them play."

The win was enormous for UMass' younger players as Dacko believes that wins like those will help her young team in building their confidence for future games.

"Can we build on it? That's the challenge we have," Dacko said. "But as a young team, you want to instill confidence, you want to instill the constant competitiveness of them, you want them to be able to compete every time they step foot on the court and know that they can win."

Although they lack size, the Dukes (14-10, 4-5 A-10) present a formidable opponent that has had great success out of conference and boasts two major threats: senior Kristi Little and junior Keri Pryor.

Little, the third-leading scorer in the A-10, is averaging 15.7 points, 4.6 assists and 3.7 rebounds per game and is a threat from beyond the arc. While she enters Saturday's game with the highest scoring average on either team, she will also be the shortest player at 5-foot-4-inches.

The Dukes' second leading scorer Keri Pryor, who is averaging 11.6 points and 5.1 rebounds per game, presents a bigger threat in terms of size but as a 5-foot-10 guard, cannot match up in the post with most centers.

In fact, the biggest weakness for the Dukes is their lack of a premier rebounding threat; they've been outrebounded by an average of 1.8 rebounds per game this year. Duquesne's top rebounder, 5-foot-11 guard Rachel Frederick, only averages 5.8 per game. The Minutewomen look to counter with forward Teya Wright, the conference's seventh best rebounder.

Dacko has constantly preached to her team that they need to take care of the ball and limit their turnovers. The Minutewomen will be able to see a great example of this as Duquesne comes in with a +4.33 turnover margin, good for second in the conference.

The Dukes' ability to take care of the ball is something the Minutewomen need to improve upon if they look to win Saturday. UMass is currently second to last in turnover margin with a mark of -3.25.

Dacko believes that her team, as evidenced in the game against Temple, has the ability to play as a cohesive unit and not rely on one player, an issue that has troubled UMass at times.

"We're never going to win a ballgame with just one person scoring a lot of points, we want to do it the right way and we want to do it by being able to share the basketball," Dacko said. "So if somebody takes [Kristina] Danella out of the game, we've got four other capable human beings to step up and knock it down."

Young roster shaping up

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

When the young players on the Massachusetts women's basketball team get extended playing time, good things happen.

The Minutewomen (10-14, 3-6 Atlantic 10) have a wealth of young players that will only get better if they experience live game situations. UMass is a small team compared to the rest of the Atlantic 10, but most of its height is on the bench.

Three of the UMass starters – guards Stefanie Gerardot, Sakera Young and Datiema Hill – are under 6-feet-tall which puts them at a disadvantage against the taller players in the A-10. Yet UMass coach Marnie Dacko has forwards Stephanie Lawrence, Valerie Avebe and Cerie Mosgrove and center Nicole Jones on her bench, all of whom are at least 6-foot-1.

However, those players on the bench have no more than one full year of collegiate experience under their belts and still have aspects of their respective games to improve.

Mosgrove was originally in the starting lineup but Dacko preferred to have a prolific 3-point shooter like Mosgrove coming off the bench to help the second unit. With freshman Kristina Danella replacing Mosgrove as a starter, UMass didn't lose any size. Even with starting 11 games, Mosgrove's 55 rebounds are in the neighborhood of Avebe (51) and Jones (60), neither of whom has started any games this season.

The young players have someone to emulate in sophomore forward Teya Wright, who leads the team with 192 rebounds and 39 steals.

"Teya gives [the younger post players] confidence because she anchors the defense," Dacko said of Wright's leadership by example. "She's got great hands and she's only going to get better."

One player who's learned from Wright is Danella, who leads the team with 15 blocks, one more than Wright. Danella is much like the Wright of last season in that she has trouble moving her feet on defense, which in turn results in her getting into early foul trouble. She is averaging 2.7 fouls per game since entering the starting lineup.

In the Minutewomen's last game against Temple (15-8, 6-3 A-10), Danella committed two quick fouls early in the first half. She's taken herself out of the game mentally many times but she committed no more fouls and scored 19 points, including 15 from beyond the arc.

Wright's leadership also extends to on the court as well. Against the Owls, Danella missed a free throw and Wright could be seen shouting her name in disapproval before slapping her teammate's hand to calm her down.

Nicole Jones is also doing her part to warrant more playing time. Her 60 rebounds are the most among second-unit players. She also has 11 blocks, good for third on the team. She has worked hard and been consistent enough to average 11 minutes per game. Jones is frequently the substitute for Wright when needed.

Avebe's tenacity on defense makes her a body for opposing players to watch out for when entering the post. Her speed from one end of the court to the other is enough to disrupt the transition game of opposing teams and she is widely known as a reliable defensive specialist when needed late in games.

Lawrence, a sophomore, notices Avebe's exceptional effort in the face of larger conference opponents.

"A lot of times it's hard because they have to play against players who are taller and stronger than them but they really work hard on the court," Lawrence said of Wright and Avebe.

"We've already played a lot of the top teams in the conference so hopefully we can get the job done."

UMass seeks rare winning streak

Lowe 8 assists shy of school record, St. Bonaventure up next for UM

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

It has been over a month since the Massachusetts men's basketball team has won back-to-back games.

But after Wednesday's rout over Fordham, UMass will travel to St. Bonaventure on Saturday with hopes of putting together its first winning streak since it won four in a row from Dec. 10-23. Since that streak, UMass (9-13, 4-5 Atlantic 10) has won four times only to fall in its next game.

The Bonnies (12-11, 3-7 A-10) are in a similar situation as the Minutemen, in search of their first winning streak in over a month and in search of winning their first two consecutive A-10 games this season. The Bonnies had a strong start to the season, but have since slipped as they have dropped seven of their last nine, including a 78-65 loss at Fordham.

But despite St. Bonaventure's recent struggles, UMass knows that they must be prepared, especially when playing on the road where the Minutemen are 2-8 on the year.

"You know they're a tough team. They beat Rutgers in the Big East, they got a couple of good wins in the A-10 and they got a good crowd," senior point guard Chris Lowe said before Thursday's practice. "We definitely can't sleep on them."

UMass' struggles on the road have resulted from its sloppy play down the stretch and the team has stressed its need to do the little things to get the win.

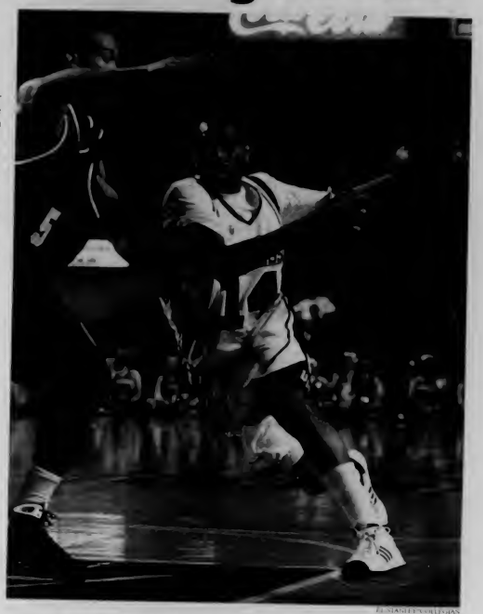
"We just got to do all the little things right, hustle for rebounds, come up with the loose balls and that stuff," Lowe said.

Lowe always puts the team before his individual achievements, but Saturday's game could be a historic one for the point guard. After Lowe's seven-assist effort at Fordham, he currently has 626 career assists and sits eight assists shy of the UMass record. Carl Smith had 633 from 1984-87.

"I'm not too worried about it because I know it'll come, it's another accomplishment along with scoring 1,000 points that I've had in a great career here," Lowe said.

While the record may be in reach for the point guard, it may wait until the Minutemen return home on Wednesday. Lowe's seven assist at Fordham are tied with his output at Xavier for the highest he has recorded all year on the road.

Lowe's assist average on the road is just four assists per game, but at home the average doubles to over eight per game.



The Bonnies will come at UMass with a balanced attack that has four players who average in double figures in points. St. Bonaventure is led by freshman Andrew Nicholson, who leads the team with 13.5 points per game and is second in rebounds with 6.2 per game. The forward also makes his presence felt on the defensive end, averaging 3.3 blocks per game.

"He reminds me a little bit of [Saint Joseph's Ahmad] Nivins, he's a long athletic kid who can finish when he gets to the rim," Kellogg said of Nicholson.

To make sure his team is ready, Kellogg is trying to push his players in practice without over exerting them.

"I just want to make sure that they're physically ready to play," Kellogg said of Thursday's practice. "I think mentally we're in a good frame of mind, but I want to make sure they're going hard enough to get a good sweat and get them ready to go without getting somebody injured or have guys running in quicksand during the game."

BU Valentine's Invitational final meet before A–10s

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams will look to keep their momentum as they head into their final meet before the Atlantic 10 Championships.

The teams will travel to Boston on Friday for the Boston University Valentine's Invitational. The meet is the last chance for the Minutemen and Minutewomen to qualify athletes for the upcoming championships. With that in mind, Tyler Cotto looks to lead the Minuteman charge with another first-place finish in the hurdles. Cotto has been arguably the team's top performer thus far and appears to be a strong candidate for a third consecutive first-place finish.

Sean Busch is having a breakout season and has become an integral part of the team's success in field events. Busch, a sophomore, continues to impress UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien with each performance.

"He has recorded top-five finishes against impressive competition," O'Brien said. "He is just a few steps away mechanically … from elevating his game."

The Minutemen are also looking for Nicolai Naranjo, Brian Miller and Josh Boone to repeat their strong performances form last year's Valentine's Invitational. Naranjo paced the Minutemen at last year's competition by finishing the 3000 meter with a time of 8 minutes, 28.51 seconds in an IC4A-qualifying effort.

Miller, who could also be considered the team's top performer this season, is currently in the Top 15 in the Atlantic 10 in an impressive four events (55 meter dash, 200 meter dash, high jump and long jump). At last year's meet, Miller finished sixth in the high jump, while Boone finished 17th in the mile. Boone has been one of the most reliable mile runners for the Minutemen this season.

The UMass women's team is also looking for repeat performances from some of this season's standouts. Kristen Bakanowski, who is one of two Minutewomen to qualify for the ECACs this season, finished fifth in the pole vault at last year's Valentine's Invitational with a vault of 11-feet, 9.75 inches. There is a strong possibility that she will surpass that mark, as she has recorded two vaults of over 12 feet this season.

Holly Heinricher has stepped up for the Minutewomen as of late. She finished third in the 200 meter dash at last week's Geigengack Invitational (25.54) and is part of the 4x400 relay team (along with Brittany Bakanowski, Kristen Bakanowski and Claire Pettit) that has already qualified for the ECACs.

"She is the anchor of the 4x400 relay team," UMass women's coach Julie LaFreniere said prior to last week's meet. "She is exciting to watch and is a key player on this team."

Sophomore Gina Perno could also give a strong performance. She is second in the conference in the 1000 meter run and finished in the same position at last year's invitational. Her best time, 2:57.93, is 1.69 seconds shy of the ECAC qualifying mark.

Kristin Darling and freshman Jen Harkey could also post solid marks after having breakout performances last week. Darling finished second in the 5000 meter (18:48.07), while Harkey finished right behind her with a time of 19:28.14.

D-Cutz buzzes dorms

Student barber finds success

By Kathryn Foley
Collegian Correspondent

Junior Seware Kangalu, an economics major at the University of Massachusetts, was looking to make some extra money during the school year."I started out my freshman year working at the UMass Annual Fund, but they were only paying minimum wage so I wasn't making enough to pay for school and my other bills. I had to find another way to make better money," said Kangalu.

He said he thought cutting hair was a niche he could cover, since students need hair cuts, and are always looking for ways to save money.

"We already pay enough money for books. Why pay a lot of money for haircuts?" he said.

Kangalu began cutting hair during his freshman year by practicing on a few friends who trusted him enough to take a set of clippers to their heads. He learned to cut by watching videos, and observing his own barber before and after his own haircuts.

"D-Cutz" (Dorm Cuts), started out small, but by charging $8 for a haircut and $4 for a line-up, and word traveled fast. Customers began referring Kangalu to their friends that were looking a bit scruffy and in time he obtained enough customers that the few friends down the hall turned into a significant amount of Southwest residents. He now cuts anywhere from 20-30 people's hair a week, and has approximately 100 clients. He takes appointments starting any time after class on Mondays, Thursdays and Fridays, but leaves Tuesdays and Thursdays as his free days for homework and rest.

UMass student Seware Kangalu has become an amateur barber, and now maintains a large clientele of students.

Kangalu's venture is located exactly where the name implies: in his dorm room. Though not a professional setting, with the music playing, the TV on, and people hanging out and socializing with each other, it might as well be a real barbershop.The door is always open, in order to attract clients that may not know there is a barber readily available just upstairs or down the hall from their rooms.

Kangalu buys his own equipment; almost all of the same apparatus one would find in any professional barbershop. Most of the tools and supplies he uses are from Sally's Beauty Supply, just down the street from the University. He even has business cards as well and a website (http://www.dcutz.s5.com).

Chancellor, governor explore budget options

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

With a $46 million budget deficit expected for the next fiscal year at the University of Massachusetts, much regarding the school's financial fate will be determined in the coming weeks.

Chancellor Robert Holub warned the faculty last Monday that he would need to see a comparable increase in state funding or student fees in order to avoid cuts he termed "Draconian." Though he is confident the government will close a portion of the deficit, he said "it remains in flux how much funding will be restored."

The University's trustees elected Thursday to postpone a vote on a fee increase for in-state students. The proposed 15 percent fee hike would raise the total cost of attendance by $1,500, to an average of $11,000 across the University system. That plan would increase revenues by an estimated $68 million, with a portion of that money being used for financial aid.

Several trustees were concerned over the economic impact that raising the cost of a UMass education would have for many of the state's families.

Beyond boosting student-based revenue, the largest potential increase could be from the economic stimulus bill the federal government recently passed. The University could see a boost in funding for its general operating budget and capital projects.

In addition to providing a tax benefit for families with enrolled college dependents, some of the funds earmarked under the state stabilization portion of the bill may be diverted to public higher education.

The stabilization aspect of the legislation is theoretically grounded in a two-year plan designed to help individual states temporarily cope with budget deficits under the assumption that the economy will recover and state revenues will subsequently rebound.

Furthermore, the bill provides funding for federal and state sponsored "shovel-ready" projects that can begin construction within 180 days. Last week, Gov. Deval Patrick estimated that between $1 and 2 billion would be available for infrastructure improvements to be split among the state's cities, towns and colleges.

The University submitted a list of 41 projects to the Governor's office to be considered for the capital money. UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said, however, that for most of the projects on the list, "funding is not expected nor anticipated." Though the list contains some new construction, the majority of the projects are smaller, deferred maintenance projects.

One high-priority project the University hopes to get funded is a proposed new police station for the University of Massachusetts Police Department. The current design calls for an environmentally friendly structure to be built in the Tillson Farm portion of campus. It would replace Dickinson Hall, UMPD's currently outdated facility.

Patrick recently submitted his version of the budget to the Massachusetts House of Representatives, where it will then be reviewed by the Ways and Means Committee before being debated, amended and voted on by the general House.

Holub characterized the governor's budget as "nothing he didn't expect," and has asked academic departments and other units to submit budgets that would account for various reductions in funding.

In addition, Commonwealth College — the University's honors program — currently derives the vast majority of its funding from a state budget line item, not from the school's operating budget. In the governor's budget, that money will now be lumped into the general University's funding in an effort to give the school greater spending flexibility.

UM researches cell division

By Sam Butterfield
Hampshire College Correspondent

University of Massachusetts researchers have uncovered one of the secrets of biology, discovering a new way cells organize chromosomes to prepare for dividing.

The researchers were seeking to discover how cells' tiny chemical driving mechanism, called the dynein, controls mitosis and keeps fine chromosomes in order and position. Their findings were published in last week's Current Biology magazine.

Previously, biologists believed it was dynein's holding area, called its cargo domain, that governed the process.

Dynein functions as a delivery agent but also, as the research discovered, makes itself the route on which it is delivered by traveling down portions of microtubules that adjust their shape to allow the particular pieces to move themselves in order needed.

UMass cell biologist Wei-lih Lee and postdoctoral fellow Steven Markus along with biology junior fellow Jesse Punch found that "dynein has a preference for locating at the ends of these microtubule tracks."

"Dynein is a molecular machine that transports cell materials along microtubules, the interstate highways inside the cells," said Lee, "We discov-

Health insurance reconsidered

By Dinah Gorelik
Collegian Staff

Although health insurance protects those facing high or unexpected healthcare expenses, it often fails to meet the needs of those requiring the most care. However, new initiatives are being taken to offer improved plans at suitable rates.

In an effort to give students more coverage while still making the plan affordable, The Massachusetts Division of Health Care Finance and Policy plans to review student healthcare regulations.

"We need more affordable healthcare services that people don't get through welfare," said freshman Marco Casarano.

"It's time to take a fresh look at a long-standing program," said Jennifer Kritz, deputy communications director for the Executive Office of Health and Human Services, according to The Daily Hampshire Gazette.

After hiring a firm to help analyze student health care regulations, The Division of Health Care Finance and Police will attend a public hearing if changes are recommended to the regulations.

On a national scale, benefits from insurance range from $2,500 per accident or illness to unlimited coverage with annual premiums spanning from $30 to $2,400. However, by law, $50,000 is the minimum benefit per accident or illness in Massachusetts, where college students are required to have health insurance.

Though many college students can be insured under a family plan, employer, or private provider, many may need to obtain health insurance through their school.Aetna Student Health, a full service insurance broker and administrator, provides health insurance to University of Massachusetts students. This program includes a $500,000 maximum benefit per accident or illness.

Costing $2,322 annually under the individual rate, the insurance plan now includes 5,200 UMass students.

The question of healthcare and its costs have raised the questions about whether or not universal healthcare should be provided by the federal government.

UMass student Yevin Roh said, "Politics and government should not work on giving people things, but rather they should work to empower them."

Mass Attack salvages pair with No. 3 NU

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Whether it won or lost, the Massachusetts hockey team had entered the second period with a 2-0 lead in each of the three games it has played against Northeastern this season. However, the Minutemen always managed to let the lead evaporate – until their 4-1 win Saturday night.

The Minutemen (12-15-3, 7-11-3 Hockey East) began the game playing strong net-front defense, winning races to the puck and creating numerous chances on offense. Their consistency throughout the game led to their win over No. 3 Northeastern (20-8-2, 15-5-1 Hockey East), unlike their 5-3 loss to the Huskies the night before.

"We didn't dwell on the lead [after the first period], we didn't dwell on it either night. We just played a little bit more efficiently tonight and a little bit more effectively in the defensive zone," Cahoon said.

Petition circulated by SGA's McNair

By Mike Fox
Collegian Staff

The issue of instituting online ballots for this year's Student Government Association elections was taken to the general student body this weekend.

Chancellor of Elections Sean McNair posted a petition on the SGA Election Commission website (umass-selectionscommission.com) Saturday asking students whether they would support an online petitioning system.A statement on the website describes the proposed online petitioning system as having "the potential to increase voter turnout and significantly lower Elections Commission costs." It goes onto explain that greater participation in SGA elections has the potential to increase student involvement in SGA affairs.

As of Monday night, the petition had 348 signatories. An accompanying Facebook group currently has 275 members.The proposal to institute online balloting is part of a series of amendments to Title VIII of the SGA by-laws, the section concerning elections, which McNair has been trying to bring up to the SGA Senate for a vote since the beginning of the semester.

For SGA by-law revisions to come up to the Senate for a vote, they first need to be approved by the Senate Administrative Affairs Committee. The committee voted on Feb. 1st to approve the revisions, but their act at the time was considered void due to the committee's operating below its legally mandated number of members.

members attended the committee meeting to have quorum. On Feb. 11, the committee voted to table the motion in order to give its members more time to educate themselves on the matter.

SGA President Malcolm Chu has expressed concerns with a potential online voting system stating that he personally thinks that online voting is unsafe.

"This is not up to my decision to make; it is up to the decision of the undergraduate senate and I will support whatever decision that they make," Chu said. "I am also willing to work with other people to find safe ways to increase voter participation and education."

"If the security of the system is an issue, then we have a greater problem because the entire University network [SPIRE, SPARK, OWL] is at risk," said McNair. "We trust these security measures for so much other personal information."

"In regards to potential over-the-shoulder voting, I believe that the provisions put in place in the by-laws to punish any candidates involved in this practice will be an effective deterrent," McNair added. "Should any over-the-shoulder voting occur, I believe that the amount would be negligible."

Some UMass students expressed their support of online voting.

"I would feel comfortable voting online because in this day and age, we trust the Internet with everything, it's just what people do," said senior landscape architecture major Carl Saccone. "If this system existed when I first came to UMass, it would have been easier for me to participate."

Others, however, were not so sure.

"While I do believe online voting would increase voter turnout, I would need assurance that it would be strictly monitored and have the same regulations that the rest of the University's websites have," said sophomore sport management major Evan Wagheltein.

ered that dynein is found parked at the terminal ends of these highways, and this allows the cells to control dynein activation."

Lee said the discovery is relevant because it could have applications beyond just studying cells.

"Uncovering the role of this mitotic motor is important to understand how cells avoid potential problems of targeting an activated protein through the cells," he said.

Lee believes his study may help scientists better understand "how cells divide and differentiate," which would help in studying specialized human cells.

"Human nerve cells use the same motor machine to move the cell body during brain development," Lee said, elaborating that defects during nerve cell division can cause a severe brain disease called lissencephaly, reflecting that his study will give biologists insight into how cells divide and where there is room for error.

"Understanding this mitotic motor is crucial for understanding how cells orchestrate cell division," he added.

Lee's colleague Molly Fitzgerald-Hayes, professor and chief undergraduate advisor for the Biochemistry and Molecular Biology Department, said the research is highly pertinent to new understanding of human cell function.

"The UMass research on dynein in budding yeast is very relevant to our understanding of human cell structure and function, because human nerve cells use the same molecular mechanism used by yeast cells to move cell organelles along microtubule roads," she said.

Fitzgerald-Hayes said the research could help in learning about problems with the brain.

"Problems with dynein function can cause mistakes in nerve cell migration, leading to defects in brain development and degenerative nerve diseases," she said.

Science students at UMass were pleased to have a new level of understanding of cells at their disposal.

"This could be a stepping stone in the greater picture of finding new developments in science, like stem cell research and maybe even cloning," said sophomore nutrition major Kameron Moore.

"This could even help maybe with efficient fuel research, maybe not on a scale of saving the globe or anything, but it's a step and it's very interesting," Moore said.

Darwin–Lincoln day

Chris Amorosi

President's Day combines George Washington's and Abraham Lincoln's birthday into an easy-to-celebrate package – just add time off. After I weaned myself off the sanitized biographies of our "Founding Fathers," the cynical nature of the holiday struck me.

While Lincoln had his logs and Washington his cherry tree, the less-arboreal details of their lives are quite divergent. To commemorate the birth of an aristocratic slaveholder and the birth of a self-made lawyer-cum-emancipator on the same day is the pinnacle of irony.

The two don't even share the same birth date. I'm sure some ivory tower latte-sippers had something to do with such a gross disregard for traditional calendar practices. Being a history major, I performed extensive research in the "this-day-in-history" section of Wikipedia's homepage.

To my delight, I found that Abraham Lincoln and brilliant scientist Charles Darwin not only shared the same birthday, but same birth year. Therefore, I demand that Washington be dropped from commemoration and to rename the holiday "Darwin-Lincoln Day."

> To commemorate the birth of an aristocratic slaveholder and the birth of a self-made lawyer-cum-emancipator on the same day is the pinnacle of irony.

Darwin wrote the seminal work on evolution titled "On the Origin of Species," thus inflicting a mortal blow to the superstitions that gripped humanity's conceptions of science since our earliest history.

I recommend reading his work. For a 19th-century writer, he is surprisingly clear to a 21st-century reader.

Darwin's effect on science is similar to Lincoln's on slavery – or Martin Luther King Jr.'s on civil rights.

Fortunately, Darwin wasn't murdered for his controversial views, though he endured much criticism and caricature for the remainder of his life.

A common method was to draw Darwin's head on a monkey. Unfortunately, the criticism of today takes the form of the Creation Museum in the great intellectual center of Petersburg, Ky.

While it is initially disheartening to learn of a museum dedicated to spreading lies, I take comfort in the fact that creationism is now a fringe theory confined to the Appalachian Mountains rather than college classrooms.

Washington is certainly the weakest of the three when one compares his merits – or rather demerits – to the other two. He owned people, making him morally equivalent to Barbarian slavers in Asia and Africa today or mail order bride enthusiasts.

My favorite part of child-oriented Washington biographies was the disclaimer invariably at the end reassuring its pliable audience that George freed his slaves in his will. Perhaps elderly health care was as bad back then as it is now, which is why he needed the extra assistance?

The slaves must have laughed when Washington ended up being bled to death. I grant that science was primitive in those days, but the act of medicinal bleeding smacks of holistic medicine to me – and I get hippie ideas from Dean's Book classes.

Ironically, George Washington may qualify for the first American presidential Darwin Award by accepting the treatment.

Abraham Lincoln is truly one of the greatest American presidents and I don't just say that because he shares Darwin's birthday. Lincoln was the Mary Tyler Moore of the antebellum United States.

Like Moore wearing risqué pants on the Dick Van Dyke Show in the 1960s, Lincoln scandalously proclaimed abolitionism before it was fashionable in 1860s government.

When that bastion of activist secessionists that is the South dared to hate America and freedom, Lincoln did what had to be done.

He sent the generals with the finest facial topiary of the age to burn the South down.

It is said that the South suffers in hurricane season because they turned their levees and dikes toward the North in fear.

Remember when the Republican Party was actually interested in human rights?

This segues well into my tiny complaint about Lincoln.

Oh, how I loathe when some Republican trots out the tired "party of Lincoln" sound bite. I suppose I can't blame Lincoln for being so incredible that he has toadies more than a century later. The sheer dishonesty is an insult.

Would the true party of Lincoln be host to Strom Thurmond or Jesse Helms? Thurmond once gave a 24-hour-long filibuster in an attempt to prevent the passage of the 1957 civil rights bill and Helms made a similar effort against Martin Luther King Day.

I hope I made my case for "Darwin-Lincoln Day" and surely the ensuing flood of letters to our congressmen will convince the government. Washington bravely fought, in part, to preserve his own rights over other people.

Darwin fought against ignorance and superstition and Lincoln sent an army out against bigotry and evil.

The United States today owes much of its scientific knowledge to Darwin and its social relations to Lincoln. Let the contemptible colonial country squire pass into history with the obsolete and the abhorrent.

Sex education: safe or not?

Greg Collins

You oppose safe-sex education? So you think premarital sex is a sin?

This is always the response I get from people when I criticize safe-sex education. They will equate questioning the current methods of safe-sex education with condemning sex before marriage.

This thinking is 100 percent wrong.In light of recent news that the University of New Hampshire is going to start selling condoms in vending machines on campus, let's get one thing out the way: the fact that you oppose the current safe-sex education methods pushed forth today by activists, school boards, academics and university health service organizations by no means is making a value judgment on premarital sex.

However, it is most definitely making a value judgment on the wisdom of contemporary safe-sex educators.

First things first: A discussion about premarital sex should be left to parents, children, clergymen, mentors and doctors. Because sex is something not to be taken lightly, it should be discussed in private, personal settings in which students should have complete trust in the person they are talking to and getting information from.

Believing in private settings to facilitate mature and serious discussions about sex is wholly different than questioning the ways educators promote safe-sex practices nowadays.

This leads us to the recent decision by UNH's Senate Health and Human Services Council to allow the selling of condoms in all residential hall vending machines. Council Chair Julie Rocco reasoned, "What if a student wants to have sex and the [resident assistant] isn't in the building, has just run out of condoms or the student doesn't feel comfortable asking the RA for a condom? Having the condoms in the vending machines allows students to still practice safe sex in those situations."This comment strikes at the heart of what is wrong with the current thinking of safe-sex educators today: it removes the responsibility and independence of both students and parents to make their own decisions about sexual activity.Instead of empowering students to carefully consider the decision to have sex, safe-sex educators substitute their own preconceived notions of sex and encourage students to behave how safe-sex educators want them to behave.

Case in point: Roccos's hypothetical statement about a student who wants to have sex but is burdened by the lack of available condoms from the RA. Rocco's thinking suggests that she would like for the student to have sex that particular night, as long as he wants to – and uses a condom, of course.

> Believing in private settings to facilitate mature and serious discussions about sex is wholly different than questioning the ways educators promote safe-sex practices nowadays.

How about this revelation: Perhaps the student should not have sex that night if he himself did not take the necessary precautions beforehand to prepare himself for a situation in which he may want to have sex.

Such precautions may have included buying condoms from a store or heading to UNH's Health Services to obtain one.

This distinction may seem trivial, but it reflects the most powerful aspect of what is wrong with the safe-sex mindset today. It discourages independent thinking and action from students to make their own autonomous decisions about sex without being influenced by safe-sex educators.

It removes responsibility from students by suggesting that sex is purely an act of free will for pleasure and that a student should, without a second thought, engage in such an act whenever he wants to, as long as he uses protection. It also assumes, of course, that "it's a reality that teenagers and college students have sex."

This is a convenient perception of reality from people with personal agendas to advance. Here is a more accurate reality: some students do engage in sex and some do not. Some wait before marriage and others don't.The point is that this insensitive assumption by safe-sex educators dismisses the possibility that students do, in fact, have the capability to educate themselves about sex without needing assistance from public campaigns pushing condom usage and safe-sex education classes.

They do, in fact, have the courage to talk to their parents, clergymen or doctors about sex –everyone who has a serious and personal relationship with the student at a level that safe-sex educators and school board members will never approach.And they do, in fact, have the strength to resist calls from safe-sex educators to engage in casual sex as long as it is protected sex.

As much as safe-sex educators would like to assume that safe-sex education does not promote a casual sex agenda, a look at the facts suggests otherwise. The utter failure of safe-sex education in the 1960s to reduce venereal diseases and out-of-wedlock births is the most conspicuous example of the decision-making capacity of sexual activity shifting from the home, the church and the doctor's office to the school, the politically connected activists and some selfish administrators.

That's what is happening right now at UNH.

That is not to say that premarital sex is or is not evil, but it is to say that safe-sex educators should seriously reconsider the purpose of sex education.

Bipartisan aim with failing disagreement

Adam McGillen

The bipartisan bickering over that beleaguered bill was bull. Over the weekend, President Barack Obama's economic stimulus plan passed through Congress along strict party lines. The Democrats won the favor of the American people in recent elections and they defined the policies written into the bill. The president will likely finalize the bill with his signature in Denver Tuesday.

Obama promised to seek bipartisanship, to ensure that his first piece of major legislation garnered support from both sides of the aisle. Despite his efforts, he fell way short of his goal.

All the talk of bipartisanship during the election – both candidates touting their ability to reach across the aisle – and less than a month into the new administration the two parties in Washington seem as polarized as ever.

Rush Limbaugh, de facto leader of conservatives according to Republican National Committee chair Michael Steele, admits that he wants nothing more than the Obama administration to fail miserably. He is the purest example of putting political party before country.

Democrats jut their fingers across the aisle and accuse their counterparts of stalling while Americans lose their jobs daily. It was their way or the highway and there was no time to listen to legitimate alternatives from Republicans.

Business as usual – the two sides disagree.

Neither side gets it.

If anything, the idea of bipartisanship flies right over the heads of congressional representatives. Obama seems to miss the point, too. Talking to conservatives in the minority is one thing, listening to them is another.

The goal is not to win votes for your party, but to establish a policy to which both sides can agree on – or at least settle with.

Both sides seem to believe bipartisanship means reaching across the aisle to tear an opponent out of their seat and set them down on this side, instead of that one.

> All the talk of bipartisanship during the election – both candidates touting their ability to reach across the aisle – and less than a month into the new administration the two parties in Washington seem as polarized as ever.

Democrats invite Republicans to their meeting and then shun all their ideas before demanding they demonstrate bipartisanship by supporting a bill in which they had no real voice.

Republicans arrived already disgruntled and convinced that if the bill does not get a complete rewrite in their favor – they will not support it.

Bipartisanship implies compromise. Compromise implies a willingness to listen to each other and adapt. Each side can remain unwavering on certain policies, but they must learn to be flexible if, in the future, they want to create bills whose votes will not fall along strict party lines.

Time will tell if this stimulus plan succeeds, but both parties should be ashamed. Democrats – for wearing the mask of bipartisanship while writing the bill almost entirely on their own terms and Republicans – for alienating those in their party who were willing to compromise and choosing to distance themselves from the bill in the hope that it fails and they can then say, "I told you so."

It was a weak effort by all involved.

Americans love Obama's "open hand" sentiments, but what good does it serve when he uses it just to handcuff his opposition into agreeing with his policy?

Republicans are just as guilty though, as they take the administration's openness to bipartisanship as a gateway to get things their way while in the minority – not as an opportunity to voice their opinion and help insert some conservative limits to liberal policy.

While behavior on both sides has been despicable, looking at the bill itself, this legislation seems a little bipartisan after all, despite how the votes went down in Congress. Democrats wanted to spend a lot more initially and extend the timeline over a longer period – the original bill exceeded $800 billion, two-thirds of which would have been spent by the end of September 2010.

After so much conservative criticism, the bill ended up reflecting some Republican policy: notably a significantly smaller price ($787 billion) and a much shorter timeline, with three-quarters of the money used by the same deadline in September 2010.

Regardless of the bill's success, it stands as a learning experience for a young administration dealing with a congressional body set in its ways. Obama must not relent in his willingness to get representatives working across party lines, but he must also learn that the effort must extend past simply inviting conservative opinion – to valuing it.

Republicans must demonstrate a sincere willingness to compromise. Many conservatives seem to be taking a distant stance from the Obama administration, hoping to prop themselves up on every small misstep in order to bolster the chances of restoring a Republican majority.

Maybe all that money will stimulate the American economy. Maybe not. There is opportunity for growth if both parties could only learn that bipartisanship does not simply mean winning votes from your opposition – it means making a conscious effort to meet in the middle.

That could stimulate everyone.

Making government welfare money hand-outs, well – fair

Jon Peterson

One of the greatest ironies in the past century came in the welfare system, which began and rose out of the common belief in helping others help themselves. However, it became, in time, a hand that many would accuse of holding down the people it was meant to help along by causing dependency.

The general disenchantment of American taxpayers over the system can readily be served up in two words: "Welfare Generation."

With the working poor, welfare has never been more than help with making the minimum wage work for them. So while they worked themselves up to a steady level, they could also have a decent standard of living. America is full of some of the most generous people on Earth – this much can be seen in our churches, which are up kept solely on donations.

There are also the undeserving poor though, who receive but who don't work, who would rather live off of the government's teat and who have come to represent a larger and larger portion of those receiving government money over the years.

If a person doesn't get a great amount of dignity out of flipping burgers and if they make little more flipping burgers than they could by staying home, then most people would rather not go in for the job – or so the logic goes.

This is why the financial crisis may do some good in an otherwise dismal situation – by forcing the state to cut its budget, the Department of Housing and Community Development will be cutting $3.4 million and out with it, many of the states leeches who would otherwise not be put in the position to better their lives.

It could be a great step in bringing up their lives.

Unwatched government spending on welfare meant "Welfare Reform" could eliminate nearly 60 percent of its recipients while having little noticeable difference in poverty levels after President Bill Clinton enacted it in 1996.

They hold that there is no hope for the regularly unemployed of the state and that there is no problem in that. They also hold that when you treat people like they're poor and with out power for long enough, they will start to think that way and act on it.

People give up trying at some point and cutting off the message that this way of life is feasible could be the best way to get more residents working regularly. It also puts them in a better place than doing nothing and letting them do nothing with themselves.

So many people would think that this sort of mentality shouldn't exist in America and that In the land of the free, anyone can pick up and do whatever they want. It does exist, though. that legislation that should never have gotten its hold in the first place is only now being restructured In panic.

This legislation was forced by one of the worst budget crises in decades, but the benefits from the cuts could be immense. When you treat people with respect and expectations, they will achieve more and that is what our state has been forced into by necessity.

This is what they should have been doing from the beginning.

Jon Petersen is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jpeterse@student.umass.edu.

> All the talk of bipartisanship during the election – both candidates touting their ability to reach across the aisle – and less than a month into the new administration the two parties in Washington seem as polarized as ever.

President Barack Obama summed up this regression during his campaign, when he said "Before welfare reform, you had, in the minds of most Americans, a stark separation between the deserving working poor and the undeserving welfare poor.

What welfare reform did was desegregate those two groups. Now, everybody was poor, and everybody had to work."

The problem for politicians has been in making policy to discourage that sort of thinking, while not punishing those who do work for the sins of others.

These new rules, which are to take effect on April 1, require homeless families to work at least 30 hours a week, save 30 percent of their income and remain no more than three months on their stays in the government housing if they make more than 130 percent of the federal poverty limit.

In other words, they would have to do what any other families would do regularly, though at lower rates of pay. This means little to the working poor, but as a means to get the undeserving poor working.

The Congressional Budget Office even found, in a study it conducted in 2007, that from 1991 to 2005, poor families saw income, adjusted for inflation, rise 35 percent among poor families with children as employment rose.

This legislation could mean that tens of thousands of Massachusetts families that receive government money but do not work would be held to the same standards of decency as everyone else. The current system has at its basis the tenet that some people should be held to lower expectations of potential than others.

Hands on chocolate

Exhibits teach history of colonial desserts

By Kate Olesin
Collegian Staff

The staff at Historic Deerfield has a unique look into the country's heritage, and it involves a sweet and sugary treat Americans know and love.

Visitors came to Deerfield, Mass., on Saturday to learn about colonial chocolate at the museum's annual American Heritage Chocolate Celebration. Held on a balmy Valentine's Day, the event was an educational and entertaining supplement to the commercialized romance Feb. 14 tends to attract.

Instead of walking guests through the history of chocolate in colonial America, Historic Deerfield took a hands-on approach.

Exhibits started as soon as visitors bought their tickets, which were $14 for adults, $5 for youths (ages 6-21) and free for those under 6. In the adjacent room, there was the first sampling of chocolate for the day – hot chocolate. This was a popular choice, since it was directly next to the entrance, and had a long line of eager families. Although when I got my sample it wasn't even lukewarm, the richness of the chocolate negated its temperature.

In the next room, owner of Heart to Hearth Cookery, Susan McLellan Plaisted, could be seen covered in chocolate, as she roasted the nibs over the hearth and ground them into a half-liquid form on a metate, or a stone slab. Guests could see the food history business owner was working hard as beads of sweat from the heat of the fire formed on her brow, while sharing with viewers that the process takes two hours to complete.

"The [cacao] beans were fermented and dried, that's how they come to this country," McLellan Plaisted explained. "[The beans] have a very acidic smell to them – nothing of chocolate – and what you have to do now is roast them then hull them. And once you hull them and you roast them they're just like a coffee bean – when you roast the coffee bean you get the coffee flavor when you roast the cacao bean you get the chocolate flavor."

The next presentation was a 20-minute talk by Chris Fox, a curator at Fort Ticonderoga and a fellow of the Colonial Chocolate Society.

Fox discussed the role of chocolate with Revolutionary War soldiers, who he believes consumed a great deal of the treat during the cold winter months. Fox explained many of the soldiers were involved in arduous labor, called "fatigue duty," including chopping wood or gathering supplies, which might explain the need for a sweet perk during the day. In fact, much of the chocolate

Susan McLellan Plaisted, owner of the Heart of Hearth Cookery, demonstrated how to make chocolate at the annual American Heritage Chocoalte Celebration. It was held on Valentine's Day in Historic Deerfield.

Chicken vigil

Buffalo Wild Wings opens to large crowd at Hampshire Mall

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

On Sunday, Feb. 15, as the sun went down and the wind blew across the Bison fields, the Hampshire Mall was doing business as usual. The lights went down, as did the security grates, and the "rent-a-cops" conducted their final sweeps. As always, the parking lot emptied and the patrons returned home with their bags full of SWAG (Stuff We All Get), but for some, the night was not over. Not by a long shot. For these 120 brave souls, the Chicken Vigil had just begun.

Buffalo Wild Wings, the mall's newest restaurant, opened its doors Monday morning. The bar and grille knew that tough economic times, coupled with the natural frugality of the college-heavy area, meant they needed to do something drastic to draw in customers. They decided on a giveaway, and a mighty big giveaway at that. To the first 100 customers to walk through their doors on Feb. 16 would win a year's supply of free chicken wings.

Catering largely to college campuses, Buffalo Wild Wings is a sports bar known for a variety of beer, lots of sports on the TV, and spicy buffalo wings. Although this may sound par for the course when it comes to college bars, the franchise has been very successful, garnering dozens of awards from around the country, ranging from best wings to best chain restaurant.

The promotion succeeded in getting publicity, and by popular demand the offer was expanded to the first 120 customers. By early Sunday afternoon, eager wing fanatics began to set up shop, and by the time the mall closed

Ward fails to satisfy listeners

'Hold Time' drops today, but falls short of previous albums

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

M. Ward is a modern artist that remains untethered in time.

The prolific songwriter and guitarist records another album without epoch with "Hold Time," set to be released on Tuesday, Feb. 17. The album is his sixth solo release, and his forth on Merge Records.

Patient fans have been pining for a new album since 2006's "Post War." Those who did their research, however, were rewarded with a stream of the full album from NPR. Of course, by the end of January, "Hold Time" had already leaked all over the Internet.

M. Ward is the stage moniker of Oregon native Matt Ward, a prominent feature in the independent music scene since his debut release "Duet for Guitars #2" in 1999. The album's laid back, Americana appeal earned him due recognition.

"Hold Time" is in the same vein as Ward's debut, filled with vocals that are reminiscent of 1950s tunes crooned over vintage radio speakers, made modern by his innovative and lyrical flair.

In addition to the delightful gravel of Ward's vocals, the album features a variety of guest performers that will tickle the indie-rocker's fantasy.

Zooey Deschanel, who formed the female half of a band called She & Him with Ward in 2006, contributes her sweet vocals to the album. Their 2008 debut, "Volume One" was met with tremendous success, prompting the heteronormative duo to record further.

Other guests on the album include Jason Lytle of Grandaddy and folk sensation Lucinda Williams.

While the album as a whole is easily digestible for any fan of the singer-songwriter, there are no tracks on the album that really stand out. Ward's consistency, however, is quite admirable.

Aptly dubbed "For Beginners," the album commences with this gospel-tinged folk tune, complete with allusions to the Garden of Eden and Mount Zion.

The title track features an uncharacteristically prominent keyboard, which is certainly not an accurate representative of the album's overall direction. In an interesting twist of fate, the song seems the most out of place, recalling cheesier R&B anthems than the usual alternative folk.

However, in true Ward form, the track lives up to its name, filled to the brim with dramatic pauses and drawn-out measures.

An interesting diversion, "Rave On" is a cover of a 1958 tune by Sunny West, which was later rerecorded by Buddy Holly. With Ward's vintage vocal stylings, he effortlessly channels these greats of old into something entirely believable and new.

"Never Has Nobody Like You," the album's first single is an upbeat romp through romance, complete with major chords and bubbly, female harmonies.

Harmony is critical throughout the album, particularly on songs like "To Save Me," which is a questioning appeal to some sort of higher power for salvation, conducted over the click of castanets.

"I was born on the first day of December / that means the beginning of the end," croons Ward over handclaps and electric guitar in "Stars of Leo." His deceptively simple lyrics are often riddled with such mock-cynicism, creating a stark contrast to the religious undertones of the album.

While listeners should not expect any repeats of former gold like "Chinese Translation," tunes like "One Hundred Million Years" carry the same sagacious folk knowhow.

According to Ward, each song he writes is conceived with his four-track recorder and under the influence of infamous folk tunes like "Amazing Grace." These roots are obvious in every song he crafts, providing a distinctly soulful sound for the singer.

"Hold Time" is a thoughtful album that would make an appropriate soundtrack for a sunny weekend drive through Middle America. However, when put into perspective with Ward's former work, the album can't help but leave the listener the slightest bit unfulfilled.

Even so, Ward's approachability is always endearing and his craftsmanship remains highly deserving of recognition.

Newman releases 2nd album

'Get Guilty' pleases listeners, proves artist's musical abilities

By Leigh Greaney
Collegian Staff

Carl Newman has an addiction and it's far from innocent and closer to calculated villainy. He's on the to-be-feared list of every artist to consider themselves as indie and original.Ringing in as a heavyweight from Canada in the arena of power-pop, Newman exchanged his first name for his alias of A.C. and hasn't eased up with punchy, power-packed song-making for the past six years.

As the frontman of what is now his fourth group, Newman has gone from Superconductor to Zumpano to The New Pornographers to solo. Although he's still pumping away in the Pornographers industry, his second time going solo has proved to be his biggest threat among power-pop posers. Making six albums in five years most likely warded off any competition for power-pop prowess.

Newman's solo debut, "The Slow Wonder," proved his esteemed place in his genre with his carefully crafted and smart melodic sound. His second album proves no different.

He demands that every one of his high notes and catchy choruses sting the eardrum and hit a higher pitch before they plummet straight into the listener's gut – leaving them with no choice but to fess up to their own soul and "Get Guilty."

The first song, "There Are Maybe Ten or Twelve," is an upper-cut straight to the heart strings. With a pulsating guitar line and bittersweet taste, Newman delivers a more subtle sound to his not-so-subtle lyrics, sarcastically allowing those listening to "make of that what you will." The drama of the piano and the insisting voice of Newman's fatherly advice resonate that "It is the devil you know / That will slam the door harder."

Then the album keeps swinging with "Like a Hitman, Like a Dancer." Along with his music tag team, including ex-Superchunk and Mountain Goats drummer Jon Wurst and the vibrant vocals of the Mates of State, Newman shoots and spins his lyrics into a whirling display of what it is to be "all muscle."

His lyrics: "Like a changed man / but not a changed man / you're gonna change sides but you wanted to wait," are poetry to ease the guilt in us all – marrying the hitman and the dancer beneath our skin.

With most of his lyrics pushing lines of preaching, Newman appropriately includes the track "Prophets." He realizes and makes his tone understandable to his students of life, claiming "I see there's too many prophets here," and admitting, "I am divided." It's hard to criticize his voice of valor when he puts his soul out on sound waves saying, "Here is my heart and here is my song," – the most innocent confession a songwriter can make.

The album's single, "The Palace at 4 a.m.," is a kick below the belt for any sucker that thought Newman really was that innocent. With a string of "ba-ba-bas" and a throwback feel to Newman' older days of self-propelled beats and thick, syrup-filled lyrics, he brings up hopes only to cut them down with a machete of word choice. "No more pushing words around," Newman spits, "You wish he would have taken that a bit more to heart."

He puts the idealist in its place and the nihilist along with it. Heaven and hell, hitman and dancer, power-popper to poet – Newman gets to the gut of gut in 12 tracks. Not one of them is entirely corrupt with honesty or sugar-coated shamefully.

The rest of 2009 begs just how guilty Newman is of his album-making addiction. With his empire steadily rising, his conscience may not be clear, but his future in the industry clearly is.

was consumed for breakfast, giving soldiers an early boost to their day.

Although Fox is clearly knowledgeable about the subject, he admitted there's still more research to be done.

"There's still a lot more to learn about chocolate and the military in the 18th century and I think we have still just scratched the surface," he said. "There's still a lot that just simply isn't known ... and I think with further research we'll find that out. For the time being, we're still learning about a lot of this."

After the talk, it was time for the main event – chocolate samples.

Chocolate desserts could be purchased with tickets, with each priced at $1. There was an array of desserts, ranging from cheesecake to truffles.

Chocolate truffle flavors (one ticket each) included cacao, coconut, almond and white chocolate with pistachio – of which the cacao, of course, was the richest, smoothest and ultimately most delicious. The triple chocolate cheesecake (four tickets) was described as "delectable" and the velvet cupcake (two tickets) with cream cheese icing could not be put into words.

That's exactly how young Aurora from South Hadley felt about her chocolate cupcake, as she smiled and giggled at her father with a mouth covered in rich chocolate.

The Deerfield Inn's tavern also provided chocolate cuisine, including chocolate-based entrees. The menu was nothing short of distinctive, with chocolate chili and chocolate black-bean soup just a portion of the items offered. Chocolate beverages and cocktails were also served at the bar in the tavern. We sampled an $8 pint of Young's Luxury Double-Chocolate Stout, which tasted at first like a typical stout – with a dark, bitter flavor – but finished with a velvety, chocolate aftertaste.

Once sampling the food and drink was complete it was time to head over to the History Workshop and Silver Shop to see silversmith Steve Smithers crafting a silver, chocolate pot. In the next room, surrounded by intricate silver spoons, pots and miscellany, we learned from the guide that there never would have been a silversmith in a small town like Deerfield, since the farmers would have little use for the expensive metal.

We concluded our journey to Historic Deerfield's Chocolate Celebration by creating something sweet and delicious to take home. In the History Workshop we crafted our own hot chocolate mix, made with cocoa, brown sugar, powdered milk and creamer, chili powder, cinnamon, nutmeg and cloves with marshmallows to top it off.

its doors, the hallways around the restaurant were packed.

Thankfully, in light of the weather, mall authorities allowed the intrepid eaters to stay inside for the night, while a security detail was arranged to keep things from getting out of hand.

Security seemed to have little problem with the crowd, as the Wild Wings fans kept calm for most of the proceedings. And as the line grew longer, it also grew more diverse. From the prepubescent to the elderly, from the rowdy to the solitary, the crowd included chicken lovers from every walk of life, and most came prepared for the long haul.

Many came equipped with bean bags or air mattresses to keep them comfortable on the cold stone floors. UMass student Chris Catalini even brought a futon from home and set up shop with his laptop computer. Board games were a popular item to help fight the boredom, and matches of everything from Boggle to Dungeons & Dragons were being played in the halls. Two local students set up a Beer Pong table, and when informed that they were not able to use liquids, filled their cups with change and played for cash.

At just after 10 p.m. the customer number 120, a local man named Eric Wake, walked through the door, and the ranks were set.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian: How did you hear about this event?

Wake: Last week. I happened to know someone who was getting hired here, but I had no idea that it was starting the night before.

MDC: So this was a last-minute decision to come?

EW: One of my friends came into the mall this afternoon and said that he saw people setting up, so when I got out of work I popped down here. When I walked in, they literally told me that I was the last one.

MDC: How do you feel having beaten the line?

EW: Well, I'm ill-prepared. I've got no blankets, no food and nothing but my jacket for the cold stone floor, but I've done worse things for a night.

As the doors finally opened late on that cold February morning, the crowd packed their bags and filed in proudly. For the women in line, Honey BBQ seemed to be the favorite choice, while the men mainly stuck to Buffalo, claiming proudly that they "like 'em hot." No matter what their flavor of choice was, however, they shared one thing in common – they had survived the great Hadley Chicken Vigil, and were reaping the tender rewards.

second half. "We were not fazed by anything that happened in the game and that's a good sign and that's the guys following the leadership of the Docs and the [Joe] Reales – they're going to continue to play regardless of what the situation is."

Schneider also attributes that focus to experience.

"I guess that's where being a senior kicks in – I can't believe I'm saying that," Schneider said in disbelief that this is his final season at UMass. "I've experienced every situation. Whatever it is, [the group of seniors] kind of know how to respond to it. And the offense did an unbelievable job of putting any pressure off of us."

The Minutemen applied pressure early to Sacred Heart. Forty-nine seconds into the contest, Pioneer goalkeeper Tom Trgo's stick broke in half – foreshadowing the kind of day he had in net as the Minutemen peppered 51 shots in the game. Trgo stopped seven shots, but allowed seven goals. Reserve goalkeeper Zack Frank didn't fare any better in the second half – allowing eight goals while making eight saves.

Senior captain attack Tim Balise led the offensive assault for UMass, scoring three goals and assisting on two others. Bobby Hayes, Evan Blum, Pedrick and Marcus all scored two goals. Four others, including Connolly and Reale, scored once.

Sacred Heart's only lead in the game was 1-0. UMass scored the next two goals and finished the first quarter tied. The Minutemen pulled away and took the lead for good on a Pedrick goal that gave UMass a 4-3 lead with 9 minutes, 23 seconds left in the first half. The Minutemen scored the next three goals to take the 7-3 halftime lead.

Led by defenseman Diogo Godoi and Schneider in goal, UMass completely shut down the Pioneers in the second half – controlling the pace of play and dominating the battle in limiting turnovers, picking up ground balls and clearing the zone.

"I thought the difference in the game was our ability in the second and third quarters to get more ground balls than them," Cannella said. "They were beating us to them early in the game and slowed it down on us. But when we got them we sped it up in our zone and created more shots – and they went in – so it enabled us to relax a little bit."

The Minutemen won't have much time to relax now, especially with a road matchup with No. 14 Hofstra next on the schedule.

GAME NOTES

The Minutemen finished the 2008 season with a 5-9 record ... UMass was 2-for-5 on the man-up, while shutting down Sacred Heart all five times when a man-down.

In last year's meeting, the Pioneers won 9-7. UMass is now 6-1 all time against Sacred Heart ... Balise led the Minutemen last season in goals with 33 ... Sacred Heart had more turnovers (24) than shots taken (22).

the power play, the first by Justin Braun 13 minutes, 27 seconds into the game. Casey Wellman notched the game-winner at 19:55 after getting a pass from James Marcou in front of the net.

"Jimmy Marcou made a great play behind the goal line. I just tried to get open for him. He's a great playmaker so he was able to slide it to me there and I was able to get enough wood on it to slide it five-hole," Wellman said.

After the two-goal lead, UMass didn't let up and didn't allow Northeastern to score until the Minutemen had a four-goal lead. Chris Donovan squeezed the puck past Dan Meyers (21 saves) at 13:44 in the third period.

"This win is absolutely huge. The team played unbelievable, you saw it in the stands how much confidence was on the bench. The team played great, cleared rebounds – just everyone stepped up," Meyers said.

The confidence and mentality of the team in Saturday's game was apparent compared to Friday's 5-3 loss at the Mullins Center.

On Friday, UMass' offense was creating chances, mainly on the power play and four-on-four situations, but the opportunities were still there. The Minutemen's low-slot play in their defensive zone, typically a strength for the team, was lacking and led to their loss.

The Minutemen led 2-0 going into the second period, but Northeastern came back with two goals in the second period to tie up the game. After Marcou's second goal of the game (12:50 in the second period), the Huskies scored three unanswered goals to secure their win.

GAME NOTES

The Minutemen were 5-0 when Marcou scored a goal in a game prior to Friday's matchup. The last time Marcou scored was Dec. 29 against Army (4-1 win) ... Brian Keane's goal on Friday was his third of the season, but his first since Nov. 8in the 3-1 loss at Merrimack ... On Saturday, the Minutemen went 2-for-6 on the power play and held off the Huskies on five man-up opportunities ... The Minutemen went 2-1-0 against Northeastern this season while the Huskies were ranked No. 3 ... The Minutemen are tied for seventh with Maine in Hockey East standings at 17 points, four points behind sixth-ranked Boston College (21 points), the top eight teams advance to the Hockey East tournament.

nailed two free throws to put the Minutemen up 73-72 with 2 minutes, 53 seconds left in the game.

St. Bonaventure roared back and closed out the game with a 9-0 run following Harris' free throws.

In spite of Gaffney's effort, UMass was completely dominated on the boards, being outrebounded 48-28 by the Bonnies. Twenty-one of St. Bonaventure's rebounds were offensive, which led to 18 second chance points by SBU. The second-leading rebounder for UMass was Luke Bonner with just four rebounds.

"Luke only came away with four and if the guards don't rebound you're left with Tony Gaffney," Kellogg said to the Gazette. "It's not fair for him to have to get 25 rebounds every time out. They count on him quite a bit and he's come through, but everybody else has to get three and four and five each to compensate for their size."

Chris Lowe entered this game with 626 assists, eight short of breaking Carl Smith's record of 633. Lowe managed just two assists to bring his total to 628, though he did score 13 points.

Lowe has had problems notching assists on the road this season. At the Mullins Center he averages more than eight assists per game. Away from home, however, his assists drop to about four per game. It is difficult to tell whether his assist numbers drop because his individual play declines, or whether the Minutemen's shooting woes on the road hurt Lowe's numbers.

Chris Matthews and Maurice Thomas each scored 18 points to lead SBU.

ting to the NCAA tournament" Venechanos said.

To do that, the Minutewomen will need sophomore Jackie Lyons to step up and lead a young defense backed by a goalkeeper making her collegiate debut. Lyons, an A-10 All-Rookie, was cited by Venechanos as being a potential impact player for 2009.

A native of Rocky Point, N.Y., Lyons even added a bit of an offensive punch last season, finishing with nine goals, four assists and 13 forced turnovers.

Holy Cross returnees, on the other hand, are hungry for different reasons. Finishing with a 5-11 record last year after winning the Patriot League Championship in both 2006 and 2007, the Crusader seniors have just as much to prove.

Newly-minted Holy Cross tri-captain Mary Kate Finnegan, a junior, makes her competitive return after posting a career-best 22 ground ball win total throughout last season. Look for Finnegan and Lyons, who scored twice for the Minutewomen in last year's season-opener, to lead their respective teams defensively.

"We're excited for [Lyons] to take that step coming out of her freshman year," Venechanos said. "I think she's ready to take charge of this team."

Minutewomen hand Great Danes first loss

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Avenging last season's 4-3 loss, the Massachusetts tennis team was propelled by its singles play and evened the score against previously unbeaten Albany with a 5-2 victory at home Sunday.

The Minutewomen (4-1) swept doubles across the board and came out on top in four of six singles matches, halting the Great Danes' (8-1) streak of eight consecutive victories to begin the season.

|---|---|
| UMass | 5 |
| Albany | 2 |

Albany entered the match outscoring its opponents 52-3, having lost only at the No. 1 singles and No. 1 doubles positions. On Sunday, UMass handed the Great Danes two more losses than they have had all season.

Candynce Boney and Maude Lecluyse continued their solid play at No. 1 doubles. They improved to 5-0 on the season in dual matches, defeating Susan Ma and Laine Mackey, 8-2.

Freshman Magdalena Ploch and sophomore Tanisha Hodgson earned a hard-fought 9-7 victory at No. 2 doubles over Charlotte Tatler and Holly Smith. Following suit at No. 3 doubles was pair Lauren MacKay and Kaitlyn Carpenter, who secured the win over Kim Weltman and Aubrey Brooks by the same score.

Ploch impressed once again at No. 1 singles defeating Albany's Susan Ma in a close 6-4, 7-5 match.

The victory, along with her comeback shocker at No. 1 singles on Tuesday against Boston University's Francine Whu, gave Ploch the honor of Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week. After going 3-1 on the week, Ploch is now 5-1 in both singles and doubles play, for an impressive 10-2 overall record in her rookie campaign.

Getting back on track was Boney, who picked up her first win of the spring season in singles play, defeating Weltman, 6-2, 3-6, 6-2, in a tough three set match.

At No. 3 singles, Lecluyse also prevailed in three sets, taking down Tatler, 6-4, 0-6, 6-4.

Hodgson earned UMass' final point on the day, moving past Albany's Smith with a 7-6 (5), 6-4 win.

Carpenter and MacKay were defeated at the No. 4 and No. 6 singles slots by Mackey and Brooks, respectively. Carpenter fell short in a 6-4, 7-5 loss while MacKay couldn't finish on a tiebreak, falling 7-5, 2-6, tiebreak (8-10).

The Minutewomen are busy this week, with scheduled three matches the first of which pits them at Boston College at 5 p.m. on Wednesday.

Candynce Boney picked up her first singles win of the season against Albany's Kim Weltman winning a tough match 6-2, 3-6, 6-3 to help the Minutewomen (4-1) defeat the previously unbeaten Great Danes (8-1).

Personal records set in Boston

BY MIKE MASTONE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams are riding high heading into the Atlantic 10 Championships after impressive showings at the Boston University Valentine's Invitational over the weekend.

Four Minutemen qualified individually the 4x400 relay team qualified for the IC4A Championships, raising the team's total to eight qualifications. Freshman Philip Weltman, sophomore Scott VanderMolen, junior Sean Duncan, senior Peter Fortunato and the relay team will join Tyler Cotto, Sam Laurenza and Jonathon Pearce at what many consider to be the season's most important meet.

Weltman ran his way into the record books with his performance in the 400-meter run. He finished in sixth place with a time of 48.45 seconds, the second-best time in UMass history. Sean Duncan and Fortunato stood out in the mid-distance events. Duncan ran the 800-meter with a time of 1 minute, 54.90 seconds while Fortunato ranked 16th in the mile (in a field of over 177 competitors). VanderMolen qualified for the IC4As by finishing the 1,000-meter in 2:28.88, while the 4x400 relay team finished in 11th place with a time of 3:18.78.

Cotto and sprinter Darius Velez continued their strong seasons with solid performances in their respective events. Cotto ran a season best 7.58 in the preliminaries for the 55-meter hurdles, but did not place in the finals due to a false start. Velez's 6.50 effort in the 55-meter dash was his second-best time of the season, trailing his performance at the Boston Games by .01 seconds.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien said he continues to be impressed with his team's performance.

"[The meet] got off on the right foot and kept snowballing," he said. "It was the best meet so far. There was solid effort across the board and some outstanding performances."

The Minutewomen also consider their trip to Boston a success after delivering several season and personal bests.

Junior Brittany Bakanowski racked up the best time of the season for the Minutewomen in the 500-meter run. With a time of 1:16.74, she finished seventh out of 60 competitors. Season bests also came from juniors Holly Heinricher and Rosalind Murphy and sophomore Gina Perno. Freshman Deanna Julian also stood out for her personal best in the 400-meter.

Heinricher, one of the most consistent Minutewomen as of late, ran the 200-meter in 25.28. Murphy finished the 400-meter in less than one minute to earn a season best of 59.73. Julian finished .22 seconds behind Murphy for her personal best. Perno ran the 800-meter in 2:17.80 to earn a 31st-place finish out of 162 runners.

The field competitors continue to contribute to the Minutewomen's success. The core of senior Kristen Bakanowski, junior Lisa Wilson and sophomores Ida Okkonen and Stephanie Aguguo all had strong efforts over the weekend.

Okkonen ranked the highest of any UMass women's competitor, finishing third in the long jump with a mark of 18-01.75. Bakanowski, who is battling Dayton's Courtney Siebenaller for the title of best pole vaulter in the A-10, finished sixth with a vault of 11-05.75. Wilson had another strong effort in the shot put with a distance of 44-04.00. She also competed in the weight throw, but fouled out; Aguguo ranked 12th in the triple jump with a mark of 35-10.25.

Both the men's and women's teams will carry strong momentum into next week's A-10 Championships in Kingston, R.I.

Defense carries UMass in win

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON — Playing at Matthews Arena is a feat in itself. The historic hockey rink is the oldest in the nation but it suits the Massachusetts hockey team just fine.

The Minutemen came into Boston after losing Friday to Northeastern, 5-3, being outworked and outplayed by their opposition. Saturday night they made it a point not to let that happen again.

UMass won, 4-1, and showed guts when Husky attackers loomed in their zone. The Minutemen (12-15-3, 7-11-3 Hockey East) worked hard around the boards, winning puck battles, denying NU (20-8-2, 15-5-1 Hockey East) no easy chances.

"We competed real well," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Last night we got crushed off faceoffs; we did a much better job tonight. It gave us puck possession and gave us an opportunity to advance the puck sooner."

UMass won 4-1, and showed guts when Husky attackers loomed in their zone. The Minutemen (12-15-3, 7-11-3 Hockey East) worked hard around the boards, winning puck battles, denying NU (20-8-2, 15-5-1 Hockey East) no easy chances.

Shawn Saunders stood out in particular.

The forward used his speed and his strength to muscle would-be threats off the puck, putting his team back on the offensive.

The sophomore took his limited playing time and put it to good use.

"Shawn's a great player," said Casey Wellman. "He's got great speed, he can get the puck to the net. We were struggling offensively and he's really come up in a big way."

MEYERS AND COMPANY

Dan Meyers, UMass' netminder, stopped 21 shots, controlling the majority of the rebounds that bounced off of him.

"Danny's done a good job for us all year long," Cahoon said. "He's won some big games for us. He's capable. [his performance] was no surprise to us."

When a puck happened to bounce out beyond the goaltender's reach the Minutemen defense, led by Justin Braun, was always there to swipe the puck away.

"There's nothing really to say, the defense did a great job," Meyers said. "I let them know after the game; it was just a great team effort."

Meyers replaced Friday night's starter Paul Dainton, who sat out with flu-like symptoms.

POWER PLAY

The UMass power play looked as good Saturday night as it has all season.

Marcou tallied two assists on the game, both on the power play. The small forward was the main contributor to Wellman's power-play goal with four seconds left in the first period. Marcou spotted Wellman creeping toward NU netminder Brad Thiessen's left, clear of any defenders. The sophomore, with architect-like precision, slid the puck between a Husky defender's legs where Wellman received the puck and did the rest.

The power play finished the game going 2-for-6. But more importantly, the unit moved the puck more as a team, creating more chances.

Mended hearts

UMass junior midfielder Bobby Haves and the Minutemen scored 15 goals against Sacred Heart Saturday afternoon at Garber Field in the 2009 season-opening victory. Haves, who scored twice, was one of nine Minutemen to score at least one goal and one of five to have at least two.

Struggles of '08 put to rest with dominating victory in opener

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Following a season full of turmoil and losses, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team felt they had a lot to prove entering the 2009 season.

Saturday's season-opening 15-6 thrashing of Sacred Heart by UMass proved not only that the Minutemen have put last year's mess behind them, but that the success of year's past appears to be part of their immediate future.

"We had a lot to prove coming out and we worked our butts off for these past few weeks. That was a big game for us – everyone was excited to play and we played well," said UMass senior midfielder Rory Pedrick, who missed all of last season with a knee injury.

Pedrick was one of five UMass players to score multiple goals in Saturday's 15-goal effort at Garber Field, the highest-scoring output the Minutemen have produced in their last 18 games dating back to the 2007 season. Pedrick wasn't the only Minuteman to make a strong comeback effort, as Ryan Marcus (two goals) and Jim Connolly (one) – who were each suspended for the 2008 season – made strong contributions in a well-balanced victory.

"It was great; you see how much depth we have when all these guys are scoring," Pedrick said. "We had multiple freshmen playing [substantial minutes], and they're playing composed and that's important because they have to be."

The rest of the Minutemen (1-0) also stayed composed at a crucial time early in the second half. A 7-3 halftime lead disappeared quickly in the third quarter, as two Sacred Heart goals in the first three minutes cut the deficit in half.

But goalkeeper Doc Schneider (eight saves) and UMass responded quickly and often, absolutely dominating play and outscoring the Pioneers 5-0 for the remainder of the period to regain control.

"We reacted well, we didn't panic," UMass coach Greg Cannella said about the brief letdown at the beginning of the

UMass has familiar problems in loss to St. Bonaventure

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This story has been written before.

More times than UMass coach Derek Kellogg would ever have wanted.

Once again, the Massachusetts men's basketball team took an early first-half lead, only to watch its opponent, this time St. Bonaventure, rally in the second half. The Bonnies defeated the Minutemen 83-75 in Olean N.Y.

"It was a game that was once again within our grasp," Kellogg said to The Daily Hampshire Gazette.

There were some other familiarities as well. Once again, forward Tony Gaffney had an outstanding all-around game with 21 points, 11 rebounds and three blocks to lead the Minutemen. It was the ninth time Gaffney has notched a double-double this season and the 15th game in which he had 10 or more rebounds.

Once again, the Minutemen (9-14, 4-6 Atlantic 10) lost while shooting fewer than 35 percent from behind the arc.

And finally, the Minutemen lost on the road yet again. They are now 2-9 away from the Mullins Center – their only wins coming over Fordham (Feb. 11) and Kansas (Dec. 13).

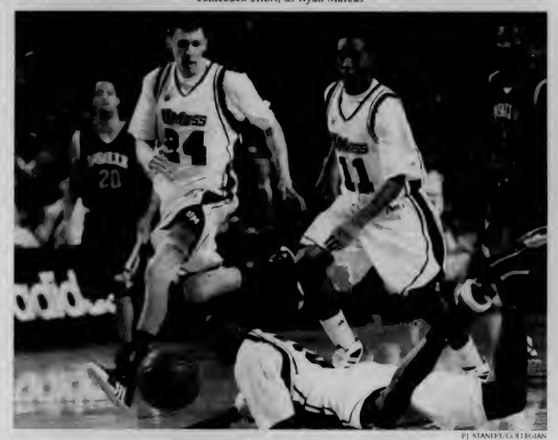
|---|---|
| SBU | 83 |
| UMass | 75 |

"This is unbelievably frustrating for everybody, every game it's the same thing. Guys panic. Some guys lose their minds," Gaffney told the Gazette. "We throw up some crazy shots. We don't box out, we don't rebound. We don't do the little things down the stretch to win games. We're not the mature team we need to be to win games."

Now the Bonnies (13-11, 4-7 A-10) are a fairly solid team, but UMass has beaten teams such as Dayton and Temple, both of whom are clearly better that St. Bonaventure. Somehow, the same mistakes and same issues keep popping up in losses the Minutemen could have avoided.



The Minutemen played a strong opening half, as has been their trademark. This time UMass opened up a 38-31 lead going into halftime behind 10 first-half points from Ricky Harris and Gaffney.

St. Bonaventure came out of the break energized and scorched the Minutemen, knocking down 15 of their first 17 shots after halftime to regain the lead. SBU shot 63.3 percent in the second half.

Second-half letdowns have been a problem all season. UMass has held the lead or been tied at halftime in four of its six conference losses.

Still, UMass had an opportunity to go on its first winning streak since Dec. 27 when Ricky Harris (19 points)

Minutewomen stumble again

Duquesne defeats UM 75-61 despite Gerardot's 28 points

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With such a young basketball team, any signs of improvement are a step in the right direction. Allowing nearly five opposing players to get into double figures in the points category is a step in the wrong direction.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost to Duquesne (15-10, 5-5 Atlantic 10), 75-61 Saturday night. Forward Samantha Pollino led the way for the Dukes with 23 points and nine rebounds. Duquesne's leading scorer this season, Kristi Little, had 14 points along with 11 assists.

|---|---|
| Duquesne | 75 |
| UMass | 61 |

At 5-foot-4, Little is a speedy nuisance for opponents because she targets all ball-handlers, even post players. Little focused on forward Stephanie Lawrence, from whom Little stole the ball twice in the final minutes of the second half.

"We knew she was going to do that," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "We told our posts not to put the ball down and when they put the ball down you see what happens. You can't put the ball down below the foul line because you know Kristi Little is going to be there."

The Dukes' 12 steals led to 17 fast-break points, as opposed to UMass' two points in the open court. In addition to the fast-break points, Duquesne notched 22 points by way of defensive miscues by the Minutewomen.

Sophomore forward Teya Wright, the other victim of Little's quick hands, had three steals of her own to go along with her three points and nine rebounds.

The Dukes also bothered Wright in the post, one of the causes for her four turnovers. She and guard Sakera Young shared the team-high in turnovers for the game.

In the first half, Young and senior captain Stefanie Gerardot combined for 16 of the Minutewomen's 34 first-half points.

Even with Gerardot's effort, the Minutewomen's biggest problems came in the post.

"Even though they weren't big they still out-rebounded us with pure hustle and aggressiveness," Gerardot said. "They won the hustle points tonight, which equated to the final score of the game."

Dacko has said the Minutewomen are a team that shoots 3-pointers, makes layups and gets to the foul line. In the second half, 3-pointers and foul shots were a non-factor. While neither team made a shot from beyond the arc, UMass lost the battle at the foul line.

The Minutewomen made 9-of-16 free throws, while Duquesne made 14-of-15. UMass lost its composure in the second half and committed 11 personal fouls. Nine of Pollino's 23 points came from second half free-throw attempts.

The Dukes' lock-down defense on freshman Kristina Danella was also a huge factor in the win. Normally an outstanding 3-point shooter, Duquesne limited Danella to just four points by way of a 3-pointer and a free-throw.

Danella was so overwhelmed by the defense that when she actually had open looks at the basket, she panicked and passed the ball.

When players like Danella, Wright or Gerardot needed a break, their teammates on the second unit did little to pick them up. Guard Kim Benton scored the only points for UMass off the bench, hitting two 3-pointers.

The Minutewomen will travel next to Washington, D.C., to play George Washington (15-10, 7-3 A-10) Wednesday.

Women's lacrosse team hopes for strong season opener vs. HC

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the wake of losing more than seven key players, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will get its first shot at adjusting Tuesday when it opens the 2009 season at Holy Cross.

The Crusaders, in contrast, are returning 23 letter-winners and seven starters.

Returning midfielder Meghan Reddy, who scored the opening goal in last year's 9-5 win over the Crusaders, leads a Minutewomen's roster that features 15 new recruits.

According to UMass coach Alexis Venechanos, however, the meshing of new team chemistry has been underway throughout the preseason.

"We're hoping that [the upperclassmen's] experience could have a domino effect on our younger players," she said. "Right now, we've been working on our chemistry, because that's the biggest thing when you have a freshman class coming in."

The rookies have some large gaps to fill. Absent from the roster is former standout Kaytlin McCormick, who averaged scoring nearly 2 goals (1.94) per game last season and scored twice in last year's Holy Cross opener.

Likewise, veteran goalie Krissy Anderson won't be returning to McGuirk Alumni Stadium. However, Venechanos and company are already referring to Anderson's freshman replacement Katy Florence as "Flo," and gushing about the King Philip High alumnus's preseason performances.

"[Florence] has been playing great. [She] had a great fall ball," Venechanos noted. "She's definitely a leader and the girls love playing for her. She's a vocal leader and that's all we can ask for right now."

Bolstered by an aggressive first-half attack, UMass beat the Crusaders by four goals at McGuirk last year. This year's contest, slated as an away game in Worcester, again marks the season-opener for both teams. It matches a Holy Cross squad picked to finish fifth in the Patriot League against a promising UMass team that looks to make a return to the Atlantic 10 Championship game. For Venechanos, the goals don't end there.

"Every year I've been here we've been able to progress in the A-10 tournament and as of right now that's our way of get-

Grad. student explores Sudan

UMass graduate student Malik Marjan was recognized by the National Geographic Society for a decade of fieldwork in Sudan.

Awarded for decade of research

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

The National Geographic Society (NGS) has named Malik Marjan, a graduate student at the University of Massachusetts, among this year's 10 "Emerging Explorers."

According to NGS's website, the Emerging Explorers program "recognizes and supports uniquely gifted and inspiring young adventurers, scientists, photographers and storytellers – explorers who are already making a difference early in their careers."

Marjan, 44, received the achievement for fieldwork he has done in Sudan over the past 10 years. His findings proved that wildlife still existed in large numbers, despite a raging civil war that has plagued the country for two decades.

He received word that he had been selected by NGS in August 2008. Along with the prestigious honor, he will receive $10,000 to help fund his future studies.

When asked about his personal feelings on receiving the award, he said he was proud the "humble conservation work that my colleagues and I have been doing [can now] mean something to the international community. It is also a challenge [to continue] achieving better results."

According to Marjan, a bloody civil war between the northern and southern regions of Sudan began for a second time in May 1983. The war crippled the nation, taking the lives of about 2.5 million people and causing millions of others to flee the country searching for refuge elsewhere.

"[Political] systems collapsed, and wildlife conservation ceased," said Marjan. "Firearms became readily available in the hands of people, and wildlife suffered unrestricted and indiscriminate hunting for food as well as money. As a result, populations of most wildlife species were decimated. Until we started our fieldwork, it was difficult to ascertain which species vanished and which ones were still there."

While the fighting continued, most international conservations agencies believed it too difficult to enter southern Sudan and obtain

Boston radio host visits UM

Graham addresses students

By James Weliver
Collegian Staff

The UMass Republican Club hosted the conservative radio personality, Michael Graham, before an assembly of approximately 100 students in the Campus Center Tuesday night. Graham, a stand-up comic turned talk show host, entertained the crowd with facetious twists on varied controversial subjects.

Likening him to the divisive Rush Limbaugh, the Republican Club was eager to host Graham in order to draw greater attention to its spring semester kick-off meeting. Republican Club president, Greg Collins, explained that the decision was easy to host Michael Graham as "he's a great personality."

"Last semester, we hosted Senator Allen, who just gave a simple spiel," said Collins. "This time we wanted somebody with a little more 'oomph.'"

And, Graham seemed to deliver the 'oomph' the club was seeking.

Graham opened by discussing his recent escapade of fighting an arrest for operating with a suspended license, which he described "was the result of having too much insurance." He then satirically likened his situation to the events surrounding the arrest and prosecution of Jason Vassell.

"You know, Jason and I have something in common. We do, really … we've seen the world on the other side of iron bars, and we want justice," Graham explained. "That's why I'm here for Justice for Jason, I'm not an expert on the case … but I know something. There were bad people, saying bad things, and they needed to be stabbed. So Jason stabbed them … Justice!"

Graham's comments brought many laughs from the audience and stern looks from a few.

In an increasingly sarcastic tone, he continued, "Then they want him [Vassell], to go to court? We shouldn't need to waste time in the Massachusetts justice system. Instead, you know who they need to try? Me! I'm the person who made an illegal u-turn. I'm the person who drove with too much insurance!"

Frustration overtook Graham's derision when he excitedly con-

Latitude lets users track friends

Google Latitude, a feature recently introduced, allows users to track others on Google Maps using a computer or mobile phone.

By Kathryn F. Foley
Collegian Correspondent

Most people have "Googled" before. Today, many Google users' primary incentive for this helpful website is to gain access to basically whatever they want, whenever they want. Some are even guilty of Googling themselves. Now, users have a new gadget to play with.

The Google Map application has been around for quite some time, and Google owners have recently introduced new software called Google Latitude, which allows users to not only have on-hand navigation but also the ability to locate close friends and family. Their catch-phrase, "See where your friends are on the map," basically says it all.

Latitude can be accessed by installing the proper components onto a computer or smart phone. Then, it uses general Wi-Fi mapping and GPS to establish a person's location, which is then displayed to that person's contacts that are also using the service.

The main benefit is that users are able to monitor what information is available to whom. If someone wants their family and best friends to be able to know exactly where they are, they can customize the settings so that they can.

If a person with Latitude does not want, for example, an ex-boyfriend or girlfriend to know where they are, or if they want to avoid awkward encounters, the settings can be adjusted to limit the amount of information visible to others.

With this service, users can tell others where they are and where they are not, which could be a potential problem. Users can choose to hide manually or set a false location if they don't want their contacts to know where they are or what they are doing.

For now, Latitude is available only to those who own Android-powered devices with Maps v3.0 and above, most Windows Mobile 5.0 and above devices, most color BlackBerry devices and most Symbian S60 devices.

For new iPhone and iPod touch craze users, Google has decided to make the program available with the Google Maps application very soon. In time, many Sony Ericsson users will have the option as well.

Google hopes to step into the virtual social networking world with Google Latitude believing it eventually will become so popular that it will compete with Yahoo!, Microsoft and Facebook.

Student investigates public water supply

By Kat Manner
Collegian Staff

Kirsten Studer, a University of Massachusetts environmental engineering graduate student, is using a $37,000-a-year grant from the Environmental Protection Agency to study the possibly dangerous by-products found in the public's drinking water.

Pharmaceuticals and compounds such as estrogen find their way into the water supply through many channels such as bodily waste from humans and animals that consumed the products, and as the result of "industrial sources," from pharmaceutical companies and hospitals, explained Studer.

The Associated Press reported in 2008 that pharmaceuticals "including antibiotics, anti-convulsants, mood stabilizers and sex hormones have been found in the drinking water of at least 41 million Americans."

When asked how she obtained her STAR, or "Science to Achieve Results," Fellowship, Studer explained she wrote a grant proposal explaining her formal research project titled, "Investigating Endocrine Disrupting Chemicals and their Disinfection Byproducts in Relation to Estrogenic Strength within Drinking Water Treatment."

Studer's research will investigate the interactions that take place between pharmaceuticals and drinking water during the water filtration process. Studer said there are four main water treatment systems currently used to filter the water the public uses.

Her research is studying the various water treatment techniques such as chlorination, the use of chloramines, ozonation, ultraviolet and ultraviolet/ozone treatment.

UMass listed among national leaders in technology transfer, licensing income

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has asserted itself as a national leader in technology transfer, earning nearly $41 million from faculty innovations and discoveries taken from the lab to the marketplace.

UMass ranks among the top three institutions in the New England area, and finds itself among the top 15 universities in the nation, as measured by the Association of University Technology Managers' (AUTM) annual U.S. Licensing Activity Survey.

In the 2007 fiscal year, the University had a total licensing income of $40,738,116, and now finds itself in the top tier of New England academic institutions that earn income from technology licenses and spin-off companies. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), is in the same bracket, earning $61,600,000.

During the 2007 fiscal year, the University earned revenue from the licensing of life sciences discoveries and new drugs, software, clean energy technologies, educational products and other inventions.

The main share of the University's licensing revenue is derived from life-sciences related discoveries, including new drugs and vaccines, with clean energy technologies also accounting for a key licensing revenue stream. UMass licensing revenues are reinvested in the University's research enterprise, continuing the cycle of research and innovation, and also providing funds for a variety of academic programs.

UMass system President Wilson noted the role that university research plays in stimulating economic growth.

"As our national and state leaders are looking for short and long-term measures to stimulate an economic recovery, this national survey demonstrates that university research plays a crucial role in developing new products, new companies and new jobs," he said.

In recent years, the University has launched a number of successful spin-off companies which contributed to its 2007 fiscal year licensing revenue. These include businesses like Oteros, a company formed based on a novel biofuel technology discovered at the University; RXi Pharmaceuticals, a discovery-stage biopharmaceutical company pursuing the development and commercialization of proprietary therapeutics based on RNA interference (RNAi), co-founded by UMass Medical School Nobel Laureate Craig Mello, Ph.D.; Arterion, which uses nanotechnology to create a small-scale delivery system to more efficiently administer drugs or cosmetics and is based on a discovery at UMass Lowell; and Konarka Technologies, a pioneer in creating new renewable energy sources based on research at UMass Lowell.

In a matter of 13 years, from the 1994 fiscal year to the 2007 fiscal year, the University's annual licensing income has grown from $195,000 to $40.7 million. The University's growth in this area is a result of a multi-year, multi-faceted effort by the UMass Commercial Ventures and Intellectual Property (CVIP) and a strong commitment from President Wilson, who has focused on expanding the University's role as a Massachusetts innovation engine.

President Wilson, who earlier in his career launched his own company, has supported the entrepreneurial efforts of UMass faculty and the University's intellectual property commercialization by instituting CVIP grants to faculty and supporting the development of University technology incubators.

Intellectual property licensing income is just one measure of the University's economic impact in the Commonwealth and beyond. The UMass system, with five campuses and more than 60,000 students, is responsible for $4.3 billion of annual economic activity and 29,000 jobs in the state.

is found in both synthetic and natural forms, estrogen, may interact with disinfection agents and create byproduct "disrupters" that interfere with the glands that guide the development, behavior, growth and reproduction of living beings, as well being possibly carcinogenic.

Each of these processes may interact with the drugs already present in the water in different ways and create byproducts that may make the byproducts more dangerous. However, as Studer explains, the interactions vary depending on what specific combination of pharmaceuticals is exposed to a certain filtration technique.

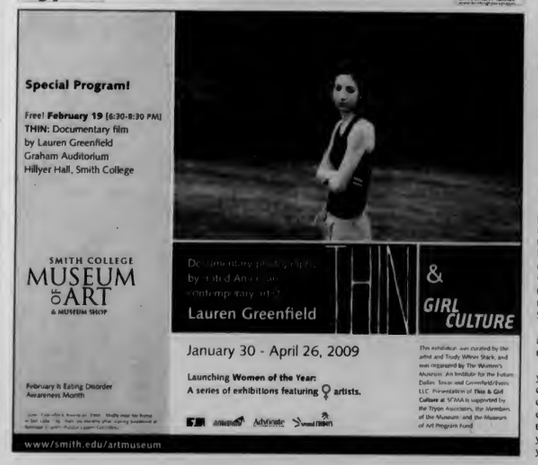
Studer's goal is to discover the filtration process that creates the least harmful byproducts, helping to create a safer water supply.

"This research is relatively new to the scientific community because we haven't had the analytic capability to measure such low levels [of pharmaceuticals] until recent years," said Studer.

She also said that many of these chemicals are not yet regulated by the EPA.

In a Boston Globe interview, Studer's advisor, professor David Reckhow of the Civil and Environmental Engineering Department, whose team is studying pharmaceuticals in the drinking water supply said, "The amounts [of pharmaceuticals] are small but during a lifetime of exposure people are coming into contact with hundreds of pharmaceuticals. It's important we understand the long-term effect on people, as well as what happens when these compounds come in contact with one another."

Studer's research will help reveal whether current water filtration practices are doing their job, or creating more harmful byproducts, and will contribute to public knowledge on the subject.



For freshman journalism major Charlee Drouges, this contribution is a refreshing one.

"I feel like this is something the public should know about," said Drouges. "I didn't know that there were such chemicals in the water, or that they could interact during the treatment processes."

She agreed with Studer's sentiment, "we just don't know what the effects will be."

NGS honors fieldwork

information about wildlife. They therefore wrongly concluded that most of the wildlife had been wiped out.

Marjan and his team knew this to be incorrect. Determined to prove the skeptics wrong, they began to observe wildlife through an initial reconnaissance flight in May 1999. This was followed by a series of ground surveys from 2000 to 2005 and an aerial survey in 2007.

Marjan and his team not only found wildlife, they found it in staggering amounts. Huge migrations of antelopes and gazelles were seen, over a million in total. In particular, they studied and observed the migration of the white-eared koh, a type of antelope. Thousands of other animals such as buffalo, elephants and ostriches were also counted, according to the NGS website.

"Everyone told us we'd find nothing," said Marjan in a previous interview with NGS. "So it was easy to fear we might fail. But these incredible results amazed everyone, both inside and outside Sudan. We've shown the world what's here and it's a huge relief. In fact, we feel the numbers may be even higher than recorded because so many animals were moving at the time."

The process wasn't easy. Marjan and his team began their field studies in Nimule National Park, the smallest protected area in southern Sudan, occupying land along the Sudan-Uganda border. They then worked their way across southern Sudan, eventually setting up a base in Boma.

According to Marjan, a field study involves looking at a problem. One must have a proposed design with clear objectives for addressing the problem. Then a team must be formed to carry out the work. The team is key in that it serves as a support group for the individual, both financially and spiritually. Once a team is assembled, extensive planning must be made for every day.

"You need clear sources of logistics and supply to sustain the team in the field," said Marjan. "A field study in Southern Sudan requires positive spirit, perseverance and personal determination."

The findings of Marjan and his team were published into working reports submitted to donors (USAID/USDA) and the southern Sudan authorities. Reports of a 2007 aerial survey have been distributed to the Wildlife Conservation Society, according to Marjan. Marjan is currently in Africa on his eighth field study. His goals for this field study are to "discover the wet season refuge of the migratory antelope species in southern Sudan, determining sustainability of the extractive use of wildlife in the area and developing models for the future conservation of these species."

In addition to doing continuous fieldwork, Marjan also serves at the Boma Wildlife Training Center as the center's first principal.

"My experiences in Africa have been rich and enabled me to shine in the world to some extent," he said. "Others can learn from my experiences as well. I read [a quote] somewhere that said: 'in the desert of calamities, there is an oasis of hope.' From simple things, one can make a difference."

In 1993, Marjan received his bachelor's degree from the University of Juba in Sudan, majoring in wildlife science and receiving honors in natural resources and environmental studies. Six years later, he received his master's degree in Conservation Biology at the University of Kent in Canterbury, United Kingdom.

He began graduate school at UMass in 2006, and has approximately two years of research and work left before he can get his doctorate in natural resources conservation. His advisor at UMass is professor of Natural Resources Conservation, Todd Fuller, professor of natural resources conservation.

Q&A: How will the stimulus plan help me?

BY KEVIN G. HALL
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama signed into law Tuesday the largest government economic rescue plan in the nation's history, a $787 billion package of spending, tax cuts and tax credits that's designed to help pull the nation out of what's becoming the worst downturn since the Great Depression.

The American Recovery and Reinvestment Act includes everything from money to refurbish public housing to incentives for energy conservation. The 1,000-page plan aims to create and preserve jobs, and also to accelerate the transformation of key economic sectors.

While the plan provides some benefits directly to individuals, the main way it's intended to help Americans is to promote economic activity nationwide. The stimulus is but one part of a multi-front attack by the government on the recession.

Other parts include the mortgage-relief program that Obama will announce on Wednesday and the next phase of the bank bailout, to be announced soon. They're all intended to work together, along with efforts by the Federal Reserve to kick-start the economy. However, individuals will benefit most once the economy resumes growth rather than from the stimulus itself.

Here are some answers to questions about what the stimulus plan might mean to taxpayers and consumers.

Q: Will I get a tax rebate like last year?

A: No. Taxpayers won't receive checks this year. This plan involves a payroll tax cut, where employers will withhold less in taxes, meaning there will be a modest bump up in take-home pay until an income threshold is met. The cap is $400 for single filers and $800 for joint filers whose adjusted gross income falls below $75,000 and $150,000, respectively.

Q: What if I'm self-employed?

A: You must adjust your quarterly tax filings to capture this credit.

Q: I don't earn a lot. How else does the stimulus plan help me?

A: The stimulus plan includes a temporary expansion of the earned-income tax credit for families with three or more children, and it allows more low-income families to receive a refundable child tax credit this year and next. For recipients of food stamps, the dollar amount of this assistance will increase by 14 percent.

Q: What about people who are disabled or living on their Social Security checks?

A: The Social Security Administration will be sending a one-time $250 "economic recovery payment" within 120 days for people in this category. Check the agency's website, or AARP's website, in the coming days for more detail.

Q: I've lost my job. How does this help?

A: If you're eligible for unemployment benefits this year, you no longer will have to pay federal taxes on the first $2,400 of these benefits. The bill also extends unemployment benefits that would've phased out in March through December, and it raises the average weekly benefit by $25 a week, to $325.

Q: I've lost my health insurance. Where do I get coverage for my family?

A: If you lose your job this year and choose to take Cobra coverage to keep your family covered on health care, the government will now subsidize up to 65 percent of the costs of your premium for nine months. If you lost your job any time after Sept. 1 and elected not to receive Cobra coverage but now want it, you can contact your former employer and it should be available. Help on Cobra premiums will be available to any worker laid off from Sept. 1, 2008, to Dec. 31, 2009.

Q: I need to buy a car. Does the stimulus plan help me?

A: It doesn't provide the steep tax credits some prominent economists had advocated but will allow you to deduct from your federal taxes the state sales tax that are associated with buying a car, truck, motorcycle or recreational vehicle. This benefit phases out for single tax filers who have adjusted gross incomes above $125,000 or joint filers above $250,000.

Q: There'd been talk of a $15,000 tax credit for home purchases. Is this in the stimulus?

A: No. The stimulus plan expanded an existing program for first-time homebuyers, but didn't expand it to everyone. It raised by $500, to $8,000, the tax credit for first-time buyers who purchase a home. Before, this credit had to be repaid if a home was sold within three years of purchase. That repayment no longer is required.

Getting personal with stimulus bill

Parts of the economic stimulus that directly help consumers, in billions:

|---|---|
| Tax cuts | |
| Tax credit $400 per worker, $800 per couple in 2009 and 2010 | $116.0 |
| College credit $2,500 expanded tax credit for college tuition, related expenses for 2009, 2010 | $14.0 |
| Child tax credit $1,000 per child to families that don't earn enough to pay income taxes | $15.0 |
| Homebuyer tax credit $8,000 for first-timers buying before Dec. 1 | $8.0 |
| Auto sales tax credit Can write off sales tax | $1.7 |
| Energy incentives Includes homeowner tax credit for energy-efficient windows, etc.; rebates for efficient appliances | $20.0 |
| Unemployment insurance No tax on first $2,400 of benefits | $4.7 |
| Spending | |
| Pell Grant for college Raises maximum grant $500 to $5,350 | $15.6 |

UMPD Crime Log: February 8 – 12

The semester so far has been relatively calm and uneventful according to the University of Massachusetts Police Department. "It's been pretty typical. This time of year is quiet and there are not a lot of search warrants and arrests," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

SUNDAY

Yvonne Rivera, 27, of 75 Pine St. Springfield, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue at 12:12 a.m. and charged with disorderedly conduct and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest. "An officer stopped the car in which Rivera was a passenger for an obscure and improper license plate and at the feet of Ms. Rivera was some beer," said Archbald. After the tow truck was called, Rivera was ticketed for the alcohol and the other three passengers left. "Rivera stayed behind and she walked into traffic and then tried to walk between the car and the tow truck; when the officer tried to stop her from going further into the lane she started arguing," he added. After refusing to leave the roadway, Rivera was placed under arrest at which point she attempted to free herself. "During handcuffing she was twisting her arms and trying to get away; she wouldn't comply," said Archbald.

Mauricio Pena, 22, of 153-14 Barbarossa Drive Houston, Texas, was arrested after an alleged disturbance in Washington dormitory at 2:42 a.m. and charged with a single count of trespassing.

Anthony Robinson, 20, of 47 East Main St. Brockton, Mass., was arrested at the Berkshire Dining Commons at 6:08 p.m. and charged with domestic assault and battery and malicious destruction of property ($250). "An officer responded to a disturbance at the Berkshire Dining Commons where a black female reported being a victim of an assault and a theft," said Archbald. The suspect's name and description was given and the officer was told that he was currently running across the street to Parking Lot 33. The clothing the suspect was said to be wearing was collaborated and Robinson was detained. "During the incident inside the dining hall there was yelling and screaming and Robinson was said to have shoved the victim towards and into the men's restroom where she said he forcibly shoved her into a wall in the bathroom and took her cell phone," said Archbald.

MONDAY

Chad E. Green, 21, of Tenney St. Chicopee, Mass., and Kevin M. Preston, 22, of 124 Homestead Blvd. Longmeadow, Mass., were arrested in the John Adams dormitory at 12:20 p.m. and both charged with drug offenses. Green is charged with possession of a Class B drug and distribution of a Class B drug. Preston is charged with possession of a Class B drug, possession of a Class E drug and conspiracy to violate drug laws. "Officers went to locate Mr. Green for an arrest warrant and they observed him putting a clear plastic bag with green pills in it into his pocket. The officer was close enough to see this and it was in plain view," said Archbald. "After they made the arrest of Green, because there were pills on him, officers decided to apply for a search warrant," he added. Archbald divulged that typically when police want to search a room and people are occupying it, before they are allowed to leave they're searched. In the John Adams dormitory there were other people inside, including Preston. "Preston was searched and two bongs with marijuana residue in them were found and two pills (ecstasy and clorazapan)," said Archbald.

WEDNESDAY

Stephen Hahn, 19, of 410 Patterson dormitory Amherst, Mass., was arrested at his residence at 6:23 p.m. and charged with a warrant – WMS – (Warrant Messenger Service) and marijuana possession – one ounce or less.

Andre C. Paquette, 20, of 10 Faxon Green Newport, R.I., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Commonwealth Avenue at 9:27 p.m. and charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license, number plate violation and registration not in possession.

THURSDAY

Andrew James Bohac, 20, of 42 Daniels St. Franklin, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Lincoln Avenue at 7:42 p.m. and charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Facebook site changes its terms-of-service

BY WAILIN WONG
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

CHICAGO — Facebook knows your age, alma mater and favorite band. It's seen your spring break photos and read the messages you sent to your friend. So, can it do anything it wants with that content?

Legally, almost. But in practice, the rules that govern Facebook's relationship with its users are abstract and subject to constant negotiation.

The blogosphere was abuzz Monday after a popular consumer affairs blog pointed out changes to Facebook's terms of use that the social networking Web site quietly made earlier this month. The issue of who controls the data posted to the site is a massive gray area that continues to evolve as Internet companies and consumers shape social norms of how to define trust in the digital age and share their lives through new technology.

Under both the old and new rules, members grant Facebook a license to use content "on or in connection with the Facebook Service or the promotion thereof." But the revised agreement eliminates language saying this license would "automatically expire" if content were removed from the site.

"They're saying, 'Once data gets in our database, we can do whatever we want with it,'" said Eric Goldman, associate professor and director of the High Tech Law Institute at the Santa Clara University School of Law.

Suzie White, Facebook's corporate counsel for commercial transactions, announced on the company's official blog on Feb. 4 that the site was updating its terms of use. But Facebook didn't send out a mass notification asking users to sign off on the changes. And White's brief post, which didn't call attention to the content license, went unnoticed.

Then, on Sunday, the Consumerist blog, which is owned by the publisher of Consumer Reports, warned readers of the changes by describing the revised policy as, "We Can Do Anything We Want With Your Content. Forever."

Facebook founder and Chief Executive Mark Zuckerberg responded to the controversy Monday, posting a note that explained the rationale for the content license.

"When a person shares information on Facebook, they first need to grant Facebook a license to use that information so that we can show it to the other people they've asked us to share it with," Zuckerberg wrote. "Without this license, we couldn't help people share that information."

In a statement, Facebook said its policy of maintaining a license over old content is consistent with general use of its site and other web services such as e-mail. For example, if a Facebook member sends a message to a friend, that message remains in the friend's inbox even if the member quits the site. The company said this is similar to web-based e-mail, where sent messages remain archived in recipients' inboxes even if the sender's account is deleted.

The controversy over the revised terms highlights a crucial question of user responsibility in the social networking age: Do consumers understand what can happen to their data? Privacy experts often warn that the notion that consumers can control the content they post online is illusory. Yet, most users don't bother reading terms of service or question a company's intentions when they sign up for a new site.

"Typically, terms of service approximate the length of a contract you would sign to buy a house," said Nathan Gilliatt, principal at social media consulting firm Social Target. "Half of it is in uppercase text that's almost unreadable. It's non-negotiable, and people want to use the service. So what are you going to do?"

One reason Facebook has become so popular is "it's convinced users that they have control over what takes place on the site," Goldman said. This level of trust is built into the culture of Facebook, not enshrined in any legal document.

Goldman said the language in Facebook's terms of use "runs directly contrary" to the tacit agreement the site has struck with its members. Users generally trust that their profile photos won't turn up on a roadside billboard without their permission, or that their blog posts won't be published in a bound volume and sold for profit.

Zuckerberg's Monday post sought to downplay fears that Facebook has dark motivations for amassing user data.

"We wouldn't share your information in a way you wouldn't want," Zuckerberg said. "The trust you place in us as a safe place to share information is the most important part of what makes Facebook work."

Graham talks stimulus

cluded why the "Justice for Jason" campaign exemplified the "Massachusetts liberal's" ideology.

"If you think Khalid Shaykh Muhammad (al-Qa'ida terror suspect) should be free, Justice for Jason can stab people with impunity, and I should be the one in jail!" said Graham. "Congratulations, you are smart enough to be a Massachusetts liberal."

Michael Graham of WTKK 96.9 FM, is compared to Rush Limbaugh.

In addition to local matters, Graham pointed out his opinions of flawed "liberalness." Whether discussing the history of terrorism, Deval Patrick's tax system or the opposition to the Iraq War, he repeatedly stated why he didn't understand the liberal point of view, concluding, "I'm just not smart enough to be a liberal."

Graham often highlighted many points regarding the recent stimulus package, explaining why he felt the bill will not work. He was "bargaining" with the audience for an explanation of the bill.

"I brought with me $100 of cash money," Graham said, "and it is available to any member of the UMass economics department who can stand up and explain in the a rational way ... how spending $800 Billion on STD research and Frisbee golf can help this economy."

Citing the billions of dollars being spent on government programs by way of the stimulus bill, Graham stated the stimulus bill would simply accrue more debt and be unable to stimulate the weakening economy.

Following his explanation he added "They'll be dragging my dead body out of that stack of hookers before this [deficit] is paid off."

Questions from the audience presented both supportive comments and a few moments of clashing ideas. However, Graham did not so much as flinch in his responses.

Recalling a statement in which Graham blamed the labeling of water boarding as torture to "the liberal way of 'feeling' about things," one student questioned why the practice should not be considered torture. Alluding to the training of Navy Seals,

Graham explained his position by stating, "Torture isn't something we do to our soldiers. It is not torture to pour water down someone's throat until they feel like they're drowning ... [but] frying somebody's testicles with a hot iron — that is torture."

Graham capped his speech with additional points of resistance to the Obama stimulus package suggesting tax rebates will enable further growth.

He also reiterated his resentment of Massachusetts' liberal ideology and that "UMass professors do not live in a state of reality," in final warning from one conservative talk radio host to the UMass student body.

Ice build-up on wings might have caused N.Y. plane crash

BY SCOTT FALLON
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

HACKENSACK, N.J. — Federal investigators will spend the weekend trying to determine whether a heavy accumulation of ice caused a commuter plane from Newark, N.J., to crash in suburban Buffalo, N.Y., killing 50 people, including at least 11 from New Jersey.

The pilots of Continental Connection Flight 3407 discussed "significant ice buildup" on the wings and windshield shortly before the twin turboprop nose-dived into a house Thursday night, federal officials said. The airplane went through a "severe pitch and roll" after positioning its flaps for a landing, said Steve Chealander, a spokesman for the National Transportation Safety Board.

It was the nation's first deadly crash of a commercial airliner in more than two years and came just weeks after a celebrated emergency landing on the Hudson River saved the lives of all 155 aboard.

On Friday night, workers began removing the victims' remains from the crash scene in Clarence, N.Y., after firefighters battled flames from the wreckage for most of the day.

One of the 49 passengers killed onboard was a woman whose husband died in the World Trade Center attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Among the New Jersey victims were four members of a Bloomfield family and two members of a popular jazz band.

President Obama voiced condolences Friday, saying: "Our hearts go out to the families and friends who lost loved ones."

Earlier in the day, investigators were able to recover black box recorders that could shed light on what went wrong.

No mayday call came from the pilot before the crash, according to a recording of air traffic control's radio messages captured by the website LiveATC.net. Neither the controller nor the pilot showed concern that anything was out of the ordinary as the airplane was asked to fly at 2,300 feet as it descended toward Buffalo-Niagara International Airport in New York.

Witnesses heard the plane sputtering before it plunged squarely through the roof of the house, its tail section visible through flames that shot at least 50 feet into the night sky. One person died in the house and two others escaped with minor injuries.

The near-vertical drop of the plane may have avoided more casualties on the ground.

"If it had landed horizontally, it could have taken out the whole neighborhood," said New York Gov. David Paterson.

After the crash, several pilots were heard on air traffic control messages saying they had been picking up ice on their wings.

"We've been getting ice since 20 miles south of the airport," one said.

Another said his plane had picked up rime ice, a rough type of ice that prevents air from moving smoothly, puts considerable drag on the plane and prevents the wings from lifting. Planes can stall even at high speeds or pitch and roll uncontrollably as Flight 3407 did, aviation experts said.

In 1994, an American Eagle commuter plane crashed in Roselawn, Ind., killing all 68 people aboard. Investigators said an ice buildup on the wings caused the aircraft to suddenly roll out of control.

The 74-seat Bombardier Dash 8-Q400 aircraft in Thursday's disaster was operated by Manassas, Va.-based Colgan Air. The plane was built last year by Canadian aircraft manufacturer de Havilland.

It was the first fatal crash of a commercial airliner in the United States since Aug. 27, 2006, when 49 people were killed after a Comair jetliner mistakenly took off from a Lexington, Ky., runway that was too short.

About 30 relatives and others who arrived at the Buffalo airport overnight were escorted into a private area and taken by bus to a senior citizens center in the neighboring town of Cheektowaga, where counselors and representatives from Continental waited to help.

Among the New Jersey victims are:

Donald and Dawn Mossop and their son Shawn, 12, along with Dawn Mossop's sister, Ferris Reid. All lived in Bloomfield and were members of a Jehovah's Witnesses church in Montclair, according to two church elders.

Jazz guitarist Coleman Mellett, 34, of East Brunswick, and saxophonist Gerry Niewood, 65, of Glen Ridge. Both were members of the Chuck Mangione Band and slated to perform at a concert in Buffalo.

Maddy Loftus, 25, a graduate of Parsippany Hills High School. She was heading to a weekend reunion at Buffalo State University of the college's women hockey players.

Mailda Quintero of Iselin, a flight attendant for Colgan Air.

Ronald Gonzalez, the director of the youth services program based in the New Brunswick school district, where he served as a liaison between families and social service agencies.

Lorin Maurer, who worked at Princeton University for the Office of Development, the school's fund-raising arm.

Jean Smecz of Clinton, a senior vice president of merchandising at Baker and Taylor Inc., a wholesale book distributor.

New Jersey Governor Jon Corzine issued a statement, saying: "The thoughts and prayers of all New Jerseyans are with the families and loved ones of those aboard Flight 3407, and I would like to express my deepest sympathies to them for their loss."

Beverly Eckert, an outspoken 9/11 widow, was also among those killed. She was heading to Buffalo for a celebration of what would have been her husband's 58th birthday. Last week, Eckert met with Obama along with other relatives of those killed in the 2001 attacks to discuss how the new administration would handle terrorism suspects.

Obama brings little change

John Glaser

Now just under a month into Barack Obama's transformative presidency, the new president has already proven a liar on a number of counts, but last week revealed another promise he just doesn't consider worth keeping.

The president has been inundating America with pledges of transparency and accountability. He castigated the Bush administration's secretive way of muscling desired policies to fruition under the cover of darkness and a closed government not subject to the annoyances of openness, objection and dissent. His campaign website deemed Bush's excessive use of a legal tool known as the "states' secrets" privilege as "The Problem."

But now – surprisingly for most, expectedly for me – Obama has wholeheartedly signed on to the continuation of Bush's gratuitous use of state secrecy in getting what he wants, all the while contributing to the asphyxiation of what little remaining constitutional restraints on government Americans still enjoy.

The Obama administration was required to file the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals its position in a case involving five men who were victims of Bush's extraordinary rendition program. They were abducted, uncharged and flown to places like Egypt, Morocco and CIA sites in Afghanistan and Eastern Europe, where they were tortured.

The Bush administration had the case dropped, citing national security, using the old "states' secrets" excuse. What that really meant was that they didn't want this case to go forward to highlight their illegal activities. They wanted to avoid judicial scrutiny.

Obama's lawyers told the judge last week that the policy of the government, despite the recent transfer of power, has not changed and that they stand behind the positions that the previous administration held.

Ben Wizner, the lawyer representing the plaintiffs, described the circumstances of the case as follows. "[Plaintiff Ahmed Agiza] was picked up off the streets of Stockholm and then he was taken to an airport where a CIA rendition team – this is a bunch of men dressed all in black, with their faces covered – sliced off all of his clothes, put a suppository into him, chained him to the floor of an airplane, flew him to Egypt where he was exposed to absolutely brutal torture, including shock treatment, all kinds of beatings. He was then given a show trial in an Egyptian military court and sentenced to 15 years for involvement in a banned organization."

The stubborn resistance to facts and evidence that Obama supporters display against accusations that he represents not change, but status quo is an astonishing phenomenon to witness.

That is what Barack Obama now demands cannot be investigated in a court of law. And he's using exactly the dictatorial methods he decried Bush for using. Some change he has brought us.

As Wisconsin Senator Russ Feingold, a consistent lone dissenter in Congress, said, "when the executive branch invokes the states' secrets privilege to shut down lawsuits, hides its programs behind secret OLC [Office of Legal Council] opinions, over-classifies information to avoid public disclosure and interprets the Freedom of Information Act as an information withholding statute, it shuts down all of the means to detect and respond to its abuses of the rule of law."

It sounds like nothing has changed.

So, despite his campaign promises to act differently as president and the executive order against torture, detention facilities and secrecy Obama signed in his first full day in office, he has entirely reneged on all those counts thus far. Yet the silence among his supporters on this issue is deafening.

The stubborn resistance to facts and evidence that Obama supporters display against accusations that he represents not change, but status quo is an astonishing phenomenon to witness. They steadfastly refuse, with self-righteous conviction, to admit to the various areas where Bush and Obama overlap, seeming to insist that it's acceptable for Democrats to be despots, but that only Republicans are evil for it.

Just after the issuance of the Declaration of Independence, when Americans rich and poor were unified towards separation from arbitrary British rule, the Boston Committee of Correspondence stood on the Boston Common and read Thomas Jefferson's sweeping manifesto aloud to the townsmen.

Once finished, in a sick turn of irony, the committee ordered the townsmen to appear for a military draft. The wealthy and privileged Americans could buy their way out of forced conscription, but those who couldn't were told their lives now belonged to the Revolution, whether they liked it or not.

These lower-class Bostonians stood firm in the commons of their soon-to-be independent country and protested: "Tyranny is tyranny, let it come from whom it may."

Barack Obama, we are told, was destined to be this American savior. He was supposed to breathe new life into the gasping traditions of American governance and release us from the tyranny of the Bush reign. Of course, we are not supposed to question whether he may himself be a tyrant.

Feeding Octomom

Alana Goodman

The story started out as that perfect piece of pop-culture fluff that the media swoons over: "American mommy gives birth to healthy octuplets."

Cue the predictable, dizzy motorcade of daytime TV interviews, the Star Magazine family photo exclusive and a TLC documentary mini-series. The whole affair was boning up to be slightly more boring and obvious than the Grammy Awards.

The only thing that saved this story from the stale ashtray of insipidness was the octuplets' mother, Nadya Suleman. As facts about her started to trickle out into the media, it slowly dawned on anyone paying attention that Suleman's oddball obsession with babies and her overly-plastic-surgeried face approached Michael Jackson-level weirdness.

Here was a 33-year-old single mom of 14 – the octuplets plus six older ones – who had conceived all of them through in vitro fertilization (IVF). She was also an unemployed graduate student who lived with her parents and her legion of fatherless children in a cramped, three-bedroom house in California.

Once Suleman began doing TV interviews, her story officially went from cutesy to creepy. On the TODAY Show, the "Octomom" – as the New York Post so aptly renamed her – told Ann Curry that "all I wanted was children. I wanted to be a mom. That's all I ever wanted in my life."

Suleman wanted them so bad, in fact, that she didn't bother waiting until she had enough money to support them.

According to financial planner Stacy Francis, it will cost at least $1.5 million to raise all 14 children until the age of 18. And that's not factoring in the cost of extras, such as toys, entertainment or college. At the moment, three of Suleman's older children have disabilities, and it is likely that some of the octuplets may suffer from this as well.

But don't worry, the fiscally responsible taxpayer is there to help her out.

According to the Los Angeles Times, Suleman, "is receiving $490 a month in food stamps" in addition to federal assistance. Somehow, despite being unemployed, the single mom has also been able to afford regular manicures, a publicist, a $500-a-week nanny, a nose-job and lip surgery to make her look like her idol, Angelina Jolie.

Take the amount of money Americans are paying for Suleman's children and multiply it by billions. This is what the country is spending to subsidize equally irresponsible and selfish state politicians.

Remember, this was not a woman who unexpectedly discovered that she was carrying Octuplets after a night of haphazard intimacy with a boyfriend. She deliberately and selfishly had herself impregnated with multiples, knowing that she couldn't financially care for them and could barely support the other six children she had at home.

And taxpayers not only have to respect her irresponsible decision, they have to finance it as well.

Now take the amount of money Americans are paying for Suleman's children and multiply it by billions. This is what the country is spending to subsidize equally irresponsible and selfish state politicians.

Massachusetts alone is set to receive at least $11.7 billion, reported the Boston Globe on Feb. 14. The state needs the money – at the moment our debt is over $18 billion. But handing out a bailout to Massachusetts won't get to the root of our state's problem, which is irresponsible and wasteful government spending.

Instead of asking for handouts, Gov. Deval Patrick should be cutting unnecessary institutions like the Turnpike Authority. Last year, state Republicans called on Patrick to dissolve the Turnpike Authority, calling it a "stream of fiscal mismanagement and wasteful spending." The government agency is in an enormous amount of debt, and drew the ire of tax reformers after it was revealed that its toll-takers were earning over $100,000 a year.

Even before the recent stimulus package was passed by the U.S. government this February, Congress was already sending over $467 billion a year to state and local government. The only states that need bailouts at the moment are those run by reckless politicians who mismanaged government funds.

The people who are going to lose the most from the new government stimulus program are taxpayers in states with responsible budget management. They are the ones who will end up paying higher taxes in order to bail out the states mired in wasteful spending.

Not only is the stimulus unfair to the sensible taxpayers, it also refuses to hold states accountable for their problematic spending practices.

Why should the mature, dutiful taxpayer be expected to be accountable for the irresponsible decisions of others?

Heedless and self-absorbed people like Suleman believe that taxpayers have an obligation to pay for their flighty exploits. On Suleman's website, professional photos of her eight preemies are colorfully displayed beneath a large "Donation" button – allowing people to send money directly to her bank account via credit card or PayPal. This is a woman on federal assistance who could never understand what the average family goes through: the budgeting and saving, and quietly going without unnecessary indulgences – no vacation this year, or bagged lunches for work every day so their kid can have a new pair of sneakers.

Will Suleman ever even know how much eight pairs of sneakers cost? Or will her burdens always be passed onto the shoulders of someone else?

Somehow, at some point, younger people in this country stopped holding themselves, their fellow citizens and their elected officials accountable for their personal actions. Welcome to the new generation, the bailout nation.

Freedom of choice act removes choice

In our day and age, abortions are hard to come by. So we need the Freedom of Choice Act (FOCA) to make sure that women have the right to get them if they want and whenever they want, as it's their "fundamental right to choose to bear a child." This is why President Obama so nicely said he'd sign it into law.

According to the Center for Disease Control, from 1975 to this past year, on average, there have been roughly a million abortions every year in the United States. A number that some say is deflated, and others say is inflated. Nonetheless, still very high. Just picture 50 UMass Amhersts.

So you see why the Freedom of Choice Act, which would do away with laws prohibiting partial-birth abortions, parental notification and the right for a doctor to not perform an abortion, is entirely necessary.

Judging by the number of abortions, it is evident there are currently not enough able doctors who will perform abortions. So the government needs to legally obligate every doctor – even if they conscientiously disagree – to perform an abortion on a female while ridding every current law with any restrictions on abortions.

The absurdness of the Freedom of Choice Act doesn't just stem from the moral haziness of abortion. The arguments of whether abortion is right or wrong or maybe okay will probably never have an absolute resolution between its debaters. Some people think the fetus is a sacred human being. Some think it is just a cluster of cells, and then some realize that regardless of the truth of either of these two positions, the implications of enacting the FOCA would be disastrous.

The Freedom of Choice Act is irrational and reckless. It would get rid of every law that was designed to protect and ensure health and safety in abortions.

The FOCA would negate all previous and future laws on the "interference on the right to abortion" – as if it is the same right as the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. These laws include reporting requirements for states and for minors, restrictions on late term abortions, restrictions on partial birth abortions, laws requiring counseling before an abortion and of course, laws protecting doctors who refuse to perform abortions for conscientious reasons. It could also use taxpayer dollars to fund abortions, when only around 10 percent of the population believes that such late-term abortions or similar should be legal.

According to Planned Parenthood, the FOCA would "prohibit state and federal entities from denying or interfering with a woman's right to choose to bear a child."

This is entirely worrisome and troubling. This isn't a matter of making something completely illegal to legal. It is making something that is already widespread and available to everyone and making it even more radically widespread to the point that there are no limitations at all. The fact that it will get rid of every previous and future law that has to do with any "restrictions," when they are really "protections," is short-sighted, to say the least.

Even on other widespread scales it would result in crushing blows. Passing the FOCA would get rid of the laws which protect Catholic and other religious hospitals (which mainly provide care for poor and uninsured) to refuse abortions as it goes against their morality. With this passing, it would potentially make these hospitals legally obligated to perform abortions. But, seeing as that would never happen, it would essentially force all these hospitals to close down. This would result in the loss of thousands of places which give health care to the needy because of something entirely irrelevant.

The Freedom of Choice Act is irrational and reckless. It would get rid of every law which was designed to protect and ensure health and safety in abortions. It would go against the beliefs of nearly every American – while using taxpayer dollars for abortions. It could potentially shut down thousands of hospitals which give care to the needy because of faulty conscience clauses which can be easily reinterpreted. And it is essentially advocating free-reign abortions at any moment during a pregnancy.

It is a radical and nonsensical idea presented by people who believe themselves to be more enlightened than everyone else, all the while not caring about the many negative consequences. It is something that goes far beyond just "codifying Roe v. Wade." It seems to be more about forcing people to accept every form of abortion than it actually is about protecting a woman's right to choose. Because they already have the right to choose, unless they feel the need to wait seven months to make it.

For handicapped, UMass is a challenge

Matt Kushi

We here at the University of Massachusetts don't know how lucky we are with the fact that we are granted the freedom to choose what we wish with our lives.

I'd be slightly miffed at that. This applies not only for the gym but classrooms as well. Some classrooms are nearly impossible to get into due to lack of accessibility. For a student, that could be a deciding factor of whether they want to come to school here or not.

We are encouraging kids to come to UMass for a great education but denying them that chance by making it so that classrooms are not fully accessible.

One flaw that could be corrected – given the proper resources – is the lack of accessibility on campus.

While some measures have been taken to make the campus more accessible, such as updating elevator systems in some buildings, there is still plenty of room for improvements.

You may ask why I think accessibility is an issue that needs to resolved. Let me answer that in two parts.

First of all, as a country, we seem to work along a formula for success that goes somewhere along the lines of speed plus efficiency equals productivity. In this case, accessibility for everyone would lead to great productivity within the university environment.

Students look at college as a place where they can have fun and get a good education. These factors are the leading attributes in making the college decision. However, when looking at colleges, appearance and function also have a large impact.

Now if you were a student visiting UMass and you were in a wheelchair, you may look at things differently than a common student. You wouldn't have the option of taking the stairs, so elevators are your best friend.

Say you wanted to go the intramural office in Boyden Gymnasium. How do you get to that second floor? The only way to access the building is by going up the stairs. Once you make it into the building, the only way from floor to floor via elevator is by way of the freight elevator.

It's one of the main problems at UMass: the elevators. We have all read horror stories of the elevators in the library going haywire, but that is only the surface of the problem.

While UMass has learned to maintain its elevators to an extent, as most new buildings have good elevators, the old buildings are left in the dark. Boyden has a freight elevator but not a convenient regular elevator. The Morrill Science buildings and Bartlett Hall have elevators that look like they have been around since Bob Dylan was in his prime.

That is not acceptable.

What I propose is, once the University budget is able to allow it, that elevators in old buildings be updated. Let the money go to something that is needed. While the addition of bigger signs on campus was neat, it wasn't direly necessary. Updating modes of transportation to make others' lives easier and the University more efficient is.

Yet another proposal that I have is to make walkways more wheelchair accessible. I have one incident in mind in particular that struck me on this matter.

When I was at orientation in the summer of 2006, I was standing in front of Hampshire Dining Commons with my group on the last day of orientation when the grandparents of a student tried to join their grandson. One of the grandparents was in a wheelchair. They soon discovered that the quickest way from the Southwest horseshoe to the front side of the DC was only reachable by a steep stack of stairs.

They had to have a counselor show them a roundabout route that involved either going to the south side of Hampden where there was a ramp present or going around the bike path to make it to the DC.

That is also not acceptable. It is my belief that a ramp should be built there, in some manner, to make it more accessible.

At UMass, it is time to change some of these small things. By making accessibility harder for people, we are discouraging the education that we are trying to encourage for everyone.

We are encouraging kids to come to UMass for a great education but denying them that chance by making it so that classrooms are not fully accessible. Thus, the process becomes counter-productive.

Let's stop defeating ourselves and make the campus what it should be: an efficient and productive engine for the nation in all aspects.

Sex, roll stepping and the tuba line

BY TED ROGERS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Pity the University of Massachusetts Marching Band. UMass is home to about 400 band members, also called "bandos" (band geek is so passé). The UMass Marching Band is one of the biggest student groups here, and has won the prestigious Sudler trophy – literally the highest award a collegiate marching band can get. And yet, they're lucky to get 15 minutes of fame at halftime. This is a story about the tuba players.

What separates the tuba section from the rest of the band? Maybe it's their energy. It would certainly be a factor, considering they carry a 22-foot, 55-pound brass coil that culminates in a two-foot bell above their heads. Maybe it's the enthusiasm they put out. It could just be the quirky personality shared by all of them. At any rate, there is one very specific day where it shows the most: Drag Day.

"You picked a hell of a day to come," said Aaron Staluppi, a junior music major at UMass.

He was right. I came to watch the section's Drag Day. As Staluppi, a big kid from Jersey, will tell you, "Basically, Drag Day was sort of invented by the tubas to get the band's morale up during season. It's when the tubas, at the morning of homecoming, practice dressed up in women's clothing…the girls do their own thing." He continued, "My freshman year, I wasn't too sold on the idea as much as others. I don't know about you, but I'm not dying to put on a dress and gallivant around."

The boys of the tuba section retreated to the upstairs of the Grinell building to the room that the tuba players call home. I had no real desire to follow. I talked to the girls who were in agreement. They were dressed as lumberjacks.

After five minutes of crashes, thuds and yells, the boys reemerged from the tuba room. Some looked like tasteful hookers, while others were wearing sports bras and booty shorts. Mark Zaiger, a senior sports management major, was wearing a Snow White costume he had bought from Ebay for a dollar, while Staluppi had a muumuu on with an Indian print pattern. They were awful. They were awesome. The section leader, senior English major John McCarthy, yelled "Tail on!" and the tubas followed their chief out the door to the soccer fields with Justin Timberlake's "Sexy Back" thumping in the background.

The tuba tail is a glorified game of "follow the leader." If the section leader balances his tuba on his right shoulder and keeps walking, you balance your tuba on your right shoulder and keep following. If he stops walking, you stop walking. If he walks past an older woman and lustily yells, "Hey baby!" well, you get the idea.

'Incredibad' is mix of satire

COURTESY SNL

The Lonely Island is a group of comedians that performs on Saturday Night Live and has an album.

BY HALEY NAVARRO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Feb. 10, The Lonely Island, a group of comedians who also work for Saturday Night Live, released their comedy album, "Incredibad." Brought to fame by SNL Digital Shorts such as "Lazy Sunday," "D*ck in a Box," "J*zz in My Pants," and most recently, "I'm On a Boat," The Lonely Island is made up of Andy Samberg, Akiva Schaffer and Jorma Taccone, who all act or write for Saturday Night Live.

For the most part, "Incredibad" is a satire of a rap album, but there are some "club songs" and interludes. The album also includes a track of "Natalie's Rap" when Natalie Portman guest starred on SNL. Before "Incredibad," "Natalie's Rap" was never released anedited. All-star guests (E-40, T-Pain, Norah Jones, Justin Timberlake) take the record's comedy to a level previously established by other acts such as Flight of the Conchords.

"I'm On a Boat" is the latest single from "Incredibad," its Digital Short airing on SNL on Feb. 7. The video features Samberg, Schaffer and T-Pain on a luxury boat, presumably owned by Lorne Michaels, explaining how life on a boat compares to that on land. To illustrate their situation, they tell their audience "I'm on a boat and/It's going fast and/I've got a nautical-themed pashmina afghan" and "Never thought I'd be on a boat/It's a big, blue watery road."

Sung about on many of the songs, Santana DVX is the drink of choice for the Lonely Island. Distributed by the Mumm Napa winery, this little-known champagne is showcased by the comedy trio. The second song on the album, titled after the same name of the champagne, is

Comedian generates big laughs

Kubinek pleases unsure audience at the FAC

BY MICHELLE FREDETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tomás Kubinek took the stage as an unsure audience looked on at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Friday night. He hobbled carefully into the spotlight, mumbling to himself. The audience, full of people ranging from ages two to 85, waited patiently to see just what the fuss was about.

Kubinek was dressed in a worn grayish suit, reminiscent of vaudevillian performers. He shuffled along in scuffed shoes, suspenders and a coat with tails.

As he got settled on stage – set up with a coat rack, folding chair and card table – it became clear that Kubinek didn't need to rely on words to be funny. He lit match after match, trying to light the candle on his table, only to have them blow out before reaching their destination. When he finally did light one, a sneeze escaped him and blew the candle out once again.

The comedian proceeded to cluck like a chicken while one egg after another appeared from his mouth. After running out of pockets to put them in, Kubinek produced an egg carton from inside his jacket. Kubinek could have performed his entire show mumbling and would have received laughs all night.

However, Kubinek's performance Friday was much more than simple gags. He mixed storytelling, music, acrobatics and magic to create one and a half hour long show.

Certain elements of the show were clearly a regular part of Kubinek's act. These parts were particularly over the top, requiring great skill and bravado. One such part was Kubinek's "invention" – two devices meant to be worn around the legs, each with two shoes on it. Each device buckled around the wearer's calves, and makes one appear to have six shoes. With these devices on, Kubinek at first stumbled around before beginning the surprisingly graceful "Dance of the Six Shoes."

Other staples included flying around the stage attached to a harness while donning makeshift wings; and doing a backward somersault while balancing a glass of wine on his forehead, playing the ukulele and whistling.

The tricks were impressive enough on their own, but Kubinek hammed them up. After lifting the wine glass off his forehead (which Kubinek dubbed "so big it's actually a fivehead") with his knees and placing it on the floor, Kubinek turned his head to the audience and said, "Life is so difficult."

Tomás Kubinek performed at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Friday night before a crowd of mixed ages. Kubinek was a big hit mixing simple gags with storytelling, music, acrobatics and magic.

The audience clapped enthusiastically after every feat, but Kubinek feigned disappointment. "I was expecting a standing ovation," he said.

After his flying bout, Kubinek took praising his act into his own hands, surreptitiously tossing fake bouquets of roses onto the stage. He would drop one bouquet each time he picked up another, making it seem as though more and more were being tossed on stage in appreciation of his greatness.

As fun to watch as Kubinek's well-rehearsed tricks were, the most entertaining part of the show was what wasn't planned. Kubinek's improvisation skills are tremendous, and his interactions with audience members were hilarious.

To the first row he asked, "Enjoying the show? Do your necks hurt?" He moved to the edge of the stage. "What if I stand here? Are you looking up my nose? Maybe not the best seats in the house."

Kubinek then climbed off the stage onto the concrete partitions between rows. "I'm now coming into the audience among you," he said. "Remain calm. Do not make direct eye contact with me."

When a child in the audience repeatedly said, "I'm scared. I'm scared," about Kubinek's climbing about, Kubinek mocked him in a high-pitched whiny voice. Making fun of children became a running joke throughout the show, with Kubinek threatening to check IDs and kick anyone under the age of 18 out.

Towards the end of the show Kubinek announced he was going to saw himself in half, but then decided he would simply play the saw instead. One child's applause kept interrupting him, until he said, "Shhh, or we'll have to cut them [the child's hands] off."

The combination of rehearsed magic, vaudevillian comedy, music and acrobatic tricks with comic improvisation and involvement of the audience made for a show that was hilarious, shocking and inspiring all at once.

Anything but 'Common'

BY NORA DRAPALSKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

For their fifth and newest full-length album, "Common Existence," Thursday embraced a return to their roots as a post-hardcore band. The record follows a slow transformation from a chaotic mess in the first track to a stylized, indie-influenced hit by the album's conclusion. Each track promises something different to the listener and begs for Thursday to be reevaluated as one of the most original post-hardcore rock bands of their generation.

"Resuscitation Of A Dead Man" starts off the album, immediately providing an accurate preview of what is to come. Lyrics like "ambulance, bring me back to the place where I was born" and "breathe in, breathe out" sum up the song quite nicely. If anything, the audience needs to be resuscitated after listening to three minutes and 22 seconds of nasally yelling intermittently dissected by an attempt to sing that leaves one wishing for the screaming to continue. Fortunately, "Resuscitation" is followed by a track that renews hope in the listener that their money was well spent on this new CD.

The second track, "Last Call," switches gears, transitioning to a softer, but by no means quiet, sound. Lead singer, Geoff Rickly, belts lyrics that sound as though they were ripped straight from his heart. "Last Call" inspires one to sing along with Rickly as the drums hammer in the background, immersing the listener in a head-throbbing, emotional overload that begs for release.

Unfortunately, the dramatic energy falls with the following track, "As He Climbed The Dark Mountain." Simply said, the most original thing about this track is its name. The sound is reminiscent of 30 Seconds to Mars, an unexpected and unwanted resemblance for Thursday fans. The three-minute-long track does not allow enough time for the audience to adjust to the change in mood, and ends before one can truly appreciate the sound. Without repeating it three times, it is impossible to remember this track as anything other than filler.

"Friends In The Armed Forces" jerks the record out of the depressing hole it was falling into, and wrenches it back into the hardcore rock that fans desperately seek. A political, critical work that questions collective actions, "Friends" is possibly the most powerful track on the album. After one listen through "Common Existence," this proves to be the one track that showcases the band at its absolute best.

Following "Friends" is "Beyond The Visible Spectrum," which continues the transition to experimental, indie-influence rock with gut-wrenching lyrics. The song keeps the album moving effortlessly, and attracts new fans in the process while not losing their edge.

Track six, "Time's Arrow," strikes out of left field, an experimental song unlike any other on the album. It is so out of place with the rest of the album that it is difficult to believe that Thursday really wrote and performed this song. No semblance of hardcore rock can be found in the instrumental-intensive power of "Time's Arrow." Without a doubt, the must-hear song on the album that proves to disbelievers that Thursday is a multi-talented force, not a one-hit-wonder band.

Jolting away from the previous track is "Unintended Long Term Effects," which can only be described as a traditional, hardcore rock song that is easily forgettable in the variety of sounds found on this album.

Like "Dark Mountain," "Circuits of Fever" consists of a vocal masterpiece shattered by rage-driven yells that are overwhelming in their intensity. Enjoyable, and certainly a positive note on "Common Existence," "Circuits" is one reason why Thursday demands respect as a long-lasting, influential rock band that has lasted for over a decade.

"Suhway Funeral" is a filler song in every meaning of the phrase, lacking an original beat, sound or message. Skip over this track, lest you waste your time and lose your current interest in Thursday.

Finally, a song anyone can listen to and love. "Love Has Led Us Astray" harkens back to the late 1990s with the enthusiasm found in modern rock. Over four minutes of label-breaking beauty that captures Thursday's latest attempt to shatter the expectations of them. "Love Has Led Us Astray" is the reason why Thursday has survived for so long and why this album should be on your "to buy list."

"Common Existence" ends on an expressive track that says everything you want to say. "You Were The Cancer" is a conflicting mix of screamo and indie-rock that wraps up the album nicely, but doesn't make you frantically press the repeat button to hear it again.

Overall, "Common Existence" is a surprising and unusual mix of tracks that welcomes Thursday wholeheartedly into 2009. Whether you love indie-rock or heavy metal, "Common Existence" contains something that you are guaranteed to enjoy. Thursday definitely satisfies old fans with a new twist on music, while gaining new fans who appreciate the diversity of their songs.

Lonely Island enlists T-Pain, Timberlake

mainly about the trio trying to inform people about the drink. They rap, "From the heart of Napa Valley and the guitar king/Comes the sparkling wine to make a blind man sing," and "I feel alive for the first time/Each sip hits my lips like a landmine/Without Carlos in my life/I was living a lie." Bay Area rapper E-40 accompanies the comedians on the track, adding to the spoken word interludes playing the part of Santana and lending a verse to re-iterate the point.

The title track off the album, "Incredibad," chronicles the beginnings of the Lonely Island. They rap about how in junior high school, an alien lands in Schaffer's backyard and asks them to further their kind by reproducing with him. In return, he grants them one wish, and they ask him if they can be the "greatest fake MC's on Earth." The alien also describes the incident as "Incredible" and "bad," hence the name of the CD and the cover art (three human hands and one alien hand touching).

Last year's surprise hit, "Jizz in My Pants," is a mock dancehall song that chronicles two guys who get a little too excited around girls. It shot to the number one most viewed video on YouTube after airing on television. With cameos from Timberlake, Jamie-Lynn Sigler and Molly Sims, the video is shot exactly as a techno video should be: in a club and a grocery store.

In addition to the album itself, "Incredibad" also includes a DVD of all the videos that premiered on SNL. Compared to other comedians who have made similar ventures, the Lonely Island has a great advantage because of the prime-time slot where they can display their work. Their songs are cleanly produced and sound very realistic for a mock album. Though it's not something one would listen to on a daily basis, the album serves as a lighter, intermittent listening suggestion.

Once the tuba line reached the field where the rest of the bandos were congregating, the real purpose of drag day became clear. It wasn't to boost the morale of the band members as much as to gross them out.

"Okay, everybody, " John said to the huddled tuba players, "the band is eating breakfast. Let's make 'em lose it!"

The tuba players spread out. Ray and Evan started to dance on the director's podium to the catcalls of the drummers. Others ran to the bandos eating their bagels. "It's like watching a train wreck," one clarinet player said.

Once instrumental warm ups started, however, the tuba line was all business. Putting warm air through their instruments, practicing the measures where work was needed, the section didn't resemble a motley crew of class clowns as much as a well-oiled machine.

A short practice followed. For 20 people to march in perfect precision while carrying an instrument weighing up to a third of a person is impressive by any standards. To do it while wearing a sports bra and booty shorts? That's dedication.

After practice, John gave critiques. He thought they could have done a little better.

"Until we look like the UMass marching band," he admonished, "we look like jerks in gross clothes." He later confided that they had done pretty well. "They're tired. Who wouldn't be after three days of concerts?" he said, referring to the Multibands Festival they had been busy performing at since Thursday. "They did great."

When I left, they had an hour to eat lunch, change into uniform, and step off in time for the UMass homecoming game.

Band Camp

"Come prepared for band camp, but leave your dignity at home." – Old tuba player adage

"It's an experience like no other," said Hannah Hastings, a junior legal studies major, on the subject of band camp. "It's one of the stupidest, most inhumane things you can put yourself through. I got through my first band camp because I was too tired. I was too tired to go to John's room and say I needed to leave. I was too tired to go up to Mr. Parks and say, "Hey, this is too much. I quit. And," she allows herself a smile, "here I am today."

Why would anyone do band camp? The reasons vary. Some had parents that wanted them to pick up an activity. Others were converted when they met the section leaders. One rookie simply said, "It looked like fun."

A day of band camp consists of waking up at 6:30 a.m., quickly eating breakfast and gathering music, and then going down to the school's soccer fields for warm ups by 8 a.m. The rest of the day is spent practicing drill and playing music, with breaks for lunch and dinner. By the time the tuba players deposit their horns back at Grinell and get to the dorms, it's usually well past midnight.

Learning the steps of marching band goes like this: You place one poker chip where you start the routine. You place another where you end up several measures later. You will then practice marching to the beat of the music until everything is perfect. If you don't play the music right, or if you aren't marching in time, God have mercy on your soul. Mr. Parks, the dynamo band director, will make the band practice these steps until everything is up to his standards of excellence. Once the process is complete, you pick up your first chip, and put it where you will end up a couple measures after that. March, play and repeat.

After a week of this, the first football game of the season takes place at McGuirk stadium. With a little help from aspirin and a goofy, can-do attitude, the tuba line is ready to perform their first halftime show.

The tuba section of the UMass marching band is known for its energy, especially on what they call "drag day" where all of the male tuba players dress in women's clothing to get the band's morale up.

Football games

When most people think of marching bands, they think of the halftime show. The 15 minutes between second and third quarter where fans get to stretch, grab a hot dog, take a piss and maybe watch the band play some Stevie Wonder tunes while turning and twisting like a school of musical fish.

For bandos, however, it's time to show off. They practice in burning heat, freezing rain, and every element of weather in between, so they'll be damned if only part of the crowd is really watching.

You can instantly pick out the tuba players. It's not just the two-foot bells hovering above their heads. They're the only ones wearing berets instead of high plastic hats. They have sunglasses. And of course, there's the energy they put out. They gallop onto the gridiron with enthusiasm that few could hope to match. Without the low bass of the tubas pumping energy into the ensemble, the band might as well be dead on arrival.

The tubas occupy an odd hierarchy in the band. Trumpet players and drummers tend to have "type A" personalities. Clarinet players are generally tightly wound. The tubas, well, the tuba players are tuba players.

"If I had to describe the tuba players in three words?" said Stephanie Vinci, a junior music major and a euphonium player, "They'd be united, enthusiastic and," putting a little extra emphasis on the last word, "special."

Playing the tuba while marching presents a few challenges. The only bright side is that, generally speaking, tuba music is pretty simple. Being the bass means putting out slow, deep riffs for the rest of the band to play over.

After every game, the band does a second show. Lovingly called the fifth quarter, this is a chance to play through all the tunes the band has worked on. The show always ends in the same fashion. Huddled close together, the band does a tune that carries a great deal of weight for the group: "Frank Sinatra's My Way."

Traditions

Like any group worth its salt, the tuba line has its fair share of customs handed down from one generation to the next. Some are practical, others are more whimsical in nature.

While they seem like bizarre fashion choices at first glance, the berets and shades are actually entirely practical. The standard shako hat worn by the rest of the band would constantly be knocked off by the horn's bell. Berets solve the problem. The sunglasses are used to keep the sun from being reflected from the bell into the player's eyes. But don't tell that to anyone.

The sunglasses are there because they're cool. At the end of every band camp, the section leader passes out a new style of sunglasses. They are part of the uniform, never to be taken off. The tuba line receives them with the solemnity of a First Communion.

Other traditions are there because it's a chance to push the envelope. Hence drag day. There's toga day and then there's the themed Halloween costumes. Why do the tuba players take third quarter off to stand next to the cheerleaders and imitate them? Because they can.

"One of our biggest traditions actually has a funny story behind it," said McCarthy. Talkative and unshakably friendly, he admitted, "When our section was run by a less wholesome element, the section leaders were too drunk to march along with the rest of the band in parade formation. That's how the tuba tail got started. Now we spend the first two days of band camp practicing it."

Random events

The marching band isn't just an accoutrement to the football games. Like any other vanguard of university pride, the season includes exhibitions and away games. Because no hotel can house almost 400 bandos, trips mean the band sleeps on the buses or high school gymnasium floors.

There have been four-day bus rides to Indiana to participate in one of the few national marching band competitions, Bands of America. There was a trip in 2006 to play at a Canadian football game in Montreal.

The event that is most widely known, however, is Allentown. Every year, more than a dozen collegiate marching bands descend on the small town in Pennsylvania to show off their moves.

"I'm going to remember this as long as I live." McCarthy said. "The weather at Allentown was terrible this year, just rainy and crappy. Everybody was in a bad mood during warm ups. I said, 'Alright guys, just play through the show. Play it like you mean it,' and they started playing. Pretty soon, the rest of the band joined in." He smiled, "It was just this big, impromptu jam session in the rain. There aren't words to describe it."

Practice

Practice for marching band takes place every weekday, from 4:40 p.m. to 6:20 p.m. The tuba players meet at Grinell, a shabby building in the southeast corner of campus that used to be a slaughterhouse.

The tuba players get to the practice fields early. McCarthy, Staluppi and Phil Southworth, the field staff, have the rest of the players go over music that needs work. From there, they join the rest of the band in practicing whatever Mr. Parks wants to work on.

It's here that you see the people behind the tubas. Three people in line will try to stifle giggles as one tells a dirty joke. John will step out and look at the line as they march, with a face somewhere between caution and pride. Courtney Beard, a senior English major and band manager, will grab a flute and pretend to vamp out a Stevie Wonder solo.

It was the final practice of the season. Stars were twinkling in the sky and the moon was shining. It was so cold that the tuba's valves were beginning to freeze. The line's lips cracked like parchment when they touched the mouthpieces. And yet, despite their bleeding lips and frozen horns, their aching feet and wandering minds, maybe even because of it, they were smiling. They were among family.

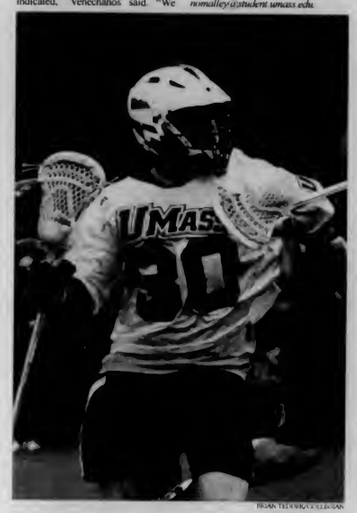
they scored three-straight goals," Venechanos said.

Down 6-3 at the half, the Minutewomen came out of halftime with guns blazing, notching three goals (two from Merritt and one from Drown) in the first seven minutes of the half. The two teams then traded goals to tie it up 7-7.

The draw would be as close as UMass would get for the rest of the game as Holy Cross broke the tie with just over 17 minutes left and added three more goals in the last six minutes.

Despite the ending, Verechanos felt that her team performed well but simply did not execute when the opportunities arose while the Crusaders did.



"We had the opportunities, but we didn't shoot the ball too well. But the team was a lot closer than the score indicated," Venechanos said. "We came towards the end of the game and pressured the ball and tried to gather the team a little bit."

Verechanos cited a lack of fight in the draw circle and inability to grab ground balls as major contributors to Holy Cross's success as they allowed the opponent to control the ball for much of the game.

She then praised her young defense for performing well despite the transition issue. Led by senior Jackie Rosenzweig, the defense allowed the Minutewomen to get back into the game twice but could not hold up down the stretch against the late Crusader surge.

"I thought our younger players played very well," Verechanos said. "We just need some other leaders on our team who've done it before to step up so that the freshman and the young non-starters can get in as well."

on close defense and our pole situation is pretty solid as well."

The Minutemen's defense is a young group – all but two are freshmen or sophomores, but with experience from Godoi and leadership from senior Brennan Mack, UMass' defense shouldn't have a problem filling in those holes.

Godoi, a redshirt junior, led the team in caused turnovers last season with 17.

Goalkeepers are the backbone of the defense, and with an honorable mention preseason All-American leading the way in Schneider, the Minutemen should have a successful season. Schneider helped lead UMass to the National Championship game as a freshman in 2006. In his career, he has a 59.6 save percentage and an 8.16 goals-against average.

Mael Walkowiak, a sophomore transfer from Queens University, will back up Schneider. Last season, Tim McCormack had the position, but he is expected to redshirt this season.

Walkowiak plays a different style than Schneider in that he plays more aggressively, comes out of the goal more often and energizes the team in a different way than Schneider. But Canella and the rest of the team have confidence in Walkowiak's abilities in goal.

Midfielders

UMass' midfield sees the return of redshirt senior Rory Pedrick, who sat out last season with a knee injury. In Pedrick's career he has tallied 23 goals and 29 assists.

"He's another guy that brings a wealth of talent and great experience out there on the field. So even at 85 or 90 percent he's as good as the other guys," Canella said.

Junior Bobby Hayes, a returning starter from the 2008 season, brings versatility to the lineup. As a freshman, Hayes was the go-to player for faceoffs, but as a sophomore, he contributed more on the field – tallying six goals and 11 assists.

"He's an outstanding player. He's a two-way guy, he can play offense and he can play defense," Canella said. "He brings so much to the table. He's a really good leader, leads by example. He's been our most consistent midfielder throughout the last couple years."

Other notable midfielders that will contribute to the team include redshirt senior Evan Blum, sophomore Ryan Hantverk and sophomore Ryan Marcus.

Attackers

The Minutemen's attack is the one unknown for the team, but after a 15-6 win over Sacred Heart on Feb. 14 in their season opener, they look to be more prepared than expected.

"[Attack] is the one question mark. Not that we don't feel comfortable putting those guys out there, but it's an unknown," Canella said.

Balise and senior Jim Connolly are expected to lead UMass' offense this season. Balise led the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference in goals last season, including 10 multi-goal games, while Connolly returns after missing the 2008 season due to suspension.

"[Connolly] is a finisher. With a team that has struggled to score goals hopefully he can help us in that regard. He's done a good job so far," UMass coach Greg Canella said. "It's sort of been seamless for him coming back. He's worked very hard in the off season to make sure that he was able to brush the dust off in the first couple days of practice here and he's done that.

"He's an excellent ball player, and he didn't lose any of that. Now it's a matter of getting to know the new teammates and playing with the old teammates and making sure he has a good year, and I'm sure he will."

Sophomore Zach Rogers led the team in assists last season (nine goals, 18 assists), but some people may view him as less aggressive. Canella looks to Rogers to work harder and become more of a dual threat on offense this season.

Faceoffs

Joe Reale will remain the main faceoff player for the Minutemen, winning faceoffs are an important aspect of their game because they like to take more shots – the more possessions they have off of the faceoff will increase the number of shot attempts they can get.

Last season, Reale won 86-of-176 faceoffs, just under 50 percent.

"Joe is just a great kid. He's a year older, he's done a great job to improve his skills," Canella said. "He's got something special inside of him. He's never going to give up on you; he's never going to quit."

Tough road for UM

M. LAX from page 10

UMass' schedule is about to get more difficult – a lot more difficult. Just take a look at the road the Minutemen will have to take during the regular season: No. 2 Syracuse, No. 8 Georgetown, No. 13 Albany, No. 14 Hofstra, No. 15 Brown and No. 16 Loyola, among others.

That's just not easy.

"It's a great schedule, like it is every year. I think it's the 14th or 15th toughest in the country right now – but you never know how that's going to turn out," Cannella said. "There isn't a game that we can't win or a game that we can't lose. It's so competitive right now at the Division I level and within the top 40 teams that anyone can beat anyone in my opinion."

Cannella also knows that his team can beat anyone with goalkeeper Doc Schneider anchoring the team. Now in his senior season, Schneider has still not only kept the origin of his nickname secret, but he still somehow gets overlooked as one of the premier goalies in the country.

He is. And UMass can stay in any game and compete with any team in the nation because of it.

"Doc is the backbone of the defense. The [defense] feels that if they make a mistake, that he's going to back them up," Cannella said. "Off the field he's a super leader – a vocal leader – a guy that sometimes we have to calm down a little bit because he gets too amped up. He's matured a ton over the years, and he's invaluable to the success of the group."

The group in front of Schneider is led by junior defender Diogo Godoi, a preseason all-conference selection. Godoi is a big, strong defender, who will draw the responsibility of covering the best each opponent has to offer. He'll not only be up for it, but he'll more than hold his own.

Cannella likes the options he has on defense, but is a little concerned about the depth on offense behind star attack Jim Connolly – who returns after being suspended for 2008 – and Tim Balise, last year's leading goal-scorer (33) in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference.

Having last year's freshman phenom Peter McNichols (17 goals, eight assists) back would certainly help, but that's not an option. He's academically ineligible. But Cannella brought in a number of talented freshmen to help fill the void.

"Guys like Steve D'Amario, Art Kell and Mike Fetterly have done a nice job for us – but it's hard for those guys to jump in right away and be impact players, but hopefully they can come in and chip in and do their part," Cannella said.

UMass also has sophomore Zach Rogers (team-high 18 assists last year) in the mix at attack. While Cannella feels comfortable putting all those guys out there, he stressed the need for one of them to really step up to compliment Connolly and Balise. That may be the biggest – and most important – question facing Cannella and his team right now.

Connolly, who scored 51 goals in his first two years at UMass from 2006-07, is not the only one making an important and intriguing return to the field this year. Midfielder Ryan Marcus also comes back following the suspension; he made an immediate impact scoring two goals against Sacred Heart. And after missing all of last year with a knee injury, senior midfielder Rory Pedrick – who also scored two goals vs. the Pioneers – leads a group of talented midfielders along with junior Bobby Hayes.

With Schneider in goal, the return of Connolly, Pedrick and Marcus to the lineup, Godoi leading the defense and Balise the offense – the 2009 Minutemen have the talent, leadership and depth to become the talk of the town for all the right reasons again.

of top A-10 times. Going into the A-10 Championship, Narus leads all 200-butterfly and 200-freestyle racers with the respective 2 minute, 3.4 second (butterfly) and 1:51.77 (freestyle) finishes that helped bring home a top three Terrier Invitational finish for UMass. Downing's performances this week will determine whether she'll continue to own her current top 1650-freestyle spot of 17:13.45.

Narus' fellow senior captain, Karen Upperco, currently leads A-10 divers in the three-meter event with a score of 310.50.

For the Minutemen, this week's events could add to a rich history of success. At last year's A-10 finals, R.J. Rappe brought home Most Outstanding Diver honors, while Evan Swisher became the fourth UMass Most Outstanding Performer winner a year prior.

This year the Minutewomen come in loaded once again. On Monday Feb. 16, reigning A-10 Coach of the Year Russ Yarworth announced lineups for two of tonight's opening events. Headlining the 800-free will be senior captain Nate Bromage, who has notched over five first-place finishes thus far and been a consistent performer in critical legs of various relay combinations. In a lineup speaking to UMass' depth, Bromage will be joined in the 800 tonight by senior Tristan Patridge, sophomore Julian McKean and freshman standout Joey Shordon.

In an accompanying opening night event, Max Butler (backstroke), Brian Schmidt (breaststroke), Mike Berthaume (fly) and Juan Moliere (free) will swim the 200-yard medley relay.

Moliere, a junior sprint specialist, has been a steadfast 200-yard medley veteran at past A-10 tournaments. As a freshman in 2006, the Puerto Rico native anchored a first-place medley race, returning to and in crucial point-earning second- and third-place finishes during last year's ceremonies.

As the events progress throughout the week, Yarworth will be updating fans on his official UMass Aquatics Blog, where there's a telling image posted of the nine-time A-10 Coach of the Year Yarworth, his back turned from the camera and towards an empty pool, wearing a gray and maroon tank top that reads, simply: "Earn it."

A team disrespected

Curiously, word on the street is that this new 120,000 square foot, three-floor shrine to campus athletics being built across from the Mullins Center allegedly will not include any aquatics facilities. Again, no love for the best team in town.

Likewise, the swimmers are shoved to the back of the Collegian sports section after nearly every meet. It is in these very pages the winningest UMass athletes often find themselves outsourced by sports that are exponentially popular when it comes to reality and exponentially mediocre when it comes to results.

Still, without abandon, the best team in town works tirelessly in a sport that has substantially less scholarship money, a sky-high attrition rate and a tissue-thin media guide compared to the tomes given to the likes of Derek Kellogg and Don "Toot" Cahoon.

Speaking of which, what do coaches Kellogg and Cahoon have in common, aside from their respective troubles treading water above .500 this season? One fact is for certain: both have a long, long way to go to catch up with Yarworth on his ongoing date with destiny and career win-loss record of 240-68. Like his young protégés in the pool, Yarworth is, as sophomore psychology major Sami Simon, a diehard fan, likes to say, "made of win."

The 1978 graduate, a former UMass swimming and water polo legend himself, could capture three-peat Coach of the Year honors this week. That's in addition, mind you, to the other nine honors he's already racked up.

Meanwhile, the general American public only seems to acknowledge swimming's existence once every four years during the Olympics – aside from some naughty college student playing paparazzi and selling out a partying Michael Phelps.

For those students whose interest in swimming tops out at Phelps' shirtless Sports Illustrated covers, UMass' ceaseless victories might be the closest collegiate analogy to your fellow alleged pot smoker's recent Olympic dominance.

So here on campus, it's time to break out that one word respectfully reserved only for true and utter sports domination. It's a word you don't hear much around Amherst these days, unless folks are speaking in the past tense: dynasty.

Few other words can fully describe a team that has, at 10, literally run out of fingers to hold up in its championship photos.

Still, as everybody in the conference is gunning for the returning champions and arguably the greatest coach in UMass history at this week's A-10 championships, a few questions linger. What can the flailing big gun sports learn from the little guys behind this blue-collar dynasty? Why are the champs cramped into a tiny Hoyden gymnasium pool most people on campus don't even know exists?

Most importantly, where in that cozy crevice will the Minutemen find room to keep adding championship banners? According to the weird priorities of New Dirt, apparently not in the gigantic new recreation facility 50 feet away from the dynasty's current home turf.

There is, however, one place where there's plenty of room for additional UMass championship banners: over 9,000 empty seats in the Mullins Center after students get bored with their free T-shirts, Zamboni rides and 7-11 hockey team this weekend.

Gerardot not enough for UM

Minutewomen hope for unity in game at George Washington

Stefanie Gerardot drives past a Temple defender on her way to the hoop in UMass's win last week. Gerardot has had six 20-point games this year.

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

No matter how many points Stefanie Gerardot scores for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, the Minutewomen will need to play as a unit when they visit George Washington tonight at 7:30 p.m.

The game in the nation's capital will be UMass' (10-15, 3-7 Atlantic 10) second to last A-10 road game of the 2008-2009 campaign and is the 42nd all-time meeting between the two teams.

Gerardot posted her sixth 20-point game of the season on Saturday afternoon, leading all scorers with 28.

But it was not enough, as the defense allowed four Duquesne players to reach double figures in a 75-61 defeat at the Mullins Center.

"That really hurt us that no one else could step up and score, and we didn't get any help from Teya Wright inside," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

"For us to be successful, we need to have an inside-outside attack."

Despite a solid performance from senior guard Sakera Young (12 pts, six rebounds, five assists) and redshirt sophomore guard Diatienna Hill (eight points, eight assists), freshman forward Kristina Danella was 1-of-6 from 3-point range, while sophomore center Teya Wright shot 1-of-6 from the field and 1-of-4 from the free-throw line.

Danella and sophomore forward Cerie Mosgrove will need to find their groove from behind the arc, and the bench players taking some of the scoring pressure off Gerardot in order for UMass to be successful against GW.

"We've been working on communication back on defense and on screens in particular," Marnie Dacko said.

The defense for UMass has kept them in games when scoring has been down or when Gerardot has been the only one producing.

The Minutewomen will have their hands full against a big Colonial team centered on senior Jessica Adair, who leads the team in scoring (13 points per game) and rebounding (7.3 rebounds per game).

Last season, GW had a successful season, going 27-7 overall and 12-2 within the A-10. The team also advanced to the third round of the NCAA tournament and were No. 14 in the final poll of the season.

After a successful January in which they won six-straight games, the Colonials have dropped two of their past four games to Richmond and Xavier.

GW has played its A-10 opponents closely with eight of its 10 games being decided by 10 points or fewer, and four have been decided by three points or fewer.

Along with Adair, forward Amelia Parrish also is averaging in double figures with 11 points this season.

"We're going to have to be able to battle them on the boards, and we can't be afraid of them," Dacko said.

Including Adair and Parrish, the Colonials have six other players taller than six-feet and are fourth in the A-10 with a rebounding margin of plus 3.5.

GW is also strong defensively, leading the A-10 in blocked shots with over four blocked shots per game.

"It's going to be extremely competitive because they're big inside," Dacko said.

The Minutewomen were out rebounded 43-26, and went on to lose mightily, 69-45 to the Colonials back on Feb. 13 of last year at the Mullins Center.

GW blew open a nine-point game at halftime with an 11-0 run that led to the 24-point victory for the Colonials. Senior Kate Mills led the Minutewomen in scoring with 17 points and added six rebounds, with Wright adding a team high 10 rebounds and eight points.

Hope for victory in return to Boston

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

On Feb. 10, the Massachusetts women's tennis team lost its perfect season with a loss against Boston University. The first loss of the season wasn't particularly hard to swallow, considering it came at the hands of last year's America East Champions.

Five days later, the Minutewomen returned to form with a win against Albany. On Wednesday, UMass (4-1) travels to Boston again for a match against Boston College.

The Eagles' (3-1) schedule has been easy as of late, coming off victories against Buffalo, Brown and Dartmouth. The three-game win streak will be difficult to extend against UMass, as the Minutewomen continue to solidify.

Freshman Magdalena Ploch, UMass' number one slotted player the previous two matches, is red-hot. Her singles match was one of the few bright spots for UMass last week at BU when she rallied from behind to defeat Francine Whu, last year's America East Player of the Year. Ploch's efforts have not gone unnoticed as she received Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors. The following day, Ploch was the recipient of the UMass/Dinn Bros. Athlete of the Week award. Ploch's ability to strike hard makes her back-court game very effective, which separates her from the rest of the field. UMass Coach Judy Dixon knows thus all too well.

"She really likes to pound the ball from the backcourt with both the forehand and backhand, and she has a serve that can out and out win the point with one strike," Dixon said.

The freshman from Germany improved to 10-2 in her rookie year, holding a 5-1 record for singles and doubles. Her probable opponent against BC is senior Lana Krasnopolsky.

BC's latest victory over Dartmouth showed its roster's depth. Numbers two through six all won the singles matches, and the number two and three doubles teams won their matches. The doubles matchup today will be very interesting, recognizing UMass' and BC's undefeated doubles records. Like Boston College, UMass' season thus far has shown the roster's depth. Players one through six all have winning records in singles, and they are not looking to end the trend.

The Minutewomen's current number two player, Candynce Boney, is regaining her confidence in singles play after defeating Albany's Kim Weltman, 6-2, 3-6, 6-2. Boney's doubles record is still flawless at 5-0, as she and partner Maude Lecluyse defeated Albany's number one team, 8-2. This UMass duo seem unbeatable; their victory over BU's number one team was another one of those few bright spots last week. Boney and Lecluyse will remain at the number one doubles position against BC.

Maude Lecluyse, the number three player for the Minutewomen, looks to further dominate the number three position after defeating Albany's Charlotte Tatler, 6-4, 0-6, 6-4. Considered one of the team's workhorses, Lecluyse is best known for her success in doubles.

On paper, today's match-up represents one of the most competitive matches for the Minutewomen this season, as both teams look to strengthen their one-loss records.

Xavier stumbles to No. 16

No. 25 Dayton tied in first after upset over Muskateers

On Feb. 2, Xavier was 19-2, ranked sixth in the nation and appeared to be running away with an Atlantic 10 regular season title.

Not so fast.

Since then, the Musketeers have gone 2-2 and as a result dropped to No. 16. The fall of Xavier (21-4, 9-2 A-10) started on Feb. 7 when it lost to Duquesne, 72-68, in a major upset. Four days later, the Musketeers had to travel to Dayton in a battle for first place in the Atlantic 10.

A-10 Basketball

Xavier was coming off a tough loss to a lesser opponent and was trying to get back on track by holding onto its lead atop the A-10. However, Dayton (23-3, 9-2 A-10) had other plans. The Flyers had also lost their previous matchup against Charlotte, but Dayton controlled the entire game and did not trail once. Chris Wright led the way with 19 points and six rebounds. Xavier's Derrick Brown led the Musketeers with 19 points and four assists, but it was not enough to stop Dayton. As a result, the Flyers got the win in convincing fashion, 71-58.

The Musketeers now share the spot atop the A-10 standings with rival Dayton. Both teams will be looking to gain sole possession of first place in the final weeks of the regular season. March 5 will be an important night for both teams as Dayton has another meeting with Xavier – this time on the road. The matchup could very well decide who finishes the season atop the A-10.

Nationally known

For the first time this season an Atlantic 10 team, other than Xavier, is ranked in the Top 25 poll.

Dayton was able to crack the Top 25 (No. 25) after having a phenomenal week on the court.

Dayton started its run to a national ranking last Wednesday when they upset Xavier as a part of ESPN's Rivalry Week. The Flyers followed up this performance with a win over Richmond on Saturday night. Dayton has won 23 games this season, including nine of its last 10.

The success of both Xavier and Dayton has resulted in both teams earning a national ranking and a share of the conference lead. The success of these two teams may be related to their ability to win on their home court; Xavier has won 22 consecutive conference games at home, while Dayton has won 18 straight home matchups, including all 16 games they have played at home this season.

Players of the week

Charlotte's Lainont Mack was named as the A-10 Player of the Week. The senior forward averaged 19.7 points per game during a three-game stretch, and helped Charlotte win two of the three games. Mack had his best performance of the week on Feb. 8 when he scored 23 points to help lead the 49ers (9-15, 3-7 A-10) to a win over conference leader Dayton.

Mack is the 49ers' leading scorer this season with 14.8 points per game, and he is also second on the team in rebounds with 5.5 per game. The Chicago native was being recruited by many SEC and Big 12 schools, but decided to attend Charlotte and become a force in the A-10. The player of the week honor is the first of Mack's career at Charlotte.

Kwamain Mitchell from Saint Louis won A-10 Rookie of the Week honors. Mitchell, a guard, averaged 18 points over three games for the Billikens. The Billikens (15-10, 6-5 A-10) went 2-1 this week with Mitchell being a large reason why shooting 50 percent over the three games. Mitchell has averaged 9.8 points per game this season, which is third on the Billikens squad.

Rare territory

Former George Washington center Alexander Koul is the only player to lead the A-10 in field-goal percentage for three consecutive years. However, Saint Joseph's (14-10, 7-3 A-10) forward Ahmad Nivins is closing in on becoming the second player to achieve this feat.

The past two years Nivins has shot .647 and .631, respectively, to lead the league both seasons. Nivins leads the A-10 this year in rebounds and shooting percentage, is second in points per game and is fourth in blocks.
